In a very large percentage of cases covered by Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A], transmission of the payment order is made electronically. The receiving bank may be required to act on the basis of a message that appears on a computer screen. Common law concepts of authority of agent to bind principal are not helpful. There is no way of determining the identity or the authority of the person who caused the message to be sent. The receiving bank is not relying on the authority of any particular person to act for the purported sender. The case is not comparable to payment of a check by the drawee bank on the basis of a signature that is forged. Rather, the receiving bank relies on a security procedure pursuant to which the authenticity of the message can be "tested" by various devices which are designed to provide certainty that the message is that of the sender identified in the payment order. In the wire transfer business the concept of "authorized" is different from that found in agency law. In that business a payment order is treated as the order of the person in whose name it is issued if it is properly tested pursuant to a security procedure and the order passes the test.

Section 4A-202 [30-4A-202] reflects the reality of the wire transfer business. A person in whose name a payment order is issued is considered to be the sender of the order if the order is "authorized" as stated in subsection (a) [30-4A-202(1)] or if the order is "verified" pursuant to a security procedure in compliance with subsection (b) [30-4A-202(2)]. If subsection (b) [30-4A-202(2)] does not apply, the question of whether the customer is responsible for the order is determined by the law of agency. The issue is one of actual or apparent authority of the person who caused the order to be issued in the name of the customer. In some cases the law of agency might allow the customer to be bound by an unauthorized order if conduct of the customer can be used to find an estoppel against the customer to deny that the order was unauthorized. If the customer is bound by the order under any of these agency doctrines, subsection (a) [30-4A-202(1)] treats the order as authorized and thus the customer is deemed to be the sender of the order. In most cases, however, subsection (b) [30-4A-202(2)] will apply. In that event there is no need to make an agency law analysis to determine authority. Under Section 4A-202 [30-4A-202], the issue of liability of the purported sender of the payment order will be determined by agency law only if the receiving bank did not comply with subsection (b) [30-4A-202(2)].

2. The scope of Section 4A-202 [30-4A-202] can be illustrated by the following cases. Case #1. A payment order purporting to be that of Customer is received by Receiving Bank but the order was fraudulently transmitted by a person who had no authority to act for Customer. Case #2. An authentic payment order was sent by Customer, but before the order was received by Receiving Bank the order was fraudulently altered by an unauthorized person to change the beneficiary. Case #3. An authentic payment order was received by Receiving Bank, but before the order was executed by Receiving Bank a person who had no authority to act for Customer fraudulently sent a communication purporting to amend the order by changing the beneficiary. In each case Receiving Bank acted on the fraudulent communication by accepting the payment order. These cases are all essentially similar and they are treated identically by Section 4A-202 [30-4A-202]. In each case Receiving Bank acted on a communication that it thought was authorized by Customer when in fact the communication was fraudulent. No distinction is made between Case #1 in which Customer took no part at all in the transaction and Case #2 and Case #3 in which an authentic order was fraudulently altered or amended by an unauthorized person. If subsection (b) [30-4A-202(2)] does not apply, each case is governed by subsection (a) [30-4A-202(1)]. If there are no additional facts on which an estoppel might be found, Customer is not responsible in Case #1 for the fraudulently issued payment order, in Case #2 for the fraudulent alteration or in Case #3 for the fraudulent amendment. Thus, in each case Customer is not liable to pay the order and Receiving Bank takes the loss. The only remedy of Receiving Bank is to seek recovery from the person who received payment as beneficiary of the fraudulent order. If there was verification in compliance with subsection (b) [30-4A-202(2)], Customer will take the loss unless Section 4A-203 [30-4A-203] applies.

3. Subsection (b) of Section 4A-202 [30-4A-202(2)] is based on the assumption that losses due to fraudulent payment orders can best be avoided by the use of commercially reasonable security procedures, and that the use of such procedures should be encouraged. The subsection is designed to protect both the customer and the receiving bank. A receiving bank needs to be able to rely on objective criteria to determine whether it can safely act on a payment order. Employees of the bank can be trained to "test" a payment order according to the various steps specified in the security procedure. The bank is responsible for the acts of these employees. Subsection (b)(ii) [30-4A-202(2)] requires the bank to prove that it accepted the payment order in good faith and "in compliance with the security procedure." If the fraud was not detected because the bank's employee did not perform the acts required by the security procedure, the bank has not complied. Subsection (b)(ii) [30-4A-202(2)] also requires the bank to prove that it complied with any agreement or instruction that restricts acceptance of payment orders issued in the name of the customer. A customer may want to protect itself by imposing limitations on acceptance of payment orders by the bank. For example, the customer may prohibit the bank from accepting a payment order that is not payable from an authorized account, that exceeds the credit balance in specified accounts of the customer, or that exceeds some other amount. Another limitation may relate to the beneficiary. The customer may provide the bank with a list of authorized beneficiaries and prohibit acceptance of any payment order to a beneficiary not appearing on the list. Such limitations may be incorporated into the security procedure itself or they may be covered by a separate agreement or instruction. In either case, the bank must comply with the limitations if the conditions stated in subsection (b) [30-4A-202(2)] are met. Normally limitations on acceptance would be incorporated into an agreement between the customer and the receiving bank, but in some cases the instruction might be unilaterally given by the customer. If standing instructions or an agreement state limitations on the ability of the receiving bank to act, provision must be made for later modification of the limitations. Normally this would be done by an agreement that specifies particular procedures to be followed. Thus, subsection (b) [30-4A-202(2)] states that the receiving bank is not required to follow an instruction that violates a written agreement. The receiving bank is not bound by an instruction unless it has adequate notice of it. Subsections (25), (26) and (27) of Section 1-201 [30-1-201(25) through (27)] apply.

Subsection (b)(i) [30-4A-202(2)] assures that the interests of the customer will be protected by providing an incentive to a bank to make available to the customer a security procedure that is commercially reasonable. If a commercially reasonable security procedure is not made available to the customer, subsection (b) [30-4A-202(2)] does not apply. The result is that subsection (a) [30-4A-202(1)] applies and the bank acts at its peril in accepting a payment order that may be unauthorized. Prudent banking practice may require that security procedures be utilized in virtually all cases except for those in which personal contact between the customer and the bank eliminates the possibility of an unauthorized order. The burden of making available commercially reasonable security procedures is imposed on receiving banks because they generally determine what security procedures can be used and are in the best position to evaluate the efficacy of procedures offered to customers to combat fraud. The burden on the customer is to supervise its employees to assure compliance with the security procedure and to safeguard confidential security information and access to transmitting facilities so that the security procedure cannot be breached.

4. The principal issue that is likely to arise in litigation involving subsection (b) [30-4A-202(2)] is whether the security procedure in effect when a fraudulent payment order was accepted was commercially reasonable. The concept of what is commercially reasonable in a given case is flexible. Verification entails labor and equipment costs that can vary greatly depending upon the degree of security that is sought. A customer that transmits very large numbers of payment orders in very large amounts may desire and may reasonably expect to be provided with state-of-the-art procedures that provide maximum security. But the expense involved may make use of a state-of-the-art procedure infeasible for a customer that normally transmits payments orders infrequently or in relatively low amounts. Another variable is the type of receiving bank. It is reasonable to require large money center banks to make available state-of-the-art security procedures. On the other hand, the same requirement may not be reasonable for a small country bank. A receiving bank might have several security procedures that are designed to meet the varying needs of different customers. The type of payment order is another variable. For example, in a wholesale wire transfer, each payment order is normally transmitted electronically and individually. A testing procedure will be individually applied to each payment order. In funds transfers to be made by means of an automated clearing house many payment orders are incorporated into an electronic device such as a magnetic tape that is physically delivered. Testing of the individual payment orders is not feasible. Thus, a different kind of security procedure must be adopted to take into account the different mode of transmission.

The issue of whether a particular security procedure is commercially reasonable is a question of law. Whether the receiving bank complied with the procedure is a question of fact. It is appropriate to make the finding concerning commercial reasonability a matter of law because security procedures are likely to be standardized in the banking industry and a question of law standard leads to more predictability concerning the level of security that a bank must offer to its customers. The purpose of subsection (b) [30-4A-202(2)] is to encourage banks to institute reasonable safeguards against fraud but not to make them insurers against fraud. A security procedure is not commercially unreasonable simply because another procedure might have been better or because the judge deciding the question would have opted for a more stringent procedure. The standard is not whether the security procedure is the best available. Rather it is whether the procedure is reasonable for the particular customer and the particular bank, which is a lower standard. On the other hand, a security procedure that fails to meet prevailing standards of good banking practice applicable to the particular bank should not be held to be commercially reasonable. Subsection (c) [30-4A-202(3)] states factors to be considered by the judge in making the determination of commercial reasonableness. Sometimes an informed customer refuses a security procedure that is commercially reasonable and suitable for that customer and insists on using a higher-risk procedure because it is more convenient or cheaper. In that case, under the last sentence of subsection (c) [30-4A-202(3)], the customer has voluntarily assumed the risk of failure of the procedure and cannot shift the loss to the bank. But this result follows only if the customer expressly agrees in writing to assume that risk. It is implicit in the last sentence of subsection (c) [30-4A-202(3)] that a bank that accedes to the wishes of its customer in this regard is not acting in bad faith by so doing so long as the customer is made aware of the risk. In all cases, however, a receiving bank cannot get the benefit of subsection (b) [30-4A-202(2)] unless it has made available to the customer a security procedure that is commercially reasonable and suitable for use by that customer. In most cases, the mutual interest of bank and customer to protect against fraud should lead to agreement to a security procedure which is commercially reasonable.

5. The effect of Section 4A-202(b) [30-4A-202(2)] is to place the risk of loss on the customer if an unauthorized payment order is accepted by the receiving bank after verification by the bank in compliance with a commercially reasonable security procedure. An exception to this result is provided by Section 4A-203(a)(2) [30-4A-203(1)(b)]. The customer may avoid the loss resulting from such a payment order if the customer can prove that the fraud was not committed by a person described in that subsection. Breach of a commercially reasonable security procedure requires that the person committing the fraud have knowledge of how the procedure works and knowledge of codes, identifying devices, and the like. That person may also need access to transmitting facilities through an access device or other software in order to breach the security procedure. This confidential information must be obtained either from a source controlled by the customer or from a source controlled by the receiving bank. If the customer can prove that the person committing the fraud did not obtain the confidential information from an agent or former agent of the customer or from a source controlled by the customer, the loss is shifted to the bank. "Prove" is defined in Section 4A-105(a)(7) [30-4A-105(1)(g)]. Because of bank regulation requirements, in this kind of case there will always be a criminal investigation as well as an internal investigation of the bank to determine the probable explanation for the breach of security. Because a funds transfer fraud usually will involve a very large amount of money, both the criminal investigation and the internal investigation are likely to be thorough. In some cases there may be an investigation by bank examiners as well. Frequently, these investigations will develop evidence of who is at fault and the cause of the loss. The customer will have access to evidence developed in these investigations and that evidence can be used by the customer in meeting its burden of proof.

6. The effect of Section 4A-202(b) [30-4A-202(2)] may also be changed by an agreement meeting the requirements of Section 4A-203(a)(1) [30-4A-203(1)(a)]. Some customers may be unwilling to take all or part of the risk of loss with respect to unauthorized payment orders even if all of the requirements of Section 4A-202(b) [30-4A-202(2)] are met. By virtue of Section 4A-203(a)(1) [30-4A-203(1)(a)], a receiving bank may assume all of the risk of loss with respect to unauthorized payment orders or the customer and bank may agree that losses from unauthorized payment orders are to be divided as provided in the agreement.

7. In a large majority of cases the sender of a payment order is a bank. In many cases in which there is a bank sender, both the sender and the receiving bank will be members of a funds transfer system over which the payment order is transmitted. Since Section 4A-202(f) [30-4A-202(6)] does not prohibit a funds transfer system rule from varying rights and obligations under Section 4A-202 [30-4A-202], a rule of the funds transfer system can determine how loss due to an unauthorized payment order from a participating bank to another participating bank is to be allocated. A funds transfer system rule, however, cannot change the rights of a customer that is not a participating bank. §4A-501(b) [30-4A-501(2)]. Section 4A-202(f) [30-4A-202(6)] also prevents variation by agreement except to the extent stated.

Official Comment:

1. With respect to unauthorized payment orders, in a very large percentage of cases a commercially reasonable security procedure will be in effect. Section 4A-204 [30-4A-204] applies only to cases in which (i) no commercially reasonable security procedure is in effect, (ii) the bank did not comply with a commercially reasonable security procedure that was in effect, (iii) the sender can prove, pursuant to Section 4A-203(a)(2) [30-4A-203(1)(b)], that the culprit did not obtain confidential security information controlled by the customer, or (iv) the bank, pursuant to Section 4A-203(a)(1) [30-4A-203(1)(a)] agreed to take all or part of the loss resulting from an unauthorized payment order. In each of these cases the bank takes the risk of loss with respect to an unauthorized payment order because the bank is not entitled to payment from the customer with respect to the order. The bank normally debits the customer's account or otherwise receives payment from the customer shortly after acceptance of the payment order. Subsection (a) of Section 4A-204 [30-4A-204(1)] states that the bank must recredit the account or refund payment to the extent the bank is not entitled to enforce payment.

2. Section 4A-204 [30-4A-204] is designed to encourage a customer to promptly notify the receiving bank that it has accepted an unauthorized payment order. Since cases of unauthorized payment orders will almost always involve fraud, the bank's remedy is normally to recover from the beneficiary of the unauthorized order if the beneficiary was party to the fraud. This remedy may not be worth very much and it may not make any difference whether or not the bank promptly learns about the fraud. But in some cases prompt notification may make it easier for the bank to recover some part of its loss from the culprit. The customer will routinely be notified of the debit to its account with respect to an unauthorized order or will otherwise be notified of acceptance of the order. The customer has a duty to exercise ordinary care to determine that the order was unauthorized after it has received notification from the bank, and to advise the bank of the relevant facts within a reasonable time not exceeding 90 days after receipt of notification. Reasonable time is not defined and it may depend on the facts of the particular case. If a payment order for $1,000,000 is wholly unauthorized, the customer should normally discover it in far less than 90 days. If a $1,000,000 payment order was authorized but the name of the beneficiary was fraudulently changed, a much longer period may be necessary to discover the fraud. But in any event, if the customer delays more than 90 days the customer's duty has not been met. The only consequence of a failure of the customer to perform this duty is a loss of interest on the refund payable by the bank. A customer that acts promptly is entitled to interest from the time the customer's account was debited or the customer otherwise made payment. The rate of interest is stated in Section 4A-506 [30-4A-506]. If the customer fails to perform the duty, no interest is recoverable for any part of the period before the bank learns that it accepted an unauthorized order. But the bank is not entitled to any recovery from the customer based on negligence for failure to inform the bank. Loss of interest is in the nature of a penalty on the customer designed to provide an incentive for the customer to police its account. There is no intention to impose a duty on the customer that might result in shifting loss from the unauthorized order to the customer.

30-4A-205. Erroneous payment orders.

Official Comment

Official Comment:

1. This section concerns error in the content or in the transmission of payment orders. It deals with three kinds of error. Case #1. The order identifies a beneficiary not intended by the sender. For example, Sender intends to wire funds to a beneficiary identified only by an account number. The wrong account number is stated in the order. Case #2. The error is in the amount of the order. For example, Sender intends to wire $1,000 to Beneficiary. Through error, the payment order instructs payment of $1,000,000. Case #3. A payment order is sent to the receiving bank and then, by mistake, the same payment order is sent to the receiving bank again. In Case #3, the receiving bank may have no way of knowing whether the second order is a duplicate of the first or is another order. Similarly, in Case #1 and Case #2, the receiving bank may have no way of knowing that the error exists. In each case, if this section does not apply and the funds transfer is completed, Sender is obliged to pay the order. Section 4A-402 [30-4A-402]. Sender's remedy, based on payment by mistake, is to recover from the beneficiary that received payment.

Sometimes, however, transmission of payment orders of the sender to the receiving bank is made pursuant to a security procedure designed to detect one or more of the errors described above. Since "security procedure" is defined by Section 4A-201 [30-4A-201] as "a procedure established by agreement of a customer and a receiving bank for the purpose of detecting error," Section 4A-205 [30-4A-205] does not apply if the receiving bank and the customer did not agree to the establishment of a procedure for detecting error. A security procedure may be designed to detect an account number that is not one to which Sender normally makes payment. In that case, the security procedure may require a special verification that payment to the stated account number was intended. In the case of dollar amounts, the security procedure may require different codes for different dollar amounts. If a $1,000,000 payment order contains a code that is inappropriate for that amount, the error in amount should be detected. In the case of duplicate orders, the security procedure may require that each payment order be identified by a number or code that applies to no other order. If the number or code of each payment order received is registered in a computer base, the receiving bank can quickly identify a duplicate order. The three cases covered by this section are essentially similar. In each, if the error is not detected, some beneficiary will receive funds that the beneficiary was not intended to receive. If this section applies, the risk of loss with respect to the error of the sender is shifted to the bank which has the burden of recovering the funds from the beneficiary. The risk of loss is shifted to the bank only if the sender proves that the error would have been detected if there had been compliance with the procedure and that the sender (or an agent under Section 4A-206 [30-4A-206]) complied. In the case of a duplicate order or a wrong beneficiary, the sender doesn't have to pay the order. In the case of an overpayment, the sender does not have to pay the order to the extent of the overpayment. If subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section] applies, the position of the receiving bank is comparable to that of a receiving bank that erroneously executes a payment order as stated in Section 4A-303 [30-4A-303]. However, failure of the sender to timely report the error is covered by Section 4A-205(b) [30-4A-205(2)] rather than by Section 4A-304 [30-4A-304] which applies only to erroneous execution under Section 4A-303 [30-4A-303]. A receiving bank to which the risk of loss is shifted by subsection (a)(1) or (2) [subsection (1)(a) or (b) of this section] is entitled to recover the amount erroneously paid to the beneficiary to the extent allowed by the law of mistake and restitution. Rights of the receiving bank against the beneficiary are similar to those of a receiving bank that erroneously executes a payment order as stated in Section 4A-303 [30-4A-303]. Those rights are discussed in Comment 2 to Section 4A-303 [30-4A-303].

2. A security procedure established for the purpose of detecting error is not effective unless both sender and receiving bank comply with the procedure. Thus, the bank undertakes a duty of complying with the procedure for the benefit of the sender. This duty is recognized in subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section]. The loss with respect to the sender's error is shifted to the bank if the bank fails to comply with the procedure and the sender (or an agent under Section 4A-206 [30-4A-206]) does comply. Although the customer may have been negligent in transmitting the erroneous payment order, the loss is put on the bank on a last-clear-chance theory. A similar analysis applies to subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section]. If the loss with respect to an error is shifted to the receiving bank and the sender is notified by the bank that the erroneous payment order was accepted, the sender has a duty to exercise ordinary care to discover the error and notify the bank of the relevant facts within a reasonable time not exceeding 90 days. If the bank can prove that the sender failed in this duty it is entitled to compensation for the loss incurred as a result of the failure. Whether the bank is entitled to recover from the sender depends upon whether the failure to give timely notice would have made any difference. If the bank could not have recovered from the beneficiary that received payment under the erroneous payment order even if timely notice had been given, the sender's failure to notify did not cause any loss of the bank.

3. Section 4A-205 [30-4A-205] is subject to variation by agreement under Section 4A-501 [30-4A-501]. Thus, if a receiving bank and its customer have agreed to a security procedure for detection of error, the liability of the receiving bank for failing to detect an error of the customer as provided in Section 4A-205 [30-4A-205] may be varied as provided in an agreement of the bank and the customer.

30-4A-206. Transmission of payment order through funds-transfer or other communication system.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-206, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. A payment order may be issued to a receiving bank directly by delivery of a writing or electronic device or by an oral or electronic communication. If an agent of the sender is employed to transmit orders on behalf of the sender, the sender is bound by the order transmitted by the agent on the basis of agency law. Section 4A-206 [30-4A-206] is an application of that principle to cases in which a funds transfer or communication system acts as an intermediary in transmitting the sender's order to the receiving bank. The intermediary is deemed to be an agent of the sender for the purpose of transmitting payment orders and related messages for the sender. Section 4A-206 [30-4A-206] deals with error by the intermediary.

2. Transmission by an automated clearing house of an association of banks other than the Federal Reserve Banks is an example of a transaction covered by Section 4A-206 [30-4A-206]. Suppose Originator orders Originator's Bank to cause a large number of payments to be made to many accounts in banks in various parts of the country. These payment orders are electronically transmitted to Originator's Bank and stored in an electronic device that is held by Originator's Bank. Or, transmission of the various payment orders is made by delivery to Originator's Bank of an electronic device containing the instruction to the bank. In either case the terms of the various payment orders by Originator are determined by the information contained in the electronic device. In order to execute the various orders, the information in the electronic device must be processed. For example, if some of the orders are for payments to accounts in Bank X and some to accounts in Bank Y, Originator's Bank will execute these orders of Originator by issuing a series of payment orders to Bank X covering all payments to accounts in that bank, and by issuing a series of payment orders to Bank Y covering all payments to accounts in that bank. The orders to Bank X may be transmitted together by means of an electronic device, and those to Bank Y may be included in another electronic device. Typically, this processing is done by an automated clearing house acting for a group of banks including Originator's Bank. The automated clearing house is a funds transfer system. Section 4A-105(a)(5) [30-4A-105(1)(e)]. Originator's Bank delivers Originator's electronic device or transmits the information contained in the device to the funds transfer system for processing into payment orders of Originator's Bank to the appropriate beneficiary's banks. The processing may result in an erroneous payment order. Originator's Bank, by use of Originator's electronic device, may have given information to the funds transfer system instructing payment of $100,000 to an account in Bank X, but because of human error or an equipment malfunction the processing may have converted that instruction into an instruction to Bank X to make a payment of $1,000,000. Under Section 4A-206 [30-4A-206], Originator's Bank issued a payment order for $1,000,000 to Bank X when the erroneous information was sent to Bank X. Originator's Bank is responsible for the error of the automated clearing house. The liability of the funds transfer system that made the error is not governed by Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A]. It is left to the law of contract, a funds transfer system rule, or other applicable law.

In the hypothetical case just discussed, if the automated clearing house is operated by a Federal Reserve Bank, the analysis is different. Section 4A-206 [30-4A-206] does not apply. Originator's Bank will execute Originator's payment orders by delivery or transmission of the electronic information to the Federal Reserve Bank for processing. The result is that Originator's Bank has issued payment orders to the Federal Reserve Bank which, in this case, is acting as an intermediary bank. When the Federal Reserve Bank has processed the information given to it by Originator's Bank it will issue payment orders to the various beneficiary's banks. If the processing results in an erroneous payment order, the Federal Reserve Bank has erroneously executed the payment order of Originator's Bank and the case is governed by Section 4A-303 [30-4A-303].

30-4A-207. Misdescription of beneficiary.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-207, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] deals with the problem of payment orders issued to the beneficiary's bank for payment to nonexistent or unidentifiable persons or accounts. Since it is not possible in that case for the funds transfer to be completed, subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states that the order cannot be accepted. Under Section 4A-402(c) [30-4A-402(3)], a sender of a payment order is not obliged to pay its order unless the beneficiary's bank accepts a payment order instructing payment to the beneficiary of that sender's order. Thus, if the beneficiary of a funds transfer is nonexistent or unidentifiable, each sender in the funds transfer that has paid its payment order is entitled to get its money back.

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section], which takes precedence over subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section], deals with the problem of payment orders in which the description of the beneficiary does not allow identification of the beneficiary because the beneficiary is described by name and by an identifying number or an account number and the name and number refer to different persons. A very large percentage of payment orders issued to the beneficiary's bank by another bank are processed by automated means using machines capable of reading orders on standard formats that identify the beneficiary by an identifying number or the number of a bank account. The processing of the order by the beneficiary's bank and the crediting of the beneficiary's account are done by use of the identifying or bank account number without human reading of the payment order itself. The process is comparable to that used in automated payment of checks. The standard format, however, may also allow the inclusion of the name of the beneficiary and other information which can be useful to the beneficiary's bank and the beneficiary but which plays no part in the process of payment. If the beneficiary's bank has both the account number and name of the beneficiary supplied by the originator of the funds transfer, it is possible for the beneficiary's bank to determine whether the name and number refer to the same person, but if a duty to make that determination is imposed on the beneficiary's bank the benefits of automated payment are lost. Manual handling of payment orders is both expensive and subject to human error. If payment orders can be handled on an automated basis there are substantial economies of operation and the possibility of clerical error is reduced. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] allows banks to utilize automated processing by allowing banks to act on the basis of the number without regard to the name if the bank does not know that the name and number refer to different persons. "Know" is defined in Section 1-201(25) [30-1-201(25)] to mean actual knowledge, and Section 1-201(27) [30-1-201(27)] states rules for determining when an organization has knowledge of information received by the organization. The time of payment is the pertinent time at which knowledge or lack of knowledge must be determined.

Although the clear trend is for beneficiary's banks to process payment orders by automated means, Section 4A-207 [30-4A-207] is not limited to cases in which processing is done by automated means. A bank that processes by semi-automated means or even manually may rely on number as stated in Section 4A-207 [30-4A-207].

In cases covered by subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] the erroneous identification would in virtually all cases be the identifying or bank account number. In the typical case the error is made by the originator of the funds transfer. The originator should know the name of the person who is to receive payment and can further identify that person by an address that would normally be known to the originator. It is not unlikely, however, that the originator may not be sure whether the identifying or account number refers to the person the originator intends to pay. Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section] deals with the typical case in which the beneficiary's bank pays on the basis of the account number and is not aware at the time of payment that the named beneficiary is not the holder of the account which was paid. In some cases the false number will be the result of error by the originator. In other cases fraud is involved. For example, Doe is the holder of shares in Mutual Fund. Thief, impersonating Doe, requests redemption of the shares and directs Mutual Fund to wire the redemption proceeds to Doe's account #12345 in Beneficiary's Bank. Mutual Fund originates a funds transfer by issuing a payment order to Originator's Bank to make the payment to Doe's account #12345 in Beneficiary's Bank. Originator's Bank executes the order by issuing a conforming payment order to Beneficiary's Bank which makes payment to account #12345. That account is the account of Roe rather than Doe. Roe might be a person acting in concert with Thief or Roe might be an innocent third party. Assume that Roe is a gem merchant that agreed to sell gems to Thief who agreed to wire the purchase price to Roe's account in Beneficiary's Bank. Roe believed that the credit to Roe's account was a transfer of funds from Thief and released the gems to Thief in good faith in reliance on the payment. The case law is unclear on the responsibility of a beneficiary's bank in carrying out a payment order in which the identification of the beneficiary by name and number is conflicting. See Securities Fund Services, Inc. v. American National Bank, 542 F.Supp. 323 (N.D.Ill. 1982) and Bradford Trust Co. v. Texas American Bank, 790 F.2d 407 (5th Cir. 1986). Section 4A-207 [30-4A-207] resolves the issue.

If Beneficiary's Bank did not know about the conflict between the name and number, subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section] applies. Beneficiary's Bank has no duty to determine whether there is a conflict and it may rely on the number as the proper identification of the beneficiary of the order. When it accepts the order, it is entitled to payment from Originator's Bank. Section 4A-402(b) [30-4A-402(2)]. On the other hand, if Beneficiary's Bank knew about the conflict between the name and number and nevertheless paid Roe, subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b) of this section] applies. Under that provision, acceptance of the payment order of Originator's Bank did not occur because there is no beneficiary of that order. Since acceptance did not occur Originator's Bank is not obliged to pay Beneficiary's Bank. Section 4A-402(b) [30-4A-402(2)]. Similarly, Mutual Fund is excused from its obligation to pay Originator's Bank. Section 4A-402(c) [30-4A-402(3)]. Thus, Beneficiary's Bank takes the loss. Its only cause of action is against Thief. Roe is not obliged to return the payment to the beneficiary's bank because Roe received the payment in good faith and for value. Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] makes irrelevant the issue of whether Mutual Fund was or was not negligent in issuing its payment order.

3. Normally, subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section] will apply to the hypothetical case discussed in Comment 2. Beneficiary's Bank will pay on the basis of the number without knowledge of the conflict. In that case subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] places the loss on either Mutual Fund or Originator's Bank. It is not unfair to assign the loss to Mutual Fund because it is the person who dealt with the impostor and it supplied the wrong account number. It could have avoided the loss if it had not used an account number that it was not sure was that of Doe. Mutual Fund, however, may not have been aware of the risk involved in giving both name and number. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] is designed to protect the originator, Mutual Fund, in this case. Under that subsection, the originator is responsible for the inconsistent description of the beneficiary if it had notice that the order might be paid by the beneficiary's bank on the basis of the number. If the originator is a bank, the originator always has that responsibility. The rationale is that any bank should know how payment orders are processed and paid. If the originator is not a bank, the originator's bank must prove that its customer, the originator, had notice. Notice can be proved by any admissible evidence, but the bank can always prove notice by providing the customer with a written statement of the required information and obtaining the customer's signature to the statement. That statement will then apply to any payment order accepted by the bank thereafter. The information need not be supplied more than once.

In the hypothetical case if Originator's Bank made the disclosure stated in the last sentence of subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b) of this section], Mutual Fund must pay Originator's Bank. Under subsection (d)(1) [subsection (4)(a) of this section], Mutual Fund has an action to recover from Roe if recovery from Roe is permitted by the law governing mistake and restitution. Under the assumed facts Roe should be entitled to keep the money as a person who took it in good faith and for value since it was taken as payment for the gems. In that case, Mutual Fund's only remedy is against Thief. If Roe was not acting in good faith, Roe has to return the money to Mutual Fund. If Originator's Bank does not prove that Mutual Fund had notice as stated in subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b) of this section], Mutual Fund is not required to pay Originator's Bank. Thus, the risk of loss falls on Originator's Bank whose remedy is against Roe or Thief as stated above. Subsection (d)(2) [subsection (4)(b) of this section].

30-4A-208. Misdescription of intermediary bank or beneficiary's bank.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-208, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section addresses an issue similar to that addressed by Section 4A-207 [30-4A-207]. Because of automation in the processing of payment orders, a payment order may identify the beneficiary's bank or an intermediary bank by an identifying number. The bank identified by number might or might not also be identified by name. The following two cases illustrate Section 4A-208(a) and (b) [30-4A-208(1) and (2)]:

Case #1. Originator's payment order to Originator's Bank identifies the beneficiary's bank as Bank A and instructs payment to Account #12345 in that bank. Originator's Bank executes Originator's order by issuing a payment order to Intermediary Bank. In the payment order of Originator's Bank the beneficiary's bank is identified as Bank A but is also identified by number, #67890. The identifying number refers to Bank B rather than Bank A. If processing by Intermediary Bank of the payment order of Originator's Bank is done by automated means, Intermediary Bank, in executing the order, will rely on the identifying number and will issue a payment order to Bank B rather than Bank A. If there is an Account #12345 in Bank B, the payment order of Intermediary Bank would normally be accepted and payment would be made to a person not intended by Originator. In this case, Section 4A-208(b)(1) [30-4A-208(2)(a)] puts the risk of loss on Originator's Bank. Intermediary Bank may rely on the number #67890 as the proper identification of the beneficiary's bank. Intermediary Bank has properly executed the payment order of Originator's Bank. By using the wrong number to describe the beneficiary's bank, Originator's Bank has improperly executed Originator's payment order because the payment order of Originator's Bank provides for payment to the wrong beneficiary, the holder of Account #12345 in Bank B rather than the holder of Account #12345 in Bank A. Section 4A-302(a)(1) [30-4A-302(1)(a)] and Section 4A-303(c) [30-4A-303(3)]. Originator's Bank is not entitled to payment from Originator but is required to pay Intermediary Bank. Section 4A-303(c) [30-4A-303(3)] and Section 4A-402(c) [30-4A-402(3)]. Intermediary Bank is also entitled to compensation for any loss and expenses resulting from the error by Originator's Bank.

If there is no Account #12345 in Bank B, the result is that there is no beneficiary of the payment order issued by Originator's Bank and the funds transfer will not be completed. Originator's Bank is not entitled to payment from Originator and Intermediary Bank is not entitled to payment from Originator's Bank. Section 4A-402(c) [30-4A-402(3)]. Since Originator's Bank improperly executed Originator's payment order it may be liable for damages under Section 4A-305 [30-4A-305]. As stated above, Intermediary Bank is entitled to compensation for loss and expenses resulting from the error by Originator's Bank.

Case #2. Suppose the same payment order by Originator to Originator's Bank as in Case #1. In executing the payment order Originator's Bank issues a payment order to Intermediary Bank in which the beneficiary's bank is identified only by number, #67890. That number does not refer to Bank A. Rather, it identifies a person that is not a bank. If processing by Intermediary Bank of the payment order of Originator's Bank is done by automated means, Intermediary Bank will rely on the number #67890 to identify the beneficiary's bank. Intermediary Bank has no duty to determine whether the number identifies a bank. The funds transfer cannot be completed in this case because no bank is identified as the beneficiary's bank. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] puts the risk of loss on Originator's Bank. Originator's Bank is not entitled to payment from Originator. Section 4A-402(c) [30-4A-402(3)]. Originator's Bank has improperly executed Originator's payment order and may be liable for damages under Section 4A-305 [30-4A-305]. Originator's Bank is obliged to compensate Intermediary Bank for loss and expenses resulting from the error by Originator's Bank.

Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] also applies if #67890 identifies a bank, but the bank is not Bank A. Intermediary Bank may rely on the number as the proper identification of the beneficiary's bank. If the bank to which Intermediary Bank sends its payment order accepts the order, Intermediary Bank is entitled to payment from Originator's Bank, but Originator's Bank is not entitled to payment from Originator. The analysis is similar to that in Case #1.

2. Subsection (b)(2) of Section 4A-208 [30-4A-208(2)(b)] addresses cases in which an erroneous identification of a beneficiary's bank or intermediary bank by name and number is made in a payment order of a sender that is not a bank. Suppose Originator issues a payment order to Originator's Bank that instructs that bank to use an intermediary bank identified as Bank A and by an identifying number, #67890. The identifying number refers to Bank B. Originator intended to identify Bank A as intermediary bank. If Originator's Bank relied on the number and issued a payment order to Bank B the rights of Originator's Bank depend upon whether the proof of notice stated in subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b) of this section] is made by Originator's Bank. If proof is made, Originator's Bank's rights are governed by subsection (b)(1) of Section 4A-208 [subsection (2)(a) of this section]. Originator's Bank is not liable for breach of Section 4A-302(a)(1) [30-4A-302(1)(a)] and is entitled to compensation from Originator for any loss and expenses resulting from Originator's error. If notice is not proved, Originator's Bank may not rely on the number in executing Originator's payment order. Since Originator's Bank does not get the benefit of subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section] in that case, Originator's Bank improperly executed Originator's payment order and is in breach of the obligation stated in Section 4A-302(a)(1) [30-4A-302(1)(a)]. If notice is not given, Originator's Bank can rely on the name if it is not aware of the conflict in name and number. Subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c) of this section].

3. Although the principal purpose of Section 4A-208 [30-4A-208] is to accommodate automated processing of payment orders, Section 4A-208 [30-4A-208] applies regardless of whether processing is done by automation, semi-automated means or manually.

30-4A-209. Acceptance of payment order.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-209, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section treats the sender's payment order as a request by the sender to the receiving bank to execute or pay the order and that request can be accepted or rejected by the receiving bank. Section 4A-209 [30-4A-209] defines when acceptance occurs. Section 4A-210 [30-4A-210] covers rejection. Acceptance of the payment order imposes an obligation on the receiving bank to the sender if the receiving bank is not the beneficiary's bank, or to the beneficiary if the receiving bank is the beneficiary's bank. These obligations are stated in Section 4A-302 [30-4A-302] and Section 4A-404 [30-4A-404].

2. Acceptance by a receiving bank other than the beneficiary's bank is defined in Section 4A-209(a) [30-4A-209(1)]. That subsection states the only way that a bank other than the beneficiary's bank can accept a payment order. A payment order to a bank other than the beneficiary's bank is, in effect, a request that the receiving bank execute the sender's order by issuing a payment order to the beneficiary's bank or to an intermediary bank. Normally, acceptance occurs at the time of execution, but there is an exception stated in subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] and discussed in Comment 9. Execution occurs when the receiving bank "issues a payment order intended to carry out" the sender's order. Section 4A-301(a) [30-4A-301(1)]. In some cases the payment order issued by the receiving bank may not conform to the sender's order. For example, the receiving bank might make a mistake in the amount of its order, or the order might be issued to the wrong beneficiary's bank or for the benefit of the wrong beneficiary. In all of these cases there is acceptance of the sender's order by the bank when the receiving bank issues its order intended to carry out the sender's order, even though the bank's payment order does not in fact carry out the instruction of the sender. Improper execution of the sender's order may lead to liability to the sender for damages or it may mean that the sender is not obliged to pay its payment order. These matters are covered in Section 4A-303 [30-4A-303], Section 4A-305 [30-4A-305], and Section 4A-402 [30-4A-402].

3. A receiving bank has no duty to accept a payment order unless the bank makes an agreement, either before or after issuance of the payment order, to accept it, or acceptance is required by a funds transfer system rule. If the bank makes such an agreement it incurs a contractual obligation based on the agreement and may be held liable for breach of contract if a failure to execute violates the agreement. In many cases a bank will enter into an agreement with its customer to govern the rights and obligations of the parties with respect to payment orders issued to the bank by the customer or, in cases in which the sender is also a bank, there may be a funds transfer system rule that governs the obligations of a receiving bank with respect to payment orders transmitted over the system. Such agreements or rules can specify the circumstances under which a receiving bank is obliged to execute a payment order and can define the extent of liability of the receiving bank for breach of the agreement or rule. Section 4A-305(d) [30-4A-305(4)] states the liability for breach of an agreement to execute a payment order.

4. In the case of a payment order issued to the beneficiary's bank, acceptance is defined in Section 4A-209(b) [30-4A-209(2)]. The function of a beneficiary's bank that receives a payment order is different from that of a receiving bank that receives a payment order for execution. In the typical case, the beneficiary's bank simply receives payment from the sender of the order, credits the account of the beneficiary and notifies the beneficiary of the credit. Acceptance by the beneficiary's bank does not create any obligation to the sender. Acceptance by the beneficiary's bank means that the bank is liable to the beneficiary for the amount of the order. Section 4A-404(a) [30-4A-404(1)]. There are three ways in which the beneficiary's bank can accept a payment order which are described in the following comments.

5. Under Section 4A-209(b)(1) [30-4A-209(2)(a)], the beneficiary's bank can accept a payment order by paying the beneficiary. In the normal case of crediting an account of the beneficiary, payment occurs when the beneficiary is given notice of the right to withdraw the credit, the credit is applied to a debt of the beneficiary, or "funds with respect to the order" are otherwise made available to the beneficiary. Section 4A-405(a) [30-4A-405(1)]. The quoted phrase covers cases in which funds are made available to the beneficiary as a result of receipt of a payment order for the benefit of the beneficiary but the release of funds is not expressed as payment of the order. For example, the beneficiary's bank might express a release of funds equal to the amount of the order as a "loan" that will be automatically repaid when the beneficiary's bank receives payment by the sender of the order. If the release of funds is designated as a loan pursuant to a routine practice of the bank, the release is conditional payment of the order rather than a loan, particularly if normal incidents of a loan such as the signing of a loan agreement or note and the payment of interest are not present. Such a release of funds is payment to the beneficiary under Section 4A-405(a) [30-4A-405(1)]. Under Section 4A-405(c) [30-4A-405(3)] the bank cannot recover the money from the beneficiary if the bank does not receive payment from the sender of the payment order that it accepted. Exceptions to this rule are stated in §4A-405(d) and (e) [30-4A-405(4) and (5)]. The beneficiary's bank may also accept by notifying the beneficiary that the order has been received. "Notifies" is defined in Section 1-201(26) [30-1-201(26)]. In some cases a beneficiary's bank will receive a payment order during the day but settlement of the sender's obligation to pay the order will not occur until the end of the day. If the beneficiary's bank wants to defer incurring liability to the beneficiary until the beneficiary's bank receives payment, it can do so. The beneficiary's bank incurs no liability to the beneficiary with respect to a payment order that it receives until it accepts the order. If the bank does not accept pursuant to subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section], acceptance does not occur until the end of the day when the beneficiary's bank receives settlement. If the sender settles, the payment order will be accepted under subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b) of this section] and the funds will be released to the beneficiary the next morning. If the sender doesn't settle, no acceptance occurs. In either case the beneficiary's bank suffers no loss.

6. In most cases the beneficiary's bank will receive a payment order from another bank. If the sender is a bank and the beneficiary's bank receives payment from the sender by final settlement through the Federal Reserve System or a funds transfer system (Section 4A-403(a)(1) [30-4A-403(1)(a)]) or, less commonly, through credit to an account of the beneficiary's bank with the sender or another bank (Section 4A-403(a)(2) [30-4A-403(1)(b)]), acceptance by the beneficiary's bank occurs at the time payment is made. Section 4A-209(b)(2) [subsection (2)(b) of this section]. A minor exception to this rule is stated in Section 4A-209(c) [30-4A-209(3)]. Section 4A-209(b)(2) [30-4A-209(2)(b)] results in automatic acceptance of payment orders issued to a beneficiary's bank by means of Fedwire because the Federal Reserve account of the beneficiary's bank is credited and final payment is made to that bank when the payment order is received.

Subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b) of this section] would also apply to cases in which the beneficiary's bank mistakenly pays a person who is not the beneficiary of the payment order issued to the beneficiary's bank. For example, suppose the payment order provides for immediate payment to Account #12345. The beneficiary's bank erroneously credits Account #12346 and notifies the holder of that account of the credit. No acceptance occurs in this case under subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section] because the beneficiary of the order has not been paid or notified. The holder of Account #12345 is the beneficiary of the order issued to the beneficiary's bank. But acceptance will normally occur if the beneficiary's bank takes no other action, because the bank will normally receive settlement with respect to the payment order. At that time the bank has accepted because the sender paid its payment order. The bank is liable to pay the holder of Account #12345. The bank has paid the holder of Account #12346 by mistake, and has a right to recover the payment if the credit is withdrawn, to the extent provided in the law governing mistake and restitution.

7. Subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c) of this section] covers cases of inaction by the beneficiary's bank. It applies whether or not the sender is a bank and covers a case in which the sender and the beneficiary both have accounts with the receiving bank and payment will be made by debiting the account of the sender and crediting the account of the beneficiary. Subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c) of this section] is similar to subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b) of this section] in that it bases acceptance by the beneficiary's bank on payment by the sender. Payment by the sender is effected by a debit to the sender's account if the account balance is sufficient to cover the amount of the order. On the payment date (Section 4A-401 [30-4A-401]) of the order the beneficiary's bank will normally credit the beneficiary's account and notify the beneficiary of receipt of the order if it is satisfied that the sender's account balance covers the order or is willing to give credit to the sender. In some cases, however, the bank may not be willing to give credit to the sender and it may not be possible for the bank to determine until the end of the day on the payment date whether there are sufficient good funds in the sender's account. There may be various transactions during the day involving funds going into and out of the account. Some of these transactions may occur late in the day or after the close of the banking day. To accommodate this situation, subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c) of this section] provides that the status of the account is determined at the opening of the next funds transfer business day of the beneficiary's bank after the payment date of the order. If the sender's account balance is sufficient to cover the order, the beneficiary's bank has a source of payment and the result in almost all cases is that the bank accepts the order at that time if it did not previously accept under subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a) of this section]. In rare cases, a bank may want to avoid acceptance under subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c) of this section] by rejecting the order as discussed in Comment 8.

8. Section 4A-209 [30-4A-209] is based on a general principle that a receiving bank is not obliged to accept a payment order unless it has agreed or is bound by a funds transfer system rule to do so. Thus, provision is made to allow the receiving bank to prevent acceptance of the order. This principle is consistently followed if the receiving bank is not the beneficiary's bank. If the receiving bank is not the beneficiary's bank, acceptance is in the control of the receiving bank because it occurs only if the order is executed. But in the case of the beneficiary's bank acceptance can occur by passive receipt of payment under subsection (b)(2) or (3) [subsection (2)(b) or (2)(c) of this section]. In the case of a payment made by Fedwire acceptance cannot be prevented. In other cases the beneficiary's bank can prevent acceptance by giving notice of rejection to the sender before payment occurs under Section 4A-403(a)(1) or (2) [30-4A-403(1)(a) or (1)(b)]. A minor exception to the ability of the beneficiary's bank to reject is stated in Section 4A-502(c)(3) [30-4A-502(3)(c)].

Under subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c) of this section] acceptance occurs at the opening of the next funds transfer business day of the beneficiary's bank following the payment date unless the bank rejected the order before that time or it rejects within one hour after that time. In some cases the sender and the beneficiary's bank may not be in the same time zone or the beginning of the business day of the sender and the funds transfer business day of the beneficiary's bank may not coincide. For example, the sender may be located in California and the beneficiary's bank in New York. Since in most cases notice of rejection would be communicated electronically or by telephone, it might not be feasible for the bank to give notice before one hour after the opening of the funds transfer business day in New York because at that hour, the sender's business day may not have started in California. For that reason, there are alternative deadlines stated in subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c) of this section]. In the case stated, the bank acts in time if it gives notice within one hour after the opening of the business day of the sender. But if the notice of rejection is received by the sender after the payment date, the bank is obliged to pay interest to the sender if the sender's account does not bear interest. In that case the bank had the use of funds of the sender that the sender could reasonably assume would be used to pay the beneficiary. The rate of interest is stated in Section 4A-506 [30-4A-506]. If the sender receives notice on the day after the payment date the sender is entitled to one day's interest. If receipt of notice is delayed for more than one day, the sender is entitled to interest for each additional day of delay.

9. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] applies only to a payment order by the originator of a funds transfer to the originator's bank and it refers to the following situation. On April 1, Originator instructs Bank A to make a payment on April 15 to the account of Beneficiary in Bank B. By mistake, on April 1, Bank A executes Originator's payment order by issuing a payment order to Bank B instructing immediate payment to Beneficiary. Bank B credited Beneficiary's account and immediately released the funds to Beneficiary. Under subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] no acceptance by Bank A occurred on April 1 when Originator's payment order was executed because acceptance cannot occur before the execution date which in this case would be April 15 or shortly before that date. Section 4A-301(b) [30-4A-301(2)]. Under Section 4A-402(c) [30-4A-402(3)], Originator is not obliged to pay Bank A until the order is accepted and that can't occur until the execution date. But Bank A is required to pay Bank B when Bank B accepted Bank A's order on April 1. Unless Originator and Beneficiary are the same person, in almost all cases Originator is paying a debt owed to Beneficiary and early payment does not injure Originator because Originator does not have to pay Bank A until the execution date. Section 4A-402(c) [30-4A-402(3)]. Bank A takes the interest loss. But suppose that on April 3, Originator concludes that no debt was owed to Beneficiary or that the debt was less than the amount of the payment order. Under Section 4A-211(b) [30-4A-211(2)] Originator can cancel its payment order if Bank A has not accepted. If early execution of Originator's payment order is acceptance, Originator can suffer a loss because cancellation after acceptance is not possible without the consent of Bank A and Bank B. Section 4A-211(c) [30-4A-211(3)]. If Originator has to pay Bank A, Originator would be required to seek recovery of the money from Beneficiary. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] prevents this result and puts the risk of loss on Bank A by providing that the early execution does not result in acceptance until the execution date. Since on April 3 Originator's order was not yet accepted, Originator can cancel it under Section 4A-211(b) [30-4A-211(2)]. The result is that Bank A is not entitled to payment from Originator but is obliged to pay Bank B. Bank A has paid Beneficiary by mistake. If Originator's payment order is cancelled, Bank A becomes the originator of an erroneous funds transfer to Beneficiary. Bank A has the burden of recovering payment from Beneficiary on the basis of a payment by mistake. If Beneficiary received the money in good faith in payment of a debt owed to Beneficiary by Originator, the law of mistake and restitution may allow Beneficiary to keep all or part of the money received. If Originator owed money to Beneficiary, Bank A has paid Originator's debt and, under the law of restitution, which applies pursuant to Section 1-103 [30-1-103], Bank A is subrogated to Beneficiary's rights against Originator on the debt.

If Bank A is the Beneficiary's bank and Bank A credited Beneficiary's account and released the funds to Beneficiary on April 1, the analysis is similar. If Originator's order is cancelled, Bank A has paid Beneficiary by mistake. The right of Bank A to recover the payment from Beneficiary is similar to Bank A's rights in the preceding paragraph.

30-4A-210. Rejection of payment order.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-210, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. With respect to payment orders issued to a receiving bank other than the beneficiary's bank, notice of rejection is not necessary to prevent acceptance of the order. Acceptance can occur only if the receiving bank executes the order. Section 4A-209(a) [30-4A-209(1)]. But notice of rejection will routinely be given by such a bank in cases in which the bank cannot or is not willing to execute the order for some reason. There are many reasons why a bank doesn't execute an order. The payment order may not clearly instruct the receiving bank because of some ambiguity in the order or an internal inconsistency. In some cases, the receiving bank may not be able to carry out the instruction because of equipment failure, credit limitations on the receiving bank, or some other factor which makes proper execution of the order infeasible. In those cases notice of rejection is a means of informing the sender of the facts so that a corrected payment order can be transmitted or the sender can seek alternate means of completing the funds transfer. The other major reason for not executing an order is that the sender's account is insufficient to cover the order and the receiving bank is not willing to give credit to the sender. If the sender's account is sufficient to cover the order and the receiving bank chooses not to execute the order, notice of rejection is necessary to prevent liability to pay interest to the sender if the case falls within Section 4A-210(b) [30-4A-210(2)] which is discussed in Comment 3.

2. A payment order to the beneficiary's bank can be accepted by inaction of the bank. Section 4A-209(b)(2) and (3) [30-4A-209(2)(b) and (2)(c)]. To prevent acceptance under those provisions it is necessary for the receiving bank to send notice of rejection before acceptance occurs. Subsection (a) of Section 4A-210 [30-4A-210(1)] states the rule that rejection is accomplished by giving notice of rejection. This incorporates the definitions in Section 1-201(26) [30-1-201(26)]. Rejection is effective when notice is given if it is given by a means that is reasonable in the circumstances. Otherwise, it is effective when the notice is received. The question of when rejection is effective is important only in the relatively few cases under subsection (b)(2) and (3) [subsection (2)(b) and (2)(c) of this section] in which a notice of rejection is necessary to prevent acceptance. The question of whether a particular means is reasonable depends on the facts in a particular case. In a very large percentage of cases the sender and the receiving bank will be in direct electronic contact with each other and in those cases a notice of rejection can be transmitted instantaneously. Since time is of the essence in a large proportion of funds transfers, some quick means of transmission would usually be required, but this is not always the case. The parties may specify by agreement the means by which communication between the parties is to be made.

3. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] deals with cases in which a sender does not learn until after the execution date that the sender's order has not been executed. It applies only to cases in which the receiving bank was assured of payment because the sender's account was sufficient to cover the order. Normally, the receiving bank will accept the sender's order if it is assured of payment, but there may be some cases in which the bank chooses to reject. Unless the receiving bank had obligated itself by agreement to accept, the failure to accept is not wrongful. There is no duty of the receiving bank to accept the payment order unless it is obliged to accept by express agreement. Section 4A-212 [30-4A-212]. But even if the bank has not acted wrongfully, the receiving bank had the use of the sender's money that the sender could reasonably assume was to be the source of payment of the funds transfer. Until the sender learns that the order was not accepted the sender is denied the use of that money. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] obliges the receiving bank to pay interest to the sender as restitution unless the sender receives notice of rejection on the execution date. The time of receipt of notice is determined pursuant to §1-201(27) [30-1-201(27)]. The rate of interest is stated in Section 4A-506 [30-4A-506]. If the sender receives notice on the day after the execution date, the sender is entitled to one day's interest. If receipt of notice is delayed for more than one day, the sender is entitled to interest for each additional day of delay.

4. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] treats acceptance and rejection as mutually exclusive. If a payment order has been accepted, rejection of that order becomes impossible. If a payment order has been rejected it cannot be accepted later by the receiving bank. Once notice of rejection has been given, the sender may have acted on the notice by making the payment through other channels. If the receiving bank wants to act on a payment order that it has rejected it has to obtain the consent of the sender. In that case the consent of the sender would amount to the giving of a second payment order that substitutes for the rejected first order. If the receiving bank suspends payments (Section 4-104(1)(k) [30-4-104(1)(k)]), subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] provides that unaccepted payment orders are deemed rejected at the time suspension of payments occurs. This prevents acceptance by passage of time under Section 4A-209(b)(3) [30-4A-209(2)(c)].

30-4A-211. Cancellation and amendment of payment order.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-211, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section deals with cancellation and amendment of payment orders. It states the conditions under which cancellation or amendment is both effective and rightful. There is no concept of wrongful cancellation or amendment of a payment order. If the conditions stated in this section are not met the attempted cancellation or amendment is not effective. If the stated conditions are met the cancellation or amendment is effective and rightful. The sender of a payment order may want to withdraw or change the order because the sender has had a change of mind about the transaction or because the payment order was erroneously issued or for any other reason. One common situation is that of multiple transmission of the same order. The sender that mistakenly transmits the same order twice wants to correct the mistake by cancelling the duplicate order. Or, a sender may have intended to order a payment of $1,000,000 but mistakenly issued an order to pay $10,000,000. In this case the sender might try to correct the mistake by cancelling the order and issuing another order in the proper amount. Or, the mistake could be corrected by amending the order to change it to the proper amount. Whether the error is corrected by amendment or cancellation and reissue the net result is the same. This result is stated in the last sentence of subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section].

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] allows a cancellation or amendment of a payment order to be communicated to the receiving bank "orally, electronically, or in writing." The quoted phrase is consistent with the language of Section 4A-103(a) [30-4A-103(1)] applicable to payment orders. Cancellations and amendments are normally subject to verification pursuant to security procedures to the same extent as payment orders. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] recognizes this fact by providing that in cases in which there is a security procedure in effect between the sender and the receiving bank the bank is not bound by a communication cancelling or amending an order unless verification has been made. This is necessary to protect the bank because under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] a cancellation or amendment can be effective by unilateral action of the sender. Without verification the bank cannot be sure whether the communication was or was not effective to cancel or amend a previously verified payment order.

3. If the receiving bank has not yet accepted the order, there is no reason why the sender should not be able to cancel or amend the order unilaterally so long as the requirements of subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2) of this section] are met. If the receiving bank has accepted the order, it is possible to cancel or amend but only if the requirements of subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] are met.

First consider the case of a receiving bank other than the beneficiary's bank. If the bank has not yet accepted the order, the sender can unilaterally cancel or amend. The communication amending or cancelling the payment order must be received in time to allow the bank to act on it before the bank issues its payment order in execution of the sender's order. The time that the sender's communication is received is governed by Section 4A-106 [30-4A-106]. If a payment order does not specify a delayed payment date or execution date, the order will normally be executed shortly after receipt. Thus, as a practical matter, the sender will have very little time in which to instruct cancellation or amendment before acceptance. In addition, a receiving bank will normally have cut-off times for receipt of such communications, and the receiving bank is not obliged to act on communications received after the cut-off hour. Cancellation by the sender after execution of the order by the receiving bank requires the agreement of the bank unless a funds transfer rule otherwise provides. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section]. Although execution of the sender's order by the receiving bank does not itself impose liability on the receiving bank (under Section 4A-402 [30-4A-402] no liability is incurred by the receiving bank to pay its order until it is accepted), it would commonly be the case that acceptance follows shortly after issuance. Thus, as a practical matter, a receiving bank that has executed a payment order will incur a liability to the next bank in the chain before it would be able to act on the cancellation request of its customer. It is unreasonable to impose on the receiving bank a risk of loss with respect to a cancellation request without the consent of the receiving bank.

The statute does not state how or when the agreement of the receiving bank must be obtained for cancellation after execution. The receiving bank's consent could be obtained at the time cancellation occurs or it could be based on a preexisting agreement. Or, a funds transfer system rule could provide that cancellation can be made unilaterally by the sender. By virtue of that rule any receiving bank covered by the rule is bound. Section 4A-501 [30-4A-501]. If the receiving bank has already executed the sender's order, the bank would not consent to cancellation unless the bank to which the receiving bank has issued its payment order consents to cancellation of that order. It makes no sense to allow cancellation of a payment order unless all subsequent payment orders in the funds transfer that were issued because of the cancelled payment order are also cancelled. Under subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a) of this section], if a receiving bank consents to cancellation of the payment order after it has [sic] executed, the cancellation is not effective unless the receiving bank also cancels the payment order issued by the bank.

4. With respect to a payment order issued to the beneficiary's bank, acceptance is particularly important because it creates liability to pay the beneficiary, it defines when the originator pays its obligation to the beneficiary, and it defines when any obligation for which the payment is made is discharged. Since acceptance affects the rights of the originator and the beneficiary it is not appropriate to allow the beneficiary's bank to agree to cancellation or amendment except in unusual cases. Except as provided in subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b) of this section], cancellation or amendment after acceptance by the beneficiary's bank is not possible unless all parties affected by the order agree. Under subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b) of this section], cancellation or amendment is possible only in the four cases stated. The following examples illustrate subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b) of this section]:

Case #1. Originator's Bank executed a payment order issued in the name of its customer as sender. The order was not authorized by the customer and was fraudulently issued. Beneficiary's Bank accepted the payment order issued by Originator's Bank. Under subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b) of this section] Originator's Bank can cancel the order if Beneficiary's Bank consents. It doesn't make any difference whether the payment order that Originator's Bank accepted was or was not enforceable against the customer under Section 4A-202(b) [30-4A-202(2)]. Verification under that provision is important in determining whether Originator's Bank or the customer has the risk of loss, but it has no relevance under Section 4A-211(c)(2) [30-4A-211(3)(b)]. Whether or not verified, the payment order was not authorized by the customer. Cancellation of the payment order to Beneficiary's Bank causes the acceptance of Beneficiary's Bank to be nullified. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section]. Beneficiary's Bank is entitled to recover payment from the beneficiary to the extent allowed by the law of mistake and restitution. In this kind of case the beneficiary is usually a party to the fraud who has no right to receive or retain payment of the order.

Case #2. Originator owed Beneficiary $1,000,000 and ordered Bank A to pay that amount to the account of Beneficiary in Bank B. Bank A issued a complying order to Bank B, but by mistake issued a duplicate order as well. Bank B accepted both orders. Under subsection (c)(2)(i) [subsection (3)(b)(i)(A) of this section] cancellation of the duplicate order could be made by Bank A with the consent of Bank B. Beneficiary has no right to receive or retain payment of the duplicate payment order if only $1,000,000 was owed by Originator to Beneficiary. If Originator owed $2,000,000 to Beneficiary, the law of restitution might allow Beneficiary to retain the $1,000,000 paid by Bank B on the duplicate order. In that case Bank B is entitled to reimbursement from Bank A under subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section].

Case #3. Originator owed $1,000,000 to X. Intending to pay X, Originator ordered Bank A to pay $1,000,000 to Y's account in Bank B. Bank A issued a complying payment order to Bank B which Bank B accepted by releasing the $1,000,000 to Y. Under subsection (c)(2)(ii) [subsection (3)(b)(i)(B) of this section] Bank A can cancel its payment order to Bank B with the consent of Bank B if Y was not entitled to receive payment from Originator. Originator can also cancel its order to Bank A with Bank A's consent. Subsection (c) (1) [subsection (3)(a) of this section]. Bank B may recover the $1,000,000 from Y unless the law of mistake and restitution allows Y to retain some or all of the amount paid. If no debt was owed to Y, Bank B should have a right of recovery.

Case #4. Originator owed Beneficiary $10,000. By mistake Originator ordered Bank A to pay $1,000,000 to the account of Beneficiary in Bank B. Bank A issued a complying order to Bank B which accepted by notifying Beneficiary of its right to withdraw $1,000,000. Cancellation is permitted in this case under subsection (c)(2)(iii) [subsection (3)(b)(i)(C) of this section]. If Bank B paid Beneficiary it is entitled to recover the payment except to the extent the law of mistake and restitution allows Beneficiary to retain payment. In this case Beneficiary might be entitled to retain $10,000, the amount of the debt owed to Beneficiary. If Beneficiary may retain $10,000, Bank B would be entitled to $10,000 from Bank A pursuant to subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section]. In this case Originator also cancelled its order. Thus Bank A would be entitled to $10,000 from Originator pursuant to subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section].

5. Unless constrained by a funds transfer system rule, a receiving bank may agree to cancellation or amendment of the payment order under subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] but is not required to do so regardless of the circumstances. If the receiving bank has incurred liability as a result of its acceptance of the sender's order, there are substantial risks in agreeing to cancellation or amendment. This is particularly true for a beneficiary's bank. Cancellation or amendment after acceptance by the beneficiary's bank can be made only in the four cases stated and the beneficiary's bank may not have any way of knowing whether the requirements of subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] have been met or whether it will be able to recover payment from the beneficiary that received payment. Even with indemnity the beneficiary's bank may be reluctant to alienate its customer, the beneficiary, by denying the customer the funds. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] leaves the decision to the beneficiary's bank unless the consent of the beneficiary's bank is not required under a funds transfer system rule or other interbank agreement. If a receiving bank agrees to cancellation or amendment under subsection (c)(1) or (2) [subsection (3)(a) or (3)(b) of this section], it is automatically entitled to indemnification from the sender under subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section]. The indemnification provision recognizes that a sender has no right to cancel a payment order after it is accepted by the receiving bank. If the receiving bank agrees to cancellation, it is doing so as an accommodation to the sender and it should not incur a risk of loss in doing so.

6. Acceptance by the receiving bank of a payment order issued by the sender is comparable to acceptance of an offer under the law of contracts. Under that law the death or legal incapacity of an offeror terminates the offer even though the offeree has no notice of the death or incapacity. Restatement Second, Contracts §48. Comment a. to that section states that the "rule seems to be a relic of the obsolete view that a contract requires a 'meeting of minds,' and it is out of harmony with the modern doctrine that a manifestation of assent is effective without regard to actual mental assent." Subsection (g) [subsection (7) of this section], which reverses the Restatement rule in the case of a payment order, is similar to Section 4-405(1) [30-4-405(1)] which applies to checks. Subsection (g) [subsection (7) of this section] does not address the effect of the bankruptcy of the sender of a payment order before the order is accepted, but the principle of subsection (g) [subsection (7) of this section] has been recognized in Bank of Marin v. England, 385 U.S. 99 (1966). Although Bankruptcy Code Section 542(c) may not have been drafted with wire transfers in mind, its language can be read to allow the receiving bank to charge the sender's account for the amount of the payment order if the receiving bank executed it in ignorance of the bankruptcy.

7. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] deals with stale payment orders. Payment orders normally are executed on the execution date or the day after. An order issued to the beneficiary's bank is normally accepted on the payment date or the day after. If a payment order is not accepted on its execution or payment date or shortly thereafter, it is probable that there was some problem with the terms of the order or the sender did not have sufficient funds or credit to cover the amount of the order. Delayed acceptance of such an order is normally not contemplated, but the order may not have been cancelled by the sender. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] provides for cancellation by operation of law to prevent an unexpected delayed acceptance.

8. A funds transfer system rule can govern rights and obligations between banks that are parties to payment orders transmitted over the system even if the rule conflicts with Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A]. In some cases, however, a rule governing a transaction between two banks can affect a third party in an unacceptable way. Subsection (h) [subsection (8) of this section] deals with such a case. A funds transfer system rule cannot allow cancellation of a payment order accepted by the beneficiary's bank if the rule conflicts with subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b) of this section]. Because rights of the beneficiary and the originator are directly affected by acceptance, subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b) of this section] severely limits cancellation. These limitations cannot be altered by funds transfer system rule.

Official Comment:

With limited exceptions stated in this Article, the duties and obligations of receiving banks that carry out a funds transfer arise only as a result of acceptance of payment orders or of agreements made by receiving banks. Exceptions are stated in Section 4A-209(b)(3) [30-4A-209(2)(c)] and Section 4A-210(b) [30-4A-210(2)]. A receiving bank is not like a collecting bank under Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4]. No receiving bank, whether it be an originator's bank, an intermediary bank or a beneficiary's bank, is an agent for any other party in the funds transfer.

Part 3
Execution of Sender's Payment Order by Receiving Bank

30-4A-301. Execution and execution date.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-301, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. The terms "executed," "execution" and "execution date" are used only with respect to a payment order to a receiving bank other than the beneficiary's bank. The beneficiary's bank can accept the payment order that it receives, but it does not execute the order. Execution refers to the act of the receiving bank in issuing a payment order "intended to carry out" the payment order that the bank received. A receiving bank has executed an order even if the order issued by the bank does not carry out the order received by the bank. For example, the bank may have erroneously issued an order to the wrong beneficiary, or in the wrong amount or to the wrong beneficiary's bank. In each of these cases execution has occurred but the execution is erroneous. Erroneous execution is covered in Section 4A-303 [30-4A-303].

2. "Execution date" refers to the time a payment order should be executed rather than the day it is actually executed. Normally the sender will not specify an execution date, but most payment orders are meant to be executed immediately. Thus, the execution date is normally the day the order is received by the receiving bank. It is common for the sender to specify a "payment date" which is defined in Section 4A-401 [30-4A-401] as "the day on which the amount of the order is payable to the beneficiary by the beneficiary's bank." Except for automated clearing house transfers, if a funds transfer is entirely within the United States and the payment is to be carried out electronically, the execution date is the payment date unless the order is received after the payment date. If the payment is to be carried out through an automated clearing house, execution may occur before the payment date. In an ACH transfer the beneficiary is usually paid one or two days after issue of the originator's payment order. The execution date is determined by the stated payment date and is a date before the payment date on which execution is reasonably necessary to allow payment on the payment date. A funds transfer system rule could also determine the execution date of orders received by the receiving bank if both the sender and the receiving bank are participants in the funds transfer system. The execution date can be determined by the payment order itself or by separate instructions of the sender or an agreement of the sender and the receiving bank. The second sentence of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] must be read in the light of Section 4A-106 [30-4A-106] which states that if a payment order is received after the cut-off time of the receiving bank it may be treated by the bank as received at the opening of the next funds transfer business day.

3. Execution on the execution date is timely, but the order can be executed before or after the execution date. Section 4A-209(d) [30-4A-209(4)] and Section 4A-402(c) [30-4A-402(3)] state the consequences of early execution and Section 4A-305(a) [30-4A-305(1)] states the consequences of late execution.

30-4A-302. Obligations of receiving bank in execution of payment order.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-302, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. In the absence of agreement, the receiving bank is not obliged to execute an order of the sender. Section 4A-212 [30-4A-212]. Section 4A-302 [30-4A-302] states the manner in which the receiving bank may execute the sender's order if execution occurs. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section] states the residual rule. The payment order issued by the receiving bank must comply with the sender's order and, unless some other rule is stated in the section, the receiving bank is obliged to follow any instruction of the sender concerning which funds transfer system is to be used, which intermediary banks are to be used, and what means of transmission is to be used. The instruction of the sender may be incorporated in the payment order itself or may be given separately. For example, there may be a master agreement between the sender and receiving bank containing instructions governing payment orders to be issued from time to time by the sender to the receiving bank. In most funds transfers, speed is a paramount consideration. A sender that wants assurance that the funds transfer will be expeditiously completed can specify the means to be used. The receiving bank can follow the instructions literally or it can use an equivalent means. For example, if the sender instructs the receiving bank to transmit by telex, the receiving bank could use telephone instead. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section]. In most cases the sender will not specify a particular means but will use a general term such as "by wire" or "wire transfer" or "as soon as possible." These words signify that the sender wants a same-day transfer. In these cases the receiving bank is required to use a telephonic or electronic communication to transmit its order and is also required to instruct any intermediary bank to which it issues its order to transmit by similar means. Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b) of this section]. In other cases, such as an automated clearing house transfer, a same-day transfer is not contemplated. Normally the sender's instruction or the context in which the payment order is received makes clear the type of funds transfer that is appropriate. If the sender states a payment date with respect to the payment order, the receiving bank is obliged to execute the order at a time and in a manner to meet the payment date if that is feasible. Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b) of this section]. This provision would apply to many ACH transfers made to pay recurring debts of the sender. In other cases, involving relatively small amounts, time may not be an important factor and cost may be a more important element. Fast means, such as telephone or electronic transmission, are more expensive than slow means such as mailing. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] states that in the absence of instructions the receiving bank is given discretion to decide. It may issue its payment order by first class mail or by any means reasonable in the circumstances. Section 4A-305 [30-4A-305] states the liability of a receiving bank for breach of the obligations stated in Section 4A-302 [30-4A-302].

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] concerns the choice of intermediary banks to be used in completing the funds transfer, and the funds transfer system to be used. If the receiving bank is not instructed about the matter, it can issue an order directly to the beneficiary's bank or can issue an order to an intermediary bank. The receiving bank also has discretion concerning use of a funds transfer system. In some cases it may be reasonable to use either an automated clearing house system or a wire transfer system such as Fedwire or CHIPS. Normally, the receiving bank will follow the instruction of the sender in these matters, but in some cases it may be prudent for the bank not to follow instructions. The sender may have designated a funds transfer system to be used in carrying out the funds transfer, but it may not be feasible to use the designated system because of some impediment such as a computer breakdown which prevents prompt execution of the order. The receiving bank is permitted to use an alternate means of transmittal in a good faith effort to execute the order expeditiously. The same leeway is not given to the receiving bank if the sender designates an intermediary bank through which the funds transfer is to be routed. The sender's designation of that intermediary bank may mean that the beneficiary's bank is expecting to obtain a credit from that intermediary bank and may have relied on that anticipated credit. If the receiving bank uses another intermediary bank the expectations of the beneficiary's bank may not be realized. The receiving bank could choose to route the transfer to another intermediary bank and then to the designated intermediary bank if there were some reason such as a lack of a correspondent-bank relationship or a bilateral credit limitation, but the designated intermediary bank cannot be circumvented. To do so violates the sender's instructions.

3. The normal rule, under subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section], is that the receiving bank, in executing a payment order, is required to issue a payment order that complies as to amount with that of the sender's order. In most cases the receiving bank issues an order equal to the amount of the sender's order and makes a separate charge for services and expenses in executing the sender's order. In some cases, particularly if it is an intermediary bank that is executing an order, charges are collected by deducting them from the amount of the payment order issued by the executing bank. If that is done, the amount of the payment order accepted by the beneficiary's bank will be slightly less than the amount of the originator's payment order. For example, Originator, in order to pay an obligation of $1,000,000 owed to Beneficiary, issues a payment order to Originator's Bank to pay $1,000,000 to the account of Beneficiary in Beneficiary's Bank. Originator's Bank issues a payment order to Intermediary Bank for $1,000,000 and debits Originator's account for $1,000,010. The extra $10 is the fee of Originator's Bank. Intermediary Bank executes the payment order of Originator's Bank by issuing a payment order to Beneficiary's Bank for $999,990, but under §4A-402(c) [30-4A-402(3)] is entitled to receive $1,000,000 from Originator's Bank. The $10 difference is the fee of Intermediary Bank. Beneficiary's Bank credits Beneficiary's account for $999,990. When Beneficiary's Bank accepts the payment order of Intermediary Bank the result is a payment of $999,990 from Originator to Beneficiary. Section 4A-406(a) [30-4A-406(1)]. If that payment discharges the $1,000,000 debt, the effect is that Beneficiary has paid the charges of Intermediary Bank and Originator has paid the charges of Originator's Bank. Subsection (d) of Section 4A-302 [30-4A-302(4)] allows Intermediary Bank to collect its charges by deducting them from the amount of the payment order, but only if instructed to do so by Originator's Bank. Originator's Bank is not authorized to give that instruction to Intermediary Bank unless Originator authorized the instruction. Thus, Originator can control how the charges of Originator's Bank and Intermediary Bank are to be paid. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] does not apply to charges of Beneficiary's Bank to Beneficiary.

In the case discussed in the preceding paragraph the $10 charge is trivial in relation to the amount of the payment and it may not be important to Beneficiary how the charge is paid. But it may be very important if the $1,000,000 obligation represented the price of exercising a right such as an option favorable to Originator and unfavorable to Beneficiary. Beneficiary might well argue that it was entitled to receive $1,000,000. If the option was exercised shortly before its expiration date, the result could be loss of the option benefit because the required payment of $1,000,000 was not made before the option expired. Section 4A-406(c) [30-4A-406(3)] allows Originator to preserve the option benefit. The amount received by Beneficiary is deemed to be $1,000,000 unless Beneficiary demands the $10 and Originator does not pay it.

30-4A-303. Erroneous execution of payment order.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-303, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Section 4A-303 [30-4A-303] states the effect of erroneous execution of a payment order by the receiving bank. Under Section 4A-402(c) [30-4A-402(3)] the sender of a payment order is obliged to pay the amount of the order to the receiving bank if the bank executes the order, but the obligation to pay is excused if the beneficiary's bank does not accept a payment order instructing payment to the beneficiary of the sender's order. If erroneous execution of the sender's order causes the wrong beneficiary to be paid, the sender is not required to pay. If erroneous execution causes the wrong amount to be paid the sender is not obliged to pay the receiving bank an amount in excess of the amount of the sender's order. Section 4A-303 [30-4A-303] takes precedence over Section 4A-402(c) [30-4A-402(3)] and states the liability of the sender and the rights of the receiving bank in various cases of erroneous execution.

2. Subsections (a) and (b) [subsection (1) and (2) of this section] deal with cases in which the receiving bank executes by issuing a payment order in the wrong amount. If Originator ordered Originator's Bank to pay $1,000,000 to the account of Beneficiary in Beneficiary's Bank, but Originator's Bank erroneously instructed Beneficiary's Bank to pay $2,000,000 to Beneficiary's account, subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] applies. If Beneficiary's Bank accepts the order of Originator's Bank, Beneficiary's Bank is entitled to receive $2,000,000 from Originator's Bank, but Originator's Bank is entitled to receive only $1,000,000 from Originator. Originator's Bank is entitled to recover the overpayment from Beneficiary to the extent allowed by the law governing mistake and restitution. Originator's Bank would normally have a right to recover the overpayment from Beneficiary, but in unusual cases the law of restitution might allow Beneficiary to keep all or part of the overpayment. For example, if Originator owed $2,000,000 to Beneficiary and Beneficiary received the extra $1,000,000 in good faith in discharge of the debt, Beneficiary may be allowed to keep it. In this case Originator's Bank has paid an obligation of Originator and under the law of restitution, which applies through Section 1-103 [30-1-103], Originator's Bank would be subrogated to Beneficiary's rights against Originator on the obligation paid by Originator's Bank.

If Originator's Bank erroneously executed Originator's order by instructing Beneficiary's Bank to pay less than $1,000,000, subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] applies. If Originator's Bank corrects its error by issuing another payment order to Beneficiary's Bank that results in payment of $1,000,000 to Beneficiary, Originator's Bank is entitled to payment of $1,000,000 from Originator. If the mistake is not corrected, Originator's Bank is entitled to payment from Originator only in the amount of the order issued by Originator's Bank.

3. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] also applies to duplicate payment orders. Assume Originator's Bank properly executes Originator's $1,000,000 payment order and then by mistake issues a second $1,000,000 payment order in execution of Originator's order. If Beneficiary's Bank accepts both orders issued by Originator's Bank, Beneficiary's Bank is entitled to receive $2,000,000 from Originator's Bank but Originator's Bank is entitled to receive only $1,000,000 from Originator. The remedy of Originator's Bank is the same as that of a receiving bank that executes by issuing an order in an amount greater than the sender's order. It may recover the overpayment from Beneficiary to the extent allowed by the law governing mistake and restitution and in a proper case as stated in Comment 2 may have subrogation rights if it is not entitled to recover from Beneficiary.

4. Suppose Originator instructs Originator's Bank to pay $1,000,000 to Account #12345 in Beneficiary's Bank. Originator's Bank erroneously instructs Beneficiary's Bank to pay $1,0000,000 to Account #12346 and Beneficiary's Bank accepted. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] covers this case. Originator is not obliged to pay its payment order, but Originator's Bank is required to pay $1,000,000 to Beneficiary's Bank. The remedy of Originator's Bank is to recover $1,000,000 from the holder of Account #12346 that received payment by mistake. Recovery based on the law of mistake and restitution is described in Comment 2.

This section is identical in effect to Section 4A-204 [30-4A-204] which applies to unauthorized orders issued in the name of a customer of the receiving bank. The rationale is stated in Comment 2 to Section 4A-204 [30-4A-204].

30-4A-305. Liability for late or improper execution or failure to execute payment order.

Official Comment

Official Comment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] covers cases of delay in completion of a funds transfer resulting from an execution by a receiving bank in breach of Section 4A-302(a) [30-4A-302(1)]. The receiving bank is obliged to pay interest on the amount of the order for the period of the delay. The rate of interest is stated in Section 4A-506 [30-4A-506]. With respect to wire transfers (other than ACH transactions) within the United States, the expectation is that the funds transfer will be completed the same day. In those cases, the originator can reasonably expect that the originator's account will be debited on the same day as the beneficiary's account is credited. If the funds transfer is delayed, compensation can be paid either to the originator or to the beneficiary. The normal practice is to compensate the beneficiary's bank to allow that bank to compensate the beneficiary by back-valuing the payment by the number of days of delay. Thus, the beneficiary is in the same position that it would have been in if the funds transfer had been completed on the same day. Assume on Day 1, Originator's Bank issues its payment order to Intermediary Bank which is received on that day. Intermediary Bank does not execute that order until Day 2 when it issues an order to Beneficiary's Bank which is accepted on that day. Intermediary Bank complies with subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] by paying one day's interest to Beneficiary's Bank for the account of Beneficiary.

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] applies to cases of breach of Section 4A-302 [30-4A-302] involving more than mere delay. In those cases the bank is liable for damages for improper execution but they are limited to compensation for interest losses and incidental expenses of the sender resulting from the breach, the expenses of the sender in the funds transfer and attorney's fees. This subsection reflects the judgment that imposition of consequential damages on a bank for commission of an error is not justified.

The leading common law case on the subject of consequential damages is Evra Corp. v. Swiss Bank Corp., 673 F.2d 951 (7th Cir. 1982), in which Swiss Bank, an intermediary bank, failed to execute a payment order. Because the beneficiary did not receive timely payment the originator lost a valuable ship charter. The lower court awarded the originator $2.1 million for lost profits even though the amount of the payment order was only $27,000. The Seventh Circuit reversed, in part on the basis of the common law rule of Hadley v. Baxendale that consequential damages may not be awarded unless the defendant is put on notice of the special circumstances giving rise to them. Swiss Bank may have known that the originator was paying the shipowner for the hire of a vessel but did not know that a favorable charter would be lost if the payment was delayed. "Electronic payments are not so unusual as to automatically place a bank on notice of extraordinary consequences if such a transfer goes awry. Swiss Bank did not have enough information to infer that if it lost a $27,000 payment order it would face liability in excess of $2 million." 673 F.2d at 956.

If Evra means that consequential damages can be imposed if the culpable bank has notice of particular circumstances giving rise to the damages, it does not provide an acceptable solution to the problem of bank liability for consequential damages. In the typical case transmission of the payment order is made electronically. Personnel of the receiving bank that process payment orders are not the appropriate people to evaluate the risk of liability for consequential damages in relation to the price charged for the wire transfer service. Even if notice is received by higher level management personnel who could make an appropriate decision whether the risk is justified by the price, liability based on notice would require evaluation of payment orders on an individual basis. This kind of evaluation is inconsistent with the high-speed, low-price, mechanical nature of the processing system that characterizes wire transfers. Moreover, in Evra the culpable bank was an intermediary bank with which the originator did not deal. Notice to the originator's bank would not bind the intermediary bank, and it seems impractical for the originator's bank to convey notice of this kind to intermediary banks in the funds transfer. The success of the wholesale wire transfer industry has largely been based on its ability to effect payment at low cost and great speed. Both of these essential aspects of the modern wire transfer system would be adversely affected by a rule that imposed on banks liability for consequential damages. A banking industry amicus brief in Evra stated: "Whether banks can continue to make EFT services available on a widespread basis, by charging reasonable rates, depends on whether they can do so without incurring unlimited consequential risks. Certainly, no bank would handle for $3.25 a transaction entailing potential liability in the millions of dollars."

As the court in Evra also noted, the originator of the funds transfer is in the best position to evaluate the risk that a funds transfer will not be made on time and to manage that risk by issuing a payment order in time to allow monitoring of the transaction. The originator, by asking the beneficiary, can quickly determine if the funds transfer has been completed. If the originator has sent the payment order at a time that allows a reasonable margin for correcting error, no loss is likely to result if the transaction is monitored. The other published cases on this issue reach the Evra result. Central Coordinates, Inc. v. Morgan Guaranty Trust Co., 40 U.C.C. Rep. Serv. 1340 (N.Y.Sup.Ct. 1985), and Gatoil (U.S.A.), Inc. v. Forest Hill State Bank, 1 U.C.C. Rep. Serv. 2d 171 (D.Md. 1986).

Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] allows the measure of damages in subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] to be increased by an express written agreement of the receiving bank. An originator's bank might be willing to assume additional responsibilities and incur additional liability in exchange for a higher fee.

3. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] governs cases in which a receiving bank has obligated itself by express agreement to accept payment orders of a sender. In the absence of such an agreement there is no obligation by a receiving bank to accept a payment order. Section 4A-212 [30-4A-212]. The measure of damages for breach of an agreement to accept a payment order is the same as that stated in subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section]. As in the case of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section], additional damages, including consequential damages, may be recovered to the extent stated in an express written agreement of the receiving bank.

4. Reasonable attorney's fees are recoverable only in cases in which damages are limited to statutory damages stated in subsections (a), (b) and (d) [subsections (1), (2), and (4) of this section]. If additional damages are recoverable because provided for by an express written agreement, attorney's fees are not recoverable. The rationale is that there is no need for statutory attorney's fees in the latter case, because the parties have agreed to a measure of damages which may or may not provide for attorney's fees.

5. The effect of subsection (f) [subsection (6) of this section] is to prevent reduction of a receiving bank's liability under Section 4A-305 [30-4A-305].

30-4A-401. Payment date.

Official Comment

Official Comment:

"Payment date" refers to the day the beneficiary's bank is to pay the beneficiary. The payment date may be expressed in various ways so long as it indicates the day the beneficiary is to receive payment. For example, in ACH transfers the payment date is the equivalent of "settlement date" or "effective date." Payment date applies to the payment order issued to the beneficiary's bank, but a payment order issued to a receiving bank other than the beneficiary's bank may also state a date for payment to the beneficiary. In the latter case, the statement of a payment date is to instruct the receiving bank concerning time of execution of the sender's order. Section 4A-301(b) [30-4A-301(2)].

30-4A-402. Obligation of sender to pay receiving bank.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-402, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] states that the sender of a payment order to the beneficiary's bank must pay the order when the beneficiary's bank accepts the order. At that point the beneficiary's bank is obliged to pay the beneficiary. Section 4A-404(a) [30-4A-404(1)]. The last clause of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] covers a case of premature acceptance by the beneficiary's bank. In some funds transfers, notably automated clearing house transfers, a beneficiary's bank may receive a payment order with a payment date after the day the order is received. The beneficiary's bank might accept the order before the payment date by notifying the beneficiary of receipt of the order. Although the acceptance obliges the beneficiary's bank to pay the beneficiary, payment is not due until the payment date. The last clause of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is consistent with that result. The beneficiary's bank is also not entitled to payment from the sender until the payment date.

2. Assume that Originator instructs Bank A to order immediate payment to the account of Beneficiary in Bank B. Execution of Originator's payment order by Bank A is acceptance under Section 4A-209(a) [30-4A-209(1)]. Under the second sentence of Section 4A-402(c) [30-4A-402(3)] the acceptance creates an obligation of Originator to pay Bank A the amount of the order. The last clause of that sentence deals with attempted funds transfers that are not completed. In that event the obligation of the sender to pay its payment order is excused. Originator makes payment to Beneficiary when Bank B, the beneficiary's bank, accepts a payment order for the benefit of Beneficiary. Section 4A-406(a) [30-4A-406(1)]. If that acceptance by Bank B does not occur, the funds transfer has miscarried because Originator has not paid Beneficiary. Originator doesn't have to pay its payment order, and if it has already paid it is entitled to refund of the payment with interest. The rate of interest is stated in Section 4A-506 [30-4A-506]. This "money-back guarantee" is an important protection of Originator. Originator is assured that it will not lose its money if something goes wrong in the transfer. For example, risk of loss resulting from payment to the wrong beneficiary is borne by some bank, not by Originator. The most likely reason for noncompletion is a failure to execute or an erroneous execution of a payment order by Bank A or an intermediary bank. Bank A may have issued its payment order to the wrong bank or it may have identified the wrong beneficiary in its order. The money-back guarantee is particularly important to Originator if noncompletion of the funds transfer is due to the fault of an intermediary bank rather than Bank A. In that case Bank A must refund payment to Originator, and Bank A has the burden of obtaining refund from the intermediary bank that it paid.

Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] can result in loss if an intermediary bank suspends payments. Suppose Originator instructs Bank A to pay to Beneficiary's account in Bank B and to use Bank C as an intermediary bank. Bank A executes Originator's order by issuing a payment order to Bank C. Bank A pays Bank C. Bank C fails to execute the order of Bank A and suspends payments. Under subsections (c) and (d) [subsections (3) and (4) of this section], Originator is not obliged to pay Bank A and is entitled to refund from Bank A of any payment that it may have made. Bank A is entitled to a refund from Bank C, but Bank C is insolvent. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] deals with this case. Bank A was required to issue its payment order to Bank C because Bank C was designated as an intermediary bank by Originator. Section 4A-302(a)(1) [30-4A-302(1)(a)]. In this case Originator takes the risk of insolvency of Bank C. Under subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section], Bank A is entitled to payment from Originator and Originator is subrogated to the right of Bank A under subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] to refund of payment from Bank C.

3. A payment order is not like a negotiable instrument on which the drawer or maker has liability. Acceptance of the order by the receiving bank creates an obligation of the sender to pay the receiving bank the amount of the order. That is the extent of the sender's liability to the receiving bank and no other person has any rights against the sender with respect to the sender's order.

30-4A-403. Payment by sender to receiving bank.

Official Comment:

1. This section defines when a sender pays the obligation stated in Section 4A-402 [30-4A-402]. If a group of two or more banks engage in funds transfers with each other, the participating banks will sometimes be senders and sometimes receiving banks. With respect to payment orders other than Fedwires, the amounts of the various payment orders may be credited and debited to accounts of one bank with another or to a clearing house account of each bank and amounts owed and amounts due are netted. Settlement is made through a Federal Reserve Bank by charges to the Federal Reserve accounts of the net debtor banks and credits to the Federal Reserve accounts of the net creditor banks. In the case of Fedwires the sender's obligation is settled by a debit to the Federal Reserve account of the sender and a credit to the Federal Reserve account of the receiving bank at the time the receiving bank receives the payment order. Both of these cases are covered by subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section]. When the Federal Reserve settlement becomes final the obligation of the sender under Section 4A-402 [30-4A-402] is paid.

2. In some cases a bank does not settle an obligation owed to another bank through a Federal Reserve Bank. This is the case if one of the banks is a foreign bank without access to the Federal Reserve payment system. In this kind of case, payment is usually made by credits or debits to accounts of the two banks with each other or to accounts of the two banks in a third bank. Suppose Bank B has an account in Bank A. Bank A advises Bank B that its account in Bank A has been credited $1,000,000 and that the credit is immediately withdrawable. Bank A also instructs Bank B to pay $1,000,000 to the account of Beneficiary in Bank B. This case is covered by subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b) of this section]. Bank B may want to immediately withdraw this credit. For example, it might do so by instructing Bank A to debit the account and pay some third party. Payment by Bank A to Bank B of Bank A's payment order occurs when the withdrawal is made. Suppose Bank B does not withdraw the credit. Since Bank B is the beneficiary's bank, one of the effects of receipt of payment by Bank B is that acceptance of Bank A's payment order automatically occurs at the time of payment. Section 4A-209(b)(2) [30-4A-209(2)(b)]. Acceptance means that Bank B is obliged to pay $1,000,000 to Beneficiary. Section 4A-404(a) [30-4A-404(1)]. Subsection (a)(2) of Section 4A-403 [30-4A-403(1)(b)] states that payment does not occur until midnight if the credit is not withdrawn. This allows Bank B an opportunity to reject the order if it does not have time to withdraw the credit to its account and it is not willing to incur the liability to Beneficiary before it has use of the funds represented by the credit.

3. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c) of this section] applies to a case in which the sender (bank or nonbank) has a funded account in the receiving bank. If Sender has an account in Bank and issues a payment order to Bank, Bank can obtain payment from Sender by debiting the account of Sender, which pays its Section 4A-402 [30-4A-402] obligation to Bank when the debit is made.

4. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] deals with multilateral settlements made through a funds transfer system and is based on the CHIPS settlement system. In a funds transfer system such as CHIPS, which allows the various banks that transmit payment orders over the system to settle obligations at the end of each day, settlement is not based on individual payment orders. Each bank using the system engages in funds transfers with many other banks using the system. Settlement for any participant is based on the net credit or debit position of that participant with all other banks using the system. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is designed to make clear that the obligations of any sender are paid when the net position of that sender is settled in accordance with the rules of the funds transfer system. This provision is intended to invalidate any argument, based on common-law principles, that multilateral netting is not valid because mutuality of obligation is not present. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] dispenses with any mutuality of obligation requirements. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] applies to cases in which two banks send payment orders to each other during the day and settle with each other at the end of the day or at the end of some other period. It is similar to subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] in that it recognizes that a sender's obligation to pay a payment order is satisfied by a setoff. The obligations of each bank as sender to the other as receiving bank are obligations of the bank itself and not as representative of customers. These two sections are important in the case of insolvency of a bank. They make clear that liability under Section 4A-402 [30-4A-402] is based on the net position of the insolvent bank after setoff.

5. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] relates to the uncommon case in which the sender doesn't have an account relationship with the receiving bank and doesn't settle through a Federal Reserve Bank. An example would be a customer that pays over the counter for a payment order that the customer issues to the receiving bank. Payment would normally be by cash, check or bank obligation. When payment occurs is determined by law outside Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A].

30-4A-404. Obligation of beneficiary's bank to pay and give notice to beneficiary.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-404, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. The first sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states the time when the obligation of the beneficiary's bank arises. The second and third sentences state when the beneficiary's bank must make funds available to the beneficiary. They also state the measure of damages for failure, after demand, to comply. Since the Expedited Funds Availability Act, 12 U.S.C. 4001 et seq., also governs funds availability in a funds transfer, the second and third sentences of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] may be subject to preemption by that Act.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] provides that the beneficiary of an accepted payment order may recover consequential damages if the beneficiary's bank refuses to pay the order after demand by the beneficiary if the bank at that time had notice of the particular circumstances giving rise to the damages. Such damages are recoverable only to the extent the bank had "notice of the damages." The quoted phrase requires that the bank have notice of the general type or nature of the damages that will be suffered as a result of the refusal to pay and their general magnitude. There is no requirement that the bank have notice of the exact or even the approximate amount of the damages, but if the amount of damages is extraordinary the bank is entitled to notice of that fact. For example, in Evra Corp. v. Swiss Bank Corp., 673 F.2d 951 (7th Cir. 1982), failure to complete a funds transfer of only $27,000 required to retain rights to a very favorable ship charter resulted in a claim for more than $2,000,000 of consequential damages. Since it is not reasonably foreseeable that a failure to make a relatively small payment will result in damages of this magnitude, notice is not sufficient if the beneficiary's bank has notice only that the $27,000 is necessary to retain rights on a ship charter. The bank is entitled to notice that an exceptional amount of damages will result as well. For example, there would be adequate notice if the bank had been made aware that damages of $1,000,000 or more might result.

3. Under the last clause of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] the beneficiary's bank is not liable for damages if its refusal to pay was "because of a reasonable doubt concerning the right of the beneficiary to payment." Normally there will not be any question about the right of the beneficiary to receive payment. Normally, the bank should be able to determine whether it has accepted the payment order and, if it has been accepted, the first sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states that the bank is obliged to pay. There may be uncommon cases, however, in which there is doubt whether acceptance occurred. For example, if acceptance is based on receipt of payment by the beneficiary's bank under Section 4A-403 (a)(1) or (2) [30-4A-403(1)(a) or (1)(b)], there may be cases in which the bank is not certain that payment has been received. There may also be cases in which there is doubt about whether the person demanding payment is the person identified in the payment order as beneficiary of the order.

The last clause of subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] does not apply to cases in which a funds transfer is being used to pay an obligation and a dispute arises between the originator and the beneficiary concerning whether the obligation is in fact owed. For example, the originator may try to prevent payment to the beneficiary by the beneficiary's bank by alleging that the beneficiary is not entitled to payment because of fraud against the originator or a breach of contract relating to the obligation. The fraud or breach of contract claim of the originator may be grounds for recovery by the originator from the beneficiary after the beneficiary is paid, but it does not affect the obligation of the beneficiary's bank to pay the beneficiary. Unless the payment order has been cancelled pursuant to Section 4A-211(c) [30-4A-211(3)], there is no excuse for refusing to pay the beneficiary and, in a proper case, the refusal may result in consequential damages. Except in the case of a book transfer, in which the beneficiary's bank is also the originator's bank, the originator of a funds transfer cannot cancel a payment order to the beneficiary's bank, with or without the consent of that bank, because the originator is not the sender of that order. Thus, the beneficiary's bank may safely ignore any instruction by the originator to withhold payment to the beneficiary.

4. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] states the duty of the beneficiary's bank to notify the beneficiary of receipt of the order. If acceptance occurs under Section 4A-209(b)(1) [30-4A-209(2)(a)] the beneficiary is normally notified. Thus, subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] applies primarily to cases in which acceptance occurs under Section 4A-209(b)(2) or (3) [30-4A-209(2)(b) or (2)(c). Notice under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is not required if the person entitled to the notice agrees or a funds transfer system rule provides that notice is not required and the beneficiary is given notice of the rule. In ACH transactions the normal practice is not to give notice to the beneficiary unless notice is requested by the beneficiary. This practice can be continued by adoption of a funds transfer system rule. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] is not subject to variation by agreement or by a funds transfer system rule.

30-4A-405. Payment by beneficiary's bank to beneficiary.

Official Comment

Official Comment:

1. This section defines when the beneficiary's bank pays the beneficiary and when the obligation of the beneficiary's bank under Section 4A-404 [30-4A-404] to pay the beneficiary is satisfied. In almost all cases the bank will credit an account of the beneficiary when it receives a payment order. In the typical case the beneficiary is paid when the beneficiary is given notice of the right to withdraw the credit. Subsection (a)(i) [subsection (1)(a) of this section]. In some cases payment might be made to the beneficiary not by releasing funds to the beneficiary, but by applying the credit to a debt of the beneficiary. Subsection (a)(ii) [subsection (1)(b) of this section]. In this case the beneficiary gets the benefit of the payment order because a debt of the beneficiary has been satisfied. The two principal cases in which payment will occur in this manner are setoff [sic] by the beneficiary's bank and payment of the proceeds of the payment order to a garnishing creditor of the beneficiary. These cases are discussed in Comment 2 to Section 4A-502 [30-4A-502].

2. If a beneficiary's bank releases funds to the beneficiary before it receives payment from the sender of the payment order, it assumes the risk that the sender may not pay the sender's order because of suspension of payments or other reason. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section]. As stated in Comment 5 to Section 4A-209 [30-4A-209], the beneficiary's bank can protect itself against this risk by delaying acceptance. But if the bank accepts the order it is obliged to pay the beneficiary. If the beneficiary's bank has given the beneficiary notice of the right to withdraw a credit made to the beneficiary's account, the beneficiary has received payment from the bank. Once payment has been made to the beneficiary with respect to an obligation incurred by the bank under Section 4A-404(a) [30-4A-404(1)], the payment cannot be recovered by the beneficiary's bank unless subsection (d) or (e) [subsection (4) or (5) of this section] applies. Thus, a right to withdraw a credit cannot be revoked if the right to withdraw constituted payment of the bank's obligation. This principle applies even if funds were released as a "loan" (see Comment 5 to Section 4A-209 [30-4A-209]), or were released subject to a condition that they would be repaid in the event the bank does not receive payment from the sender of the payment order, or the beneficiary agreed to return the payment if the bank did not receive payment from the sender.

3. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] is subject to an exception stated in subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] which is intended to apply to automated clearing house transfers. ACH transfers are made in batches. A beneficiary's bank will normally accept, at the same time and as part of a single batch, payment orders with respect to many different originator's banks. Comment 2 to Section 4A-206 [30-4A-206]. The custom in ACH transactions is to release funds to the beneficiary early on the payment date even though settlement to the beneficiary's bank does not occur until later in the day. The understanding is that payments to beneficiaries are provisional until the beneficiary's bank receives settlement. This practice is similar to what happens when a depositary bank releases funds with respect to a check forwarded for collection. If the check is dishonored the bank is entitled to recover the funds from the customer. ACH transfers are widely perceived as check substitutes. Section 4A-405(d) [30-4A-405(4)] allows the funds transfer system to adopt a rule making payments to beneficiaries provisional. If such a rule is adopted, a beneficiary's bank that releases funds to the beneficiary will be able to recover the payment if it doesn't receive payment of the payment order that it accepted. There are two requirements with respect to the funds transfer system rule. The beneficiary, the beneficiary's bank and the originator's bank must all agree to be bound by the rule and the rule must require that both the beneficiary and the originator be given notice of the provisional nature of the payment before the funds transfer is initiated. There is no requirement that the notice be given with respect to a particular funds transfer. Once notice of the provisional nature of the payment has been given, the notice is effective for all subsequent payments to or from the person to whom the notice was given. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] provides only that the funds transfer system rule must require notice to the beneficiary and the originator. The beneficiary's bank will know what the rule requires, but it has no way of knowing whether the originator's bank complied with the rule. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] does not require proof that the originator received notice. If the originator's bank failed to give the required notice and the originator suffered as a result, the appropriate remedy is an action by the originator against the originator's bank based on that failure. But the beneficiary's bank will not be able to get the benefit of subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] unless the beneficiary had notice of the provisional nature of the payment because subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] requires an agreement by the beneficiary to be bound by the rule. Implicit in an agreement to be bound by a rule that makes a payment provisional is a requirement that notice be given of what the rule provides. The notice can be part of the agreement or separately given. For example, notice can be given by providing a copy of the system's operating rules.

With respect to ACH transfers made through a Federal Reserve Bank acting as an intermediary bank, the Federal Reserve Bank is obliged under Section 4A-402(b) [30-4A-402(2)] to pay a beneficiary's bank that accepts the payment order. Unlike Fedwire transfers, under current ACH practice a Federal Reserve Bank that processes a payment order does not obligate itself to pay if the originator's bank fails to pay the Federal Reserve Bank. It is assumed that the Federal Reserve will use its right of preemption which is recognized in Section 4A-107 [30-4A-107] to disclaim the Section 4A-402(b) [30-4A-402(2)] obligation in ACH transactions if it decides to retain the provisional payment rule.

4. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] is another exception to subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section]. It refers to funds transfer systems having loss-sharing rules described in the subsection. CHIPS has proposed a rule that fits the description. Under the CHIPS loss-sharing rule the CHIPS banks will have agreed to contribute funds to allow the system to settle for payment orders sent over the system during the day in the event that one or more banks are unable to meet their settlement obligations. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] applies only if CHIPS fails to settle despite the loss-sharing rule. Since funds under the loss-sharing rule will be instantly available to CHIPS and will be in an amount sufficient to cover any failure that can be reasonably anticipated, it is extremely unlikely that CHIPS would ever fail to settle. Thus, subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] addresses an event that should never occur. If that event were to occur, all payment orders made over the system would be cancelled under the CHIPS rule. Thus, no bank would receive settlement, whether or not a failed bank was involved in a particular funds transfer. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] provides that each funds transfer in which there is a payment order with respect to which there is a settlement failure is unwound. Acceptance by the beneficiary's bank in each funds transfer is nullified. The consequences of nullification are that the beneficiary has no right to receive or retain payment by the beneficiary's bank, no payment is made by the originator to the beneficiary and each sender in the funds transfer is, subject to Section 4A-402(e) [30-4A-402(5)], not obliged to pay its payment order and is entitled to refund under Section 4A-402(d) [30-4A-402(4)] if it has already paid.

30-4A-406. Payment by originator to beneficiary — discharge of underlying obligation.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-406, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states the fundamental rule of Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] that payment by the originator to the beneficiary is accomplished by providing to the beneficiary the obligation of the beneficiary's bank to pay. Since this obligation arises when the beneficiary's bank accepts a payment order, the originator pays the beneficiary at the time of acceptance and in the amount of the payment order accepted.

2. In a large percentage of funds transfers, the transfer is made to pay an obligation of the originator. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states that the beneficiary is paid by the originator when the beneficiary's bank accepts a payment order for the benefit of the beneficiary. When that happens the effect under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is to substitute the obligation of the beneficiary's bank for the obligation of the originator. The effect is similar to that under Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] if a cashier's check payable to the beneficiary had been taken by the beneficiary. Normally, payment by funds transfer is sought by the beneficiary because it puts money into the hands of the beneficiary more quickly. As a practical matter the beneficiary and the originator will nearly always agree to the funds transfer in advance. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] acceptance by the beneficiary's bank will result in discharge of the obligation for which payment was made unless the beneficiary had made a contract with respect to the obligation which did not permit payment by the means used. Thus, if there is no contract of the beneficiary with respect to the means of payment of the obligation, acceptance by the beneficiary's bank of a payment order to the account of the beneficiary can result in discharge.

3. Suppose Beneficiary's contract stated that payment of an obligation owed by Originator was to be made by a cashier's check of Bank A. Instead, Originator paid by a funds transfer to Beneficiary's account in Bank B. Bank B accepted a payment order for the benefit of Beneficiary by immediately notifying Beneficiary that the funds were available for withdrawal. Before Beneficiary had a reasonable opportunity to withdraw the funds Bank B suspended payments. Under the unless clause of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] Beneficiary is not required to accept the payment as discharging the obligation owed by Originator to Beneficiary if Beneficiary's contract means that Beneficiary was not required to accept payment by wire transfer. Beneficiary could refuse the funds transfer as payment of the obligation and could resort to rights under the underlying contract to enforce the obligation. The rationale is that Originator cannot impose the risk of Bank B's insolvency on Beneficiary if Beneficiary had specified another means of payment that did not entail that risk. If Beneficiary is required to accept Originator's payment, Beneficiary would suffer a loss that would not have occurred if payment had been made by a cashier's check on Bank A, and Bank A has not suspended payments. In this case Originator will have to pay twice. It is obliged to pay the amount of its payment order to the bank that accepted it and has to pay the obligation it owes to Beneficiary which has not been discharged. Under the last sentence of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] Originator is subrogated to Beneficiary's right to receive payment from Bank B under Section 4A-404(a) [30-4A-404(1)].

4. Suppose Beneficiary's contract called for payment by a Fedwire transfer to Bank B, but the payment order accepted by Bank B was not a Fedwire transfer. Before the funds were withdrawn by Beneficiary, Bank B suspended payments. The sender of the payment order to Bank B paid the amount of the order to Bank B. In this case the payment by Originator did not comply with Beneficiary's contract, but the noncompliance did not result in a loss to Beneficiary as required by subsection (b)(iv) [subsection (2)(a)(iv) of this section]. A Fedwire transfer avoids the risk of insolvency of the sender of the payment order to Bank B, but it does not affect the risk that Bank B will suspend payments before withdrawal of the funds by Beneficiary. Thus, the unless clause of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is not applicable and the obligation owed to Beneficiary is discharged.

5. Charges of receiving banks in a funds transfer normally are nominal in relationship to the amount being paid by the originator to the beneficiary. Wire transfers are normally agreed to in advance and the parties may agree concerning how these charges are to be divided between the parties. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] states a rule that applies in the absence of agreement. In some funds transfers charges of banks that execute payment orders are collected by deducting the charges from the amount of the payment order issued by the bank, i.e. the bank issues a payment order that is slightly less than the amount of the payment order that is being executed. The process is described in Comment 3 to Section 4A-302 [30-4A-302]. The result in such a case is that the payment order accepted by the beneficiary's bank will be slightly less than the amount of the originator's order. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] recognizes the principle that a beneficiary is entitled to full payment of a debt paid by wire transfer as a condition to discharge. On the other hand, subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] prevents a beneficiary from denying the originator the benefit of the payment by asserting that discharge did not occur because deduction of bank charges resulted in less than full payment. The typical case is one in which the payment is made to exercise a valuable right such as an option which is unfavorable to the beneficiary. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] allows discharge notwithstanding the deduction unless the originator fails to reimburse the beneficiary for the deducted charges after demand by the beneficiary.

Part 5
Miscellaneous Provisions

30-4A-501. Variation by agreement and effect of funds-transfer system rule.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-501, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section is designed to give some flexibility to Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A]. Funds transfer system rules govern rights and obligations between banks that use the system. They may cover a wide variety of matters such as form and content of payment orders, security procedures, cancellation rights and procedures, indemnity rights, compensation rules for delays in completion of a funds transfer, time and method of settlement, credit restrictions with respect to senders of payment orders and risk allocation with respect to suspension of payments by a participating bank. Funds transfer system rules can be very effective in supplementing the provisions of Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] and in filling gaps that may be present in Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A]. To the extent they do not conflict with Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] there is no problem with respect to their effectiveness. In that case they merely supplement Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A]. Section 4A-501 [30-4A-501] goes further. It states that unless the contrary is stated, funds transfer system rules can override provisions of Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A]. Thus, rights and obligations of a sender bank and a receiving bank with respect to each other can be different from that stated in Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] to the extent a funds transfer system rule applies. Since funds transfer system rules are defined as those governing the relationship between participating banks, a rule can have a direct effect only on participating banks. But a rule that affects the conduct of a participating bank may indirectly affect the rights of nonparticipants such as the originator or beneficiary of a funds transfer, and such a rule can be effective even though it may affect nonparticipants without their consent. For example, a rule might prevent execution of a payment order or might allow cancellation of a payment order with the result that a funds transfer is not completed or is delayed. But a rule purporting to define rights and obligations of nonparticipants in the system would not be effective to alter Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] rights because the rule is not within the definition of funds transfer system rule. Rights and obligations arising under Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] may also be varied by agreement of the affected parties, except to the extent Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] otherwise provides. Rights and obligations arising under Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] can also be changed by Federal Reserve regulations and operating circulars of Federal Reserve Banks. Section 4A-107 [30-4A-107].

2. Subsection (b)(ii) [subsection (2)(a)(ii) of this section] refers to ACH transfers. Whether an ACH transfer is made through an automated clearing house of a Federal Reserve Bank or through an automated clearing house of another association of banks, the rights and obligations of the originator's bank and the beneficiary's bank are governed by uniform rules adopted by various associations of banks in various parts of the nation. With respect to transfers in which a Federal Reserve Bank acts as intermediary bank these rules may be incorporated, in whole or in part, in operating circulars of the Federal Reserve Bank. Even if not so incorporated these rules can still be binding on the association banks. If a transfer is made through a Federal Reserve Bank, the rules are effective under subsection (b)(ii) [subsection (2)(a)(ii) of this section]. If the transfer is not made through a Federal Reserve Bank, the association rules are effective under subsection (b)(i) [subsection (2)(a)(i) of this section].

30-4A-502. Creditor process served on receiving bank — setoff by beneficiary's bank.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-502, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. When a receiving bank accepts a payment order, the bank normally receives payment from the sender by debiting an authorized account of the sender. In accepting the sender's order the bank may be relying on a credit balance in the account. If creditor process is served on the bank with respect to the account before the bank accepts the order but the bank employee responsible for the acceptance was not aware of the creditor process at the time the acceptance occurred, it is unjust to the bank to allow the creditor process to take the credit balance on which the bank may have relied. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] allows the bank to obtain payment from the sender's account in this case. Under that provision, the balance in the sender's account to which the creditor process applies is deemed to be reduced by the amount of the payment order unless there was sufficient time for notice of the service of creditor process to be received by personnel of the bank responsible for the acceptance.

2. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] deals with payment orders issued to the beneficiary's bank. The bank may credit the beneficiary's account when the order is received, but under Section 4A-404(a) [30-4A-404(1)] the bank incurs no obligation to pay the beneficiary until the order is accepted pursuant to Section 4A-209(b) [30-4A-209(2)]. Thus, before acceptance, the credit to the beneficiary's account is provisional. But under Section 4A-209(b) [30-4A-209(2)] acceptance occurs if the beneficiary's bank pays the beneficiary pursuant to Section 4A-405(a) [30-4A-405(1)]. Under that provision, payment occurs if the credit to the beneficiary's account is applied to a debt of the beneficiary. Subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a) of this section] allows the bank to credit the beneficiary's account with respect to a payment order and to accept the order by setting off the credit against an obligation owed to the bank or applying the credit to creditor process with respect to the account.

Suppose a beneficiary's bank receives a payment order for the benefit of a customer. Before the bank accepts the order, the bank learns that creditor process has been served on the bank with respect to the customer's account. Normally there is no reason for a beneficiary's bank to reject a payment order, but if the beneficiary's account is garnished, the bank may be faced with a difficult choice. If it rejects the order, the garnishing creditor's potential recovery of funds of the beneficiary is frustrated. It may be faced with a claim by the creditor that the rejection was a wrong to the creditor. If the bank accepts the order, the effect is to allow the creditor to seize funds of its customer, the beneficiary. Subsection (c)(3) [subsection (3)(c) of this section] gives the bank no choice in this case. It provides that it may not favor its customer over the creditor by rejecting the order. The beneficiary's bank may rightfully reject only if there is an independent basis for rejection.

3. Subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b) of this section] is similar to subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section]. Normally the beneficiary's bank will release funds to the beneficiary shortly after acceptance or it will accept by releasing funds. Since the bank is bound by a garnishment order served before funds are released to the beneficiary, the bank might suffer a loss if funds were released without knowledge that a garnishment order had been served. Subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b) of this section] protects the bank if it did not have adequate notice of the garnishment when the funds were released.

4. A creditor may want to reach funds involved in a funds transfer. The creditor may try to do so by serving process on the originator's bank, an intermediary bank or the beneficiary's bank. The purpose of subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] is to guide the creditor and the court as to the proper method of reaching the funds involved in a funds transfer. A creditor of the originator can levy on the account of the originator in the originator's bank before the funds transfer is initiated, but that levy is subject to the limitations stated in subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section]. The creditor of the originator cannot reach any other funds because no property of the originator is being transferred. A creditor of the beneficiary cannot levy on property of the originator and until the funds transfer is completed by acceptance by the beneficiary's bank of a payment order for the benefit of the beneficiary, the beneficiary has no property interest in the funds transfer which the beneficiary's creditor can reach. A creditor of the beneficiary that wants to reach the funds to be received by the beneficiary must serve creditor process on the beneficiary's bank to reach the obligation of the beneficiary's bank to pay the beneficiary which arises upon acceptance by the beneficiary's bank under Section 4A-404(a) [30-4A-404(1)].

5. "Creditor process" is defined in subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] to cover a variety of devices by which a creditor of the holder of a bank account or a claimant to a bank account can seize the account. Procedure and nomenclature varies widely from state to state. The term used in Section 4A-502 [30-4A-502] is a generic term.

30-4A-503. Injunction or restraining order with respect to funds transfer.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-503, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

This section is related to Section 4A-502(d) [30-4A-502(4)] and to Comment 4 to Section 4A-502 [30-4A-502]. It is designed to prevent interruption of a funds transfer after it has been set in motion. The initiation of a funds transfer can be prevented by enjoining the originator or the originator's bank from issuing a payment order. After the funds transfer is completed by acceptance of a payment order by the beneficiary's bank, that bank can be enjoined from releasing funds to the beneficiary or the beneficiary can be enjoined from withdrawing the funds. No other injunction is permitted. In particular, intermediary banks are protected, and injunctions against the originator and the originator's bank are limited to issuance of a payment order. Except for the beneficiary's bank, nobody can be enjoined from paying a payment order, and no receiving bank can be enjoined from receiving payment from the sender of the order that it accepted.

30-4A-504. Order in which items and payment orders may be charged to account — order of withdrawals from account.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-504, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] concerns priority among various obligations that are to be paid from the same account. A customer may have written checks on its account with the receiving bank and may have issued one or more payment orders payable from the same account. If the account balance is not sufficient to cover all of the checks and payment orders, some checks may be dishonored and some payment orders may not be accepted. Although there is no concept of wrongful dishonor of a payment order in Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] in the absence of an agreement to honor by the receiving bank, some rights and obligations may depend on the amount in the customer's account. Section 4A-209(b)(3) [30-4A-209(2)(c)] and Section 4A-210(b) [30-4A-210(2)]. Whether dishonor of a check is wrongful also may depend upon the balance in the customer's account. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section], the bank is not required to consider the competing items and payment orders in any particular order. Rather it may charge the customer's account for the various items and orders in any order. Suppose there is $12,000 in the customer's account. If a check for $5,000 is presented for payment and the bank receives a $10,000 payment order from the customer, the bank could dishonor the check and accept the payment order. Dishonor of the check is not wrongful because the account balance was less than the amount of the check after the bank charged the account $10,000 on account of the payment order. Or, the bank could pay the check and not execute the payment order because the amount of the order is not covered by the balance in the account.

30-4A-505. Preclusion of objection to debit of customer's account.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-505, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

This section is in the nature of a statute of repose for objecting to debits made to the customer's account. A receiving bank that executes payment orders of a customer may have received payment from the customer by debiting the customer's account with respect to a payment order that the customer was not required to pay. For example, the payment order may not have been authorized or verified pursuant to Section 4A-202 [30-4A-202] or the funds transfer may not have been completed. In either case the receiving bank is obliged to refund the payment to the customer and this obligation to refund payment cannot be varied by agreement. Section 4A-204 [30-4A-204] and Section 4A-402 [30-4A-402]. Refund may also be required if the receiving bank is not entitled to payment from the customer because the bank erroneously executed a payment order. Section 4A-303 [30-4A-303]. A similar analysis applies to that case. Section 4A-402(d) and (f) [30-4A-402(4) and (6)] require refund and the obligation to refund may not be varied by agreement. Under 4A-505 [30-4A-505], however, the obligation to refund may not be asserted by the customer if the customer has not objected to the debiting of the account within one year after the customer received notification of the debit.

30-4A-506. Rate of interest.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-506, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. A receiving bank is required to pay interest on the amount of a payment order received by the bank in a number of situations. Sometimes the interest is payable to the sender and in other cases it is payable to either the originator or the beneficiary of the funds transfer. The relevant provisions are Section 4A-204(a) [30-4A-204(1)], Section 4A-209(b)(3) [30-4A-209(2)(c)], Section 4A-210(b) [30-4A-210(2)], Section 4A-305(a) [30-4A-305(1)], Section 4A-402(d) [30-4A-402(4)] and Section 4A-404(b) [30-4A-404(2)]. The rate of interest may be governed by a funds transfer system rule or by agreement as stated in subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section]. If subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] doesn't apply, the rate is determined under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is illustrated by the following example. A bank is obliged to pay interest on $1,000,000 for three days, July 3, July 4, and July 5. The published Fed Funds rate is .082 for July 3 and .081 for July 5. There is no published rate for July 4 because that day is not a banking day. The rate for July 3 applies to July 4. The applicable Fed Funds rate is .08167 (the average of .082, .082, and .081) divided by 360 which equals .0002268. The amount of interest payable is $1,000,000 X .0002268 X 3 = $680.40.

2. In some cases, interest is payable in spite of the fact that there is no fault by the receiving bank. The last sentence of subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] applies to those cases. For example, a funds transfer might not be completed because the beneficiary's bank rejected the payment order issued to it by the originator's bank or an intermediary bank. Section 4A-402(c) [30-4A-402(3)] provides that the originator is not obliged to pay its payment order and Section 4A-402(d) [30-4A-402(4)] provides that the originator's bank must refund any payment received plus interest. The requirement to pay interest in this case is not based on fault by the originator's bank. Rather, it is based on restitution. Since the originator's bank had the use of the originator's money, it is required to pay the originator for the value of that use. The value of that use is not determined by multiplying the interest rate by the refundable amount because the originator's bank is required to deposit with the Federal Reserve a percentage of the bank's deposits as a reserve requirement. Since that deposit does not bear interest, the bank had use of the refundable amount reduced by a percentage equal to the reserve requirement. If the reserve requirement is 12%, the amount of interest payable by the bank under the formula stated in subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is reduced by 12%.

30-4A-507. Choice of law.

Official Comment

Source: Section 4A-507, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Funds transfers are typically interstate or international in character. If part of a funds transfer is governed by Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] and another part is governed by other law, the rights and obligations of parties to the funds transfer may be unclear because there is no clear consensus in various jurisdictions concerning the juridical nature of the transaction. Unless all of a funds transfer is governed by a single law it may be very difficult to predict the result if something goes wrong in the transfer. Section 4A-507 [30-4A-507] deals with this problem. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] allows parties to a funds transfer to make a choice-of-law agreement. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] allows a funds transfer system to select the law of a particular jurisdiction to govern funds transfers carried out by means of the system. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] states residual rules if no choice of law has occurred under subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] or subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section].

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1) of this section] deals with three sets of relationships. Rights and obligations between the sender of a payment order and the receiving bank are governed by the law of the jurisdiction in which the receiving bank is located. If the receiving bank is the beneficiary's bank the rights and obligations of the beneficiary are also governed by the law of the jurisdiction in which the receiving bank is located. Suppose Originator, located in Canada, sends a payment order to Originator's Bank located in a state in which Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] has been enacted. The order is for payment to an account of Beneficiary in a bank in England. Under subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a) of this section], the rights and obligations of Originator and Originator's Bank toward each other are governed by Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] if an action is brought in a court in the Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] state. If an action is brought in a Canadian court, the conflict of laws issue will be determined by Canadian law which might or might not apply the law of the state in which Originator's Bank is located. If that law is applied, the execution of Originator's order will be governed by Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A], but with respect to the payment order of Originator's Bank to the English bank, Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] may or may not be applied with respect to the rights and obligations between the two banks. The result may depend upon whether action is brought in a court in the state in which Originator's Bank is located or in an English court. Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] is binding only on a court in a state that enacts it. It can have extraterritorial effect only to the extent courts of another jurisdiction are willing to apply it. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] also bears on the issues discussed in this Comment.

Under Section 4A-406 [30-4A-406] payment by the originator to the beneficiary of the funds transfer occurs when the beneficiary's bank accepts a payment order for the benefit of the beneficiary. A jurisdiction in which Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] is not in effect may follow a different rule or it may not have a clear rule. Under Section 4A-507(a)(3) [30-4A-507(1)(c)] the issue is governed by the law of the jurisdiction in which the beneficiary's bank is located. Since the payment to the beneficiary is made through the beneficiary's bank it is reasonable that the issue of when payment occurs be governed by the law of the jurisdiction in which the bank is located. Since it is difficult in many cases to determine where a beneficiary is located, the location of the beneficiary's bank provides a more certain rule.

3. Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] deals with choice-of-law agreements and it gives maximum freedom of choice. Since the law of funds transfers is not highly developed in the case law there may be a strong incentive to choose the law of a jurisdiction in which Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] is in effect because it provides a greater degree of certainly with respect to the rights of various parties. With respect to commercial transactions, it is often said that "[u]niformity and predictability based upon commercial convenience are the prime considerations in making the choice of governing law . . . ." R. Leflar, American Conflicts Law, §185 (1977). Subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section] is derived in part from recently enacted choice-of-law rules in the States of New York and California. N.Y. Gen. Obligations Law 5-1401 (McKinney's 1989 Supp.) and California Civil Code §1646.5. This broad endorsement of freedom of contract is an enhancement of the approach taken by Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws §187(b) (1971). The Restatement recognizes the basic right of freedom of contract, but the freedom granted the parties may be more limited than the freedom granted here. Under the formulation of the Restatement, if there is no substantial relationship to the jurisdiction whose law is selected and there is no "other" reasonable basis for the parties' choice, then the selection of the parties need not be honored by a court. Further, if the choice is violative of a fundamental policy of a state which has a materially greater interest than the chosen state, the selection could be disregarded by a court. Those limitations are not found in subsection (b) [subsection (2) of this section].

4. Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] may be the most important provision in regard to creating uniformity of law in funds transfers. Most rights stated in Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] regard parties who are in privity of contract such as originator and beneficiary, sender and receiving bank, and beneficiary's bank and beneficiary. Since they are in privity they can make a choice of law by agreement. But that is not always the case. For example, an intermediary bank that improperly executes a payment order is not in privity with either the originator or the beneficiary. The ability of a funds transfer system to make a choice of law by rule is a convenient way of dispensing with individual agreements and to cover cases in which agreements are not feasible. It is probable that funds transfer systems will adopt a governing law to increase the certainty of commercial transactions that are effected over such systems. A system rule might adopt the law of an Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] state to govern transfers on the system in order to provide a consistent, unitary, law governing all transfers made on the system. To the extent such system rules develop, individual choice-of-law agreements become unnecessary.

Subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section] has broad application. A system choice of law applies not only to rights and obligations between banks that use the system, but may also apply to other parties to the funds transfer so long as some part of the transfer was carried out over the system. The originator and any other sender or receiving bank in the funds transfer is bound if at the time it issues or accepts a payment order it had notice that the funds transfer involved use of the system and that the system chose the law of a particular jurisdiction. Under Section 4A-107 [30-4A-107], the Federal Reserve by regulation could make a similar choice of law to govern funds transfers carried out by use of Federal Reserve Banks. Subsection (d) [subsection (4) of this section] is a limitation on subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section]. If parties have made a choice-of-law agreement that conflicts with a choice of law made under subsection (c) [subsection (3) of this section], the agreement prevails.

5. Subsection (e) [subsection (5) of this section] addresses the case in which a funds transfer involves more than one funds transfer system and the systems adopt conflicting choice-of-law rules. The rule that has the most significant relationship to the matter at issue prevails. For example, each system should be able to make a choice of law governing payment orders transmitted over that system with regard to a choice of law made by another system.

CHAPTER 5
UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE
LETTERS OF CREDIT

Chapter Official Comment

Reporter's Prefatory Note to 1997 Revision:

Reason for Revision

When the original Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] was drafted 40 years ago, it was written for paper transactions and before many innovations in letters of credit. Now electronic and other media are used extensively. Since the 50's, standby letters of credit have developed and now nearly $500 billion standby letters of credit are issued annually worldwide, of which $250 billion are issued in the United States. The use of deferred payment letters of credit has also greatly increased. The customs and practices for letters of credit have evolved and are reflected in the Uniform Customs and Practice (UCP), usually incorporated into letters of credit, particularly international letters of credit, which have seen four revisions since the 1950's; the current version became effective in 1994 (UCP 500). Lastly, in a number of areas, court decisions have resulted in conflicting rules.

Prior to the appointment of a drafting committee, the ABA UCC Committee appointed a Task Force composed of knowledgeable practitioners and academics. The ABA Task Force studied the case law, evolving technologies and the changes in customs and practices. The Task Force identified a large number of issues which they discussed at some length, and made recommendations for revisions to Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. The Task Force stated in a foreword:

"As a result of these increases and changes in usage, practice, players, and pressure, it comes as no surprise that there has been a sizable increase in litigation. Indeed, the approximately 62 cases reported in the United States in 1987 constituted double the cumulative reported cases up to 1965 . . . .

Moreover, almost forty years of hard use have revealed weaknesses, gaps and errors in the original statute which compromise its relevance. U.C.C. Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] was one of the few areas of the Uniform Commercial Code which did not benefit from prior codification and it should come as no surprise that it may require some revision . . . .

Measured in terms of these areas which are vital to any system of commercial law, the current combination of statute and case law is found wanting in major respects both as to predictability and certainty. What is at issue here are not matters of sophistry but important issues of substance which have not been resolved by the current case law/code method and which admit of little likelihood of such resolution." (45 Bus. Lawyer 1521, at 1532, 1535-6)

The Drafting Committee began its deliberations with the Task Force Report in hand. The final work of the Drafting Committee varies from many of the suggestions of the Task Force.

Need for Uniformity

Letters of Credit are a major instrument in international trade, as well as domestic transactions. To facilitate its usefulness and competitiveness, it is essential that U.S. law be in harmony with international rules and practices, as well as flexible enough to accommodate changes in technology and practices that have, and are, evolving. Not only should the rules be consistent within the United States, but they need to be substantively and procedurally consistent with international practices.

Thus, the goals of the drafting effort were:

conforming the Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] rules to current customs and practices;

accommodating new forms of Letters of Credit, changes in customs and practices, and evolving technology, particularly the use of electronic media; maintaining Letters of Credit as an inexpensive and efficient instrument facilitating trade; and resolving conflicts among reported decisions.

Process of Achieving Uniformity

The essence of uniform law revision is to obtain a sufficient consensus and balance among the interests of the various participants so that universal and uniform enactment by the various States may be achieved.

In part this is accomplished by extensive consultation on and broad circulation of the drafts from 1990, when the project began, until approval of the final draft by the American law Institute (ALI) and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws (NCCUSL).

Hundreds of groups were invited to participate in the drafting process. Twenty Advisors were appointed, representing a cross-section of interested parties. In addition 20 Observers regularly attended drafting meetings and over 100 were on the mailing list to receive all drafts of the revision.

The Drafting Committee meetings were open and all those who attended were afforded full opportunity to express their views and participate in the dialogue. The Advisors and Observers were a balanced group with ten representatives of users (Beneficiaries and Applicants); five representatives of governmental agencies; five representatives of the U.S. Council on International Banking (USCIB); seven from major banks in letter of credit transactions; eight from regional banks; and seven law professors who teach and write on Letters of Credit.

Nine Drafting Committee meetings were held that began Friday morning and ended Sunday noon. In addition, the draft was twice debated in full by NCCUSL, once by the ALI Council, once considered by the ALI Consultative Group and once by an ad hoc Committee of the Council; and reviewed and discussed by the ABA Subcommittee on Letters of Credit semi-annually and by several state and city bar association committees.

The drafts were regularly reviewed and discussed in The Business Lawyer, Letter of Credit Update, and in other publications.

Balance of Benefits

Uniform laws can be enacted only if there is a consensus that the benefits achieved advance the public interest in a manner that can be embraced by all users of the law. It appears that as drafted, Revised Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] will enjoy substantial support by the participating interests in letter of credit transactions.

Benefits of Revised Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] in General

Independence Principle. Revised Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] clearly and forcefully states the independence of the letter of credit obligations from the underlying transactions that was unexpressed in, but was a fundamental predicate for, the original Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] (Sections 5-103(d) and 5-108(f) [former 30-5-103(4) and 30-5-108(6)]). Certainty of payment, independent of other claims, setoffs or other causes of action, is a core element of the commercial utility of letters of credit.

Clarifications. The revision authorizes the use of electronic technology (Sections 5-102(a)(14) and 5-104 [30-5-122(1)(n) and 30-5-124]); expressly permits deferred payment letters of credit (Section 5-102(a)(8) [30-5-122(1)(h))] and two party letters of credit (Section 5-102(a)(10) [30-5-122(1)(j)]); provides rules for unstated expiry dates (Section 5-106(c) [30-5-126(3)]), perpetual letters of credit (Section 5-106(d) [30-5-126(4)]), and non-documentary conditions (Section 5-108(g) [30-5-128(7)]); clarifies and establishes rules for successors by operation of law (Sections 5-102(a)(15) and 5-113 [30-5-122 (1)(o) and 30-5-133]); conforms to existing practice for assignment of proceeds (Section 5-114 [30-5-134]); and clarifies the rules where decisions have been in conflict (Section 5-106 [30-5-126], Comment 1; Section 5-108 [30-5-128], Comments 1, 3, 4, 7, and 9; Section 5-109 [30-5-129], Comments 1 and 3; Section 5-113 [30-5-133], Comment 1; and Section 5-117 [30-5-137], Comment 1).

Harmonizes with International Practice

The UCP is used in most international letters of credit and in many domestic letters of credit. These international practices are well known and employed by the major issuers and users of letters of credit. Revisions have been made to Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] to coordinate the Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] rules with current international practice (e.g., deferred payment obligations, reasonable time to examine documents, preclusion, non-documentary conditions, return of documents, and irrevocable unless stated to be revocable).

Benefits of Revised Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] to Issuers

Consequential Damages. Section 5-111 [30-5-131] precludes consequential and punitive damages. It, however, provides strong incentives for Issuers to honor, including provisions for attorneys fees and expenses of litigation, interest, and specific performance. If consequential and punitive damages were allowed, the cost of letters of credit could rise substantially.

Statute of Limitation. Section 5-115 [30-5-135] establishes a one year statute of limitation from the expiration date or from accrual of the cause of action, whichever occurs later. Because it is usually obvious to all when there has been a breach, a short limitation period is fair to potential plaintiffs.

Choice of Law. Section 5-116 [30-5-136] permits the issuer (or nominated party or adviser) to choose the law of the jurisdiction that will govern even if that law bears no relation to the transaction. Absent agreement, Section 5-116 [30-5-136] states choice of law rules.

Assignment of Proceeds. Section 5-114 [30-5-134] conforms more fully to existing practice and provides an orderly procedure for recording and accommodating assignments by consent of the issuer (or nominated party).

Subrogation. Section 5-117 [30-5-137] clarifies the subrogation rights of an Issuer who has honored a letter of credit. These rights of subrogation also extend to an applicant who reimburses and a nominated party who pays or gives value.

Recognition of UCP. Section 5-116(c) [30-5-136(3)] expressly recognizes that if the UCP is incorporated by reference into the letter of credit, the agreement varies the provisions of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] with which it may conflict except for the non-variable provisions of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5].

Benefits of Revised Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] to Applicants

Warranties. Section 5-110 [30-5-130] specifies the warranties made by a beneficiary. It gives the applicant on a letter of credit which has been honored a direct cause of action if a drawing is fraudulent or forged or if a drawing violates any agreement augmented by a letter of credit.

Strict Compliance. Absent agreement to the contrary, the issuer must dishonor a presentation that does not strictly comply under standard practice with the terms and conditions of the letter of credit (Section 5-108 [30-5-128]).

Subrogation. New Section 5-117 [30-5-137] clarifies the parties rights of subrogation if the letter of credit is honored.

Limitations on General Disclaimers and Waivers. Section 5-103(c) [30-5-123(3)] limits the effect of general disclaimers and waivers in a letter of credit, or reimbursement or other agreement.

Benefits of Revised Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] to Beneficiaries

Irrevocable. A letter of credit is irrevocable unless the letter of credit expressly provides it is revocable (Section 5-106(a) [30-5-126(1)]).

Preclusion. Section 5-108(c) [30-5-128(3)] now provides that the Issuer is precluded from asserting any discrepancy not stated in its notice timely given, except for fraud, forgery or expiration.

Timely Examination. Section 5-108(b) [30-5-128(2)] requires examination and notice of any discrepancies within a reasonable time not to exceed the 7th business day after presentation of the documents.

Transfers by Operation of Law. New Section 5-113 [30-5-133] allows a successor to a beneficiary by operation of law to make presentation and receive payment or acceptance.

Damages. The damages provided are expanded and clarified. They include attorneys fees and expenses of litigation and payment of the full amount of the wrongfully dishonored or repudiated demand, with interest, without an obligation of the beneficiary to mitigate damages (Section 5-111 [30-5-131]).

Revisions for Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] and Transition Provisions

The draft includes suggested revisions to conform Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] to the Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] changes. Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] itself is under revision and the interface with Revised Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] will be more fully examined by the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] drafting committee, as well, in light of changes to Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. The Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] revisions will probably not be completed until 1998-9. Revised Article 8 (1994) [Title 30, chapter 8] also makes changes to Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] so care should be taken to coordinate the changes of both Revised Articles 5 and 8 [Title 30, chapters 5 and 8] within each State.

The draft also includes transition provisions and some cross reference changes in other Articles of the UCC.

Official Comment

Source: Section 5-101, U.C.C.

Official Comment: The Official Comment to the original Section 5-101 [30-5-101] was a remarkably brief inaugural address. Noting that letters of credit had not been the subject of statutory enactment and that the law concerning them had been developed in the cases, the Comment stated that Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] was intended "within its limited scope" to set an independent theoretical frame for the further development of letters of credit. That statement addressed accurately conditions as they existed when the statement was made, nearly half a century ago. Since Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] was originally drafted, the use of letters of credit has expanded and developed, and the case law concerning these developments is, in some respects, discordant.

Revision of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] therefore has required reappraisal both of the statutory goals and of the extent to which particular statutory provisions further or adversely affect achievement of those goals.

The statutory goal of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] was originally stated to be: (1) to set a substantive theoretical frame that describes the function and legal nature of letters of credit; and (2) to preserve procedural flexibility in order to accommodate further development of the efficient use of letters of credit. A letter of credit is an idiosyncratic form of undertaking that supports performance of an obligation incurred in a separate financial, mercantile, or other transaction or arrangement. The objectives of the original and revised Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] are best achieved (1) by defining the peculiar characteristics of a letter of credit that distinguish it and the legal consequences of its use from other forms of assurance such as secondary guarantees, performance bonds, and insurance policies, and from ordinary contracts, fiduciary engagements, and escrow arrangements; and (2) by preserving flexibility through variation by agreement in order to respond to and accommodate developments in custom and usage that are not inconsistent with the essential definitions and substantive mandates of the statute. No statute can, however, prescribe the manner in which such substantive rights and duties are to be enforced or imposed without risking stultification of wholesome developments in the letter of credit mechanism. Letter of credit law should remain responsive to commercial reality and in particular to the customs and expectations of the international banking and mercantile community. Courts should read the terms of this article [chapter] in a manner consistent with these customs and expectations.

The subject matter in Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5], letters of credit, may also be governed by an international convention that is now being drafted by UNCITRAL, the draft Convention on Independent Guarantees and Standby Letters of Credit. The Uniform Customs and Practice is an international body of trade practice that is commonly adopted by international and domestic letters of credit and as such is the "law of the transaction" by agreement of the parties. Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] is consistent with and was influenced by the rules in the existing version of the UCP. In addition to the UCP and the international convention, other bodies of law apply to letters of credit. For example, the federal bankruptcy law applies to letters of credit with respect to applicants and beneficiaries that are in bankruptcy; regulations of the Federal Reserve Board and the Comptroller of the Currency lay out requirements for banks that issue letters of credit and describe how letters of credit are to be treated for calculating asset risk and for the purpose of loan limitations. In addition there is an array of anti-boycott and other similar laws that may affect the issuance and performance of letters of credit. All of these laws are beyond the scope of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5], but in certain circumstances they will override Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5].

30-5-118. Security interest of issuer or nominated person.

Official Comments

[Purpose:]

1. This section gives the issuer of a letter of credit or a nominated person thereunder an automatic perfected security interest in a "document" (as that term is defined in Section 5-102(a)(6) [30-5-122(1)(f)]). The security interest arises only if the document is presented to the issuer or nominated person under the letter of credit and only to the extent of the value that is given. This security interest is analogous to that awarded to a collecting bank under Section 4-210 [30-4-210]. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] contains special rules governing the security interest arising under this section. In all other respects, a security interest arising under this section is subject to Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. See Section 9-109 [30-9A-109]. Thus, for example, a security interest arising under this section may give rise to a security interest in proceeds under Section 9-315 [30-9A-315].

2. Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] makes a security agreement unnecessary to the creation of a security interest under this section. Under subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)], a security interest arising under this section is perfected if the document is presented in a medium other than a written or tangible medium. Documents that are written and that are not an otherwise-defined type of collateral under Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] (e.g., an invoice or inspection certificate) may be goods, in which an issuer or nominated person could perfect its security interest by possession. Because the definition of document in Section 5-102(a)(6) [30-5-122(1)(f)] includes records (e.g., electronic records) that may not be goods, subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)] provides for automatic perfection (i.e., without filing or possession).

Under subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)], if the document (i) is in a written or tangible medium, (ii) is not a certificated security, chattel paper, a document of title, an instrument, or a letter of credit, and (iii) is not in the debtor's possession, the security interest is perfected and has priority over a conflicting security interest. If the document is a type of tangible collateral that subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)] excludes from its perfection and priority rules, the issuer or nominated person must comply with the normal method of perfection (e.g., possession of an instrument) and is subject to the applicable Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] priority rules. Documents to which subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)] applies may be important to an issuer or nominated person. For example, a confirmer who pays the beneficiary must be assured that its rights to all documents are not impaired. It will find it necessary to present all of the required documents to the issuer in order to be reimbursed. Moreover, when a nominated person sends documents to an issuer in connection with the nominated person's reimbursement, that activity is not a collection, enforcement, or disposition of collateral under Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A].

One purpose of this section is to protect an issuer or nominated person from claims of a beneficiary's creditors. It is a fallback provision inasmuch as issuers and nominated persons frequently may obtain and perfect security interests under the usual Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] rules, and, in many cases, the documents will be owned by the issuer, nominated person, or applicant.

30-5-122. Definitions.

Official Comment

Source: Section 5-102, U.C.C.

Official Comment: 1. Since no one can be a confirmer unless that person is a nominated person as defined in Section 5-102(a)(11) [30-5-122(1)(k)], those who agree to "confirm" without the designation or authorization of the issuer are not confirmers under Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. Nonetheless, the undertakings to the beneficiary of such persons may be enforceable by the beneficiary as letters of credit issued by the "confirmer" for its own account or as guarantees or contracts outside of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5].

2. The definition of "document" contemplates and facilitates the growing recognition of electronic and other nonpaper media as "documents," however, for the time being, data in those media constitute documents only in certain circumstances. For example, a facsimile received by an issuer would be a document only if the letter of credit explicitly permitted it, if the standard practice authorized it and the letter did not prohibit it, or the agreement of the issuer and beneficiary permitted it. The fact that data transmitted in a nonpaper (unwritten) medium can be recorded on paper by a recipient's computer printer, facsimile machine, or the like does not under current practice render the data so transmitted a "document." A facsimile or S.W.I.F.T. message received directly by the issuer is in an electronic medium when it crosses the boundary of the issuer's place of business. One wishing to make a presentation by facsimile (an electronic medium) will have to procure the explicit agreement of the issuer (assuming that the standard practice does not authorize it). Where electronic transmissions are authorized neither by the letter of credit nor by the practice, the beneficiary may transmit the data electronically to its agent who may be able to put it in written form and make a conforming presentation.

3. "Good faith" continues in revised Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] to be defined as "honesty in fact." "Observance of reasonable standards of fair dealing" has not been added to the definition. The narrower definition of "honesty in fact" reinforces the "independence principle" in the treatment of "fraud," "strict compliance," "preclusion," and other tests affecting the performance of obligations that are unique to letters of credit. This narrower definition — which does not include "fair dealing" — is appropriate to the decision to honor or dishonor a presentation of documents specified in a letter of credit. The narrower definition is also appropriate for other parts of revised Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] where greater certainty of obligations is necessary and is consistent with the goals of speed and low cost. It is important that U.S. letters of credit have continuing vitality and competitiveness in international transactions.

For example, it would be inconsistent with the "independence" principle if any of the following occurred: (i) the beneficiary's failure to adhere to the standard of "fair dealing" in the underlying transaction or otherwise in presenting documents were to provide applicants and issuers with an "unfairness" defense to dishonor even when the documents complied with the terms of the letter of credit; (ii) the issuer's obligation to honor in "strict compliance in accordance with standard practice" were changed to "reasonable compliance" by use of the "fair dealing" standard, or (iii) the preclusion against the issuer (Section 5-108(d) [30-5-128(4)]) were modified under the "fair dealing" standard to enable the issuer later to raise additional deficiencies in the presentation. The rights and obligations arising from presentation, honor, dishonor and reimbursement, are independent and strict, and thus "honesty in fact" is an appropriate standard.

The contract between the applicant and beneficiary is not governed by Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5], but by applicable contract law, such as Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] or the general law of contracts. "Good faith" in that contract is defined by other law, such as Section 2-103(1)(b) [30-2-103(1)(b)] or Restatement of Contracts 2d, §205, which incorporate the principle of "fair dealing" in most cases, or a State's common law or other statutory provisions that may apply to that contract.

The contract between the applicant and the issuer (sometimes called the "reimbursement" agreement) is governed in part by this article [chapter] (e.g., Sections 5-108(i) [30-5-128(9)], 5-111(b) [30-5-131(2)], and 5-103(c) [30-5-123(3)]) and partly by other law (e.g., the general law of contracts). The definition of good faith in Section 5-102(a)(7) [30-5-122(1)(g)] applies only to the extent that the reimbursement contract is governed by provisions in this article [chapter]; for other purposes good faith is defined by other law.

4. Payment and acceptance are familiar modes of honor. A third mode of honor, incurring an unconditional obligation, has legal effects similar to an acceptance of a time draft but does not technically constitute an acceptance. The practice of making letters of credit available by "deferred payment undertaking" as now provided in UCP 500 has grown up in other countries and spread to the United States. The definition of "honor" will accommodate that practice.

5. The exclusion of consumers from the definition of "issuer" is to keep creditors from using a letter of credit in consumer transactions in which the consumer might be made the issuer and the creditor would be the beneficiary. If that transaction were recognized under Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5], the effect would be to leave the consumer without defenses against the creditor. That outcome would violate the policy behind the Federal Trade Commission Rule in 16 CFR Part 433. In a consumer transaction, an individual cannot be an issuer where that person would otherwise be either the principal debtor or a guarantor.

6. The label on a document is not conclusive; certain documents labelled "guarantees" in accordance with European (and occasionally, American) practice are letters of credit. On the other hand, even documents that are labelled "letter of credit" may not constitute letters of credit under the definition in Section 5-102(a) [30-5-122(1)]. When a document labelled a letter of credit requires the issuer to pay not upon the presentation of documents, but upon the determination of an extrinsic fact such as applicant's failure to perform a construction contract, and where that condition appears on its face to be fundamental and would, if ignored, leave no obligation to the issuer under the document labelled letter of credit, the issuer's undertaking is not a letter of credit. It is probably some form of suretyship or other contractual arrangement and may be enforceable as such. See Sections 5-102(a)(10) [30-5-122(1)(j)] and 5-103(d) [30-5-123(4)]. Therefore, undertakings whose fundamental term requires an issuer to look beyond documents and beyond conventional reference to the clock, calendar, and practices concerning the form of various documents are not governed by Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. Although Section 5-108(g) [30-5-128(7)] recognizes that certain nondocumentary conditions can be included in a letter of credit without denying the undertaking the status of letter of credit, that section does not apply to cases where the nondocumentary condition is fundamental to the issuer's obligation. The rules in Sections 5-102(a)(10) [30-5-122(1)(j)], 5-103(d) [30-5-123(4)], and 5-108(g) [30-5-128(7)] approve the conclusion in Wichita Eagle & Beacon Publishing Co. v. Pacific Nat. Bank, 493 F.2d 1285 (9th Cir. 1974).

The adjective "definite" is taken from the UCP. It approves cases that deny letter of credit status to documents that are unduly vague or incomplete. See, e.g., Transparent Products Corp. v. Paysaver Credit Union, 864 F.2d 60 (7th Cir. 1988). Note, however, that no particular phrase or label is necessary to establish a letter of credit. It is sufficient if the undertaking of the issuer shows that it is intended to be a letter of credit. In most cases the parties' intention will be indicated by a label on the undertaking itself indicating that it is a "letter of credit," but no such language is necessary.

A financial institution may be both the issuer and the applicant or the issuer and the beneficiary. Such letters are sometimes issued by a bank in support of the bank's own lease obligations or on behalf of one of its divisions as an applicant or to one of its divisions as beneficiary, such as an overseas branch. Because wide use of letters of credit in which the issuer and the applicant or the issuer and the beneficiary are the same would endanger the unique status of letters of credit, only financial institutions are authorized to issue them.

In almost all cases the ultimate performance of the issuer under a letter of credit is the payment of money. In rare cases the issuer's obligation is to deliver stock certificates or the like. The definition of letter of credit in Section 5-102(a)(10)[30-5-122(1)(j)] contemplates those cases.

7. Under the UCP any bank is a nominated bank where the letter of credit is "freely negotiable." A letter of credit might also nominate by the following: "We hereby engage with the drawer, indorsers, and bona fide holders of drafts drawn under and in compliance with the terms of this credit that the same will be duly honored on due presentation" or "available with any bank by negotiation." A restricted negotiation credit might be "available with x bank by negotiation" or the like.

Several legal consequences may attach to the status of nominated person. First, when the issuer nominates a person, it is authorizing that person to pay or give value and is authorizing the beneficiary to make presentation to that person. Unless the letter of credit provides otherwise, the beneficiary need not present the documents to the issuer before the letter of credit expires; it need only present those documents to the nominated person. Secondly, a nominated person that gives value in good faith has a right to payment from the issuer despite fraud. Section 5-109(a)(1) [30-5-129(1)(a)].

8. A "record" must be in or capable of being converted to a perceivable form. For example, an electronic message recorded in a computer memory that could be printed from that memory could constitute a record. Similarly, a tape recording of an oral conversation could be a record.

9. Absent a specific agreement to the contrary, documents of a beneficiary delivered to an issuer or nominated person are considered to be presented under the letter of credit to which they refer, and any payment or value given for them is considered to be made under that letter of credit. As the court held in Alaska Textile Co. v. Chase Manhattan Bank, N.A., 982 F.2d 813, 820 (2d Cir. 1992), it takes a "significant showing" to make the presentation of a beneficiary's documents for "collection only" or otherwise outside letter of credit law and practice.

10. Although a successor of a beneficiary is one who succeeds "by operation of law," some of the successions contemplated by Section 5-102(a)(15) [30-5-122(1)(o)] will have resulted from voluntary action of the beneficiary such as merger of a corporation. Any merger makes the successor corporation the "successor of a beneficiary" even though the transfer occurs partly by operation of law and partly by the voluntary action of the parties. The definition excludes certain transfers, where no part of the transfer is "by operation of law" — such as the sale of assets by one company to another.

11. "Draft" in Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] does not have the same meaning it has in Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. For example, a document may be a draft under Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] even though it would not be a negotiable instrument, and therefore would not qualify as a draft under Section 3-104(e) [30-3-104(5)].

Case Notes

Letter of Credit — Guaranty Distinguished: Plaintiff agreed to lend Prospect Associates, Inc. (Prospect) money to finance construction of a subdivision. As part of the security for the loan, Prospect was required to obtain a letter of credit with plaintiff as beneficiary. Prospect defaulted on the promissory note evidencing the loan. Defendant refused payment on the letter of credit, contending it was a guaranty on which it was not primarily liable. The District Court granted summary judgment to plaintiff, and defendant appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed the decision, saying the document was clearly entitled a letter of credit and its intent was to hold the bank primarily liable upon nonperformance of one of the named instruments, as opposed to secondarily liable as under a guaranty. Sherwood & Roberts, Inc. v. First Security Bank, 209 M 402, 682 P2d 149, 41 St. Rep. 787 (1984).

Letter of Credit — What Constitutes: The Court found that an instrument entitled "letter of instruction and joint assignment of funds" was not a letter of credit because it did not meet the definition in 30-5-103 (substance now in 30-5-122) and its terms had not been met. The issuing bank had not agreed to be primarily liable. Boise Cascade Corp. v. First Sec. Bank of Anaconda, 183 M 378, 600 P2d 173 (1979).

30-5-123. Scope.

Official Comment

Source: Section 5-103, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Sections 5-102(a)(10) [30-5-122(1)(j)] and 5-103 [30-5-123] are the principal limits on the scope of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. Many undertakings in commerce and contract are similar, but not identical to the letter of credit. Principal among those are "secondary," "accessory," or "suretyship" guarantees. Although the word "guarantee" is sometimes used to describe an independent obligation like that of the issuer of a letter of credit (most often in the case of European bank undertakings but occasionally in the case of undertakings of American banks), in the United States the word "guarantee" is more typically used to describe a suretyship transaction in which the "guarantor" is only secondarily liable and has the right to assert the underlying debtor's defenses. This article [chapter] does not apply to secondary or accessory guarantees and it is important to recognize the distinction between letters of credit and those guarantees. It is often a defense to a secondary or accessory guarantor's liability that the underlying debt has been discharged or that the debtor has other defenses to the underlying liability. In letter of credit law, on the other hand, the independence principle recognized throughout Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] states that the issuer's liability is independent of the underlying obligation. That the beneficiary may have breached the underlying contract and thus have given a good defense on that contract to the applicant against the beneficiary is no defense for the issuer's refusal to honor. Only staunch recognition of this principle by the issuers and the courts will give letters of credit the continuing vitality that arises from the certainty and speed of payment under letters of credit. To that end, it is important that the law not carry into letter of credit transactions rules that properly apply only to secondary guarantees or to other forms of engagement.

2. Like all of the provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code, Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] is supplemented by Section 1-103 [30-1-103] and, through it, by many rules of statutory and common law. Because this article [chapter] is quite short and has no rules on many issues that will affect liability with respect to a letter of credit transaction, law beyond Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] will often determine rights and liabilities in letter of credit transactions. Even within letter of credit law, the article [chapter] is far from comprehensive; it deals only with "certain" rights of the parties. Particularly with respect to the standards of performance that are set out in Section 5-108 [30-5-128], it is appropriate for the parties and the courts to turn to customs and practice such as the Uniform Customs and Practice for Documentary Credits, currently published by the International Chamber of Commerce as I.C.C. Pub. No. 500 (hereafter UCP). Many letters of credit specifically adopt the UCP as applicable to the particular transaction. Where the UCP are adopted but conflict with Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] and except where variation is prohibited, the UCP terms are permissible contractual modifications under Sections 1-102(3) [30-1-102(3)] and 5-103(c) [30-5-123(3)]. See Section 5-116(c) [30-5-136(3)]. Normally Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] should not be considered to conflict with practice except when a rule explicitly stated in the UCP or other practice is different from a rule explicitly stated in Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5].

Except by choosing the law of a jurisdiction that has not adopted the Uniform Commercial Code, it is not possible entirely to escape the Uniform Commercial Code. Since incorporation of the UCP avoids only "conflicting" Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] rules, parties who do not wish to be governed by the nonconflicting provisions of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] must normally either adopt the law of a jurisdiction other than a State of the United States or state explicitly the rule that is to govern. When rules of custom and practice are incorporated by reference, they are considered to be explicit terms of the agreement or undertaking.

Neither the obligation of an issuer under Section 5-108 [30-5-128] nor that of an adviser under Section 5-107 [30-5-127] is an obligation of the kind that is invariable under Section 1-102(3) [30-1-102(3)]. Section 5-103(c) [30-5-123(3)] and Comment 1 to Section 5-108 [30-5-128] make it clear that the applicant and the issuer may agree to almost any provision establishing the obligations of the issuer to the applicant. The last sentence of subsection (c) [subsection (3)] limits the power of the issuer to achieve that result by a nonnegotiated disclaimer or limitation of remedy.

What the issuer could achieve by an explicit agreement with its applicant or by a term that explicitly defines its duty, it cannot accomplish by a general disclaimer. The restriction on disclaimers in the last sentence of subsection (c) [subsection (3)] is based more on procedural than on substantive unfairness. Where, for example, the reimbursement agreement provides explicitly that the issuer need not examine any documents, the applicant understands the risk it has undertaken. A term in a reimbursement agreement which states generally that an issuer will not be liable unless it has acted in "bad faith" or committed "gross negligence" is ineffective under Section 5-103(c) [30-5-123(3)]. On the other hand, less general terms such as terms that permit issuer reliance on an oral or electronic message believed in good faith to have been received from the applicant or terms that entitle an issuer to reimbursement when it honors a "substantially" though not "strictly" complying presentation, are effective. In each case the question is whether the disclaimer or limitation is sufficiently clear and explicit in reallocating a liability or risk that is allocated differently under a variable Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] provision.

Of course, no term in a letter of credit, whether incorporated by reference to practice rules or stated specifically, can free an issuer from a conflicting contractual obligation to its applicant. If, for example, an issuer promised its applicant that it would pay only against an inspection certificate of a particular company but failed to require such a certificate in its letter of credit or made the requirement only a nondocumentary condition that had to be disregarded, the issuer might be obliged to pay the beneficiary even though its payment might violate its contract with its applicant.

3. Parties should generally avoid modifying the definitions in Section 5-102 [30-5-122]. The effect of such an agreement is almost inevitably unclear. To say that something is a "guarantee" in the typical domestic transaction is to say that the parties intend that particular legal rules apply to it. By acknowledging that something is a guarantee, but asserting that it is to be treated as a "letter of credit," the parties leave a court uncertain about where the rules on guarantees stop and those concerning letters of credit begin.

4. Section 5-102(2) and (3) [former 30-5-102(2) and (3)] of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] are omitted as unneeded; the omission does not change the law.

Case Notes

Letter of Credit Not Instrument of Guaranty: The plaintiff brought suit against the defendant bank to enforce a letter of credit established on its behalf by an insurance company that subsequently went into liquidation. The bank moved for a change of venue, relying on state insurance laws. The Supreme Court held that a letter of credit, as opposed to an instrument of guaranty, created a primary obligation on the part of the bank that is independent from any obligations of the party that established the letter of credit. In light of the nature of a letter of credit, the bankrupt company and its status had nothing to do with the dispute between the parties; proper venue was the county where the defendant had its principal place of business. Gerling Global Reinsurance Corp. v. First Interstate Bank, 242 M 216, 789 P2d 1237, 47 St. Rep. 726 (1990). See also Glacier Nat'l Bank v. Challinor, 253 M 412, 833 P2d 1046, 49 St. Rep. 503 (1992), in which the Supreme Court held that it was not an abuse of discretion for the District Court to not allow the presentation of evidence regarding a "suretyship defense" when the instruments involved in the agreement were letters of credit.

Letter of Credit — What Constitutes: The Court found that an instrument entitled "letter of instruction and joint assignment of funds" was not a letter of credit because it did not meet the definition in 30-5-103 (substance now in 30-5-122) and its terms had not been met. The issuing bank had not agreed to be primarily liable. Boise Cascade Corp. v. First Sec. Bank of Anaconda, 183 M 378, 600 P2d 173 (1979).

30-5-124. Formal requirements.

Official Comment

Source: Section 5-104, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Neither Section 5-104 [30-5-124] nor the definition of letter of credit in Section 5-102(a)(10) [30-5-122(1)(j)] requires inclusion of all the terms that are normally contained in a letter of credit in order for an undertaking to be recognized as a letter of credit under Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. For example, a letter of credit will typically specify the amount available, the expiration date, the place where presentation should be made, and the documents that must be presented to entitle a person to honor. Undertakings that have the formalities required by Section 5-104 [30-5-124] and meet the conditions specified in Section 5-102(a)(10) [30-5-122(1)(j)] will be recognized as letters of credit even though they omit one or more of the items usually contained in a letter of credit.

2. The authentication specified in this section is authentication only of the identity of the issuer, confirmer, or adviser.

An authentication agreement may be by system rule, by standard practice, or by direct agreement between the parties. The reference to practice is intended to incorporate future developments in the UCP and other practice rules as well as those that may arise spontaneously in commercial practice.

3. Many banking transactions, including the issuance of many letters of credit, are now conducted mostly by electronic means. For example, S.W.I.F.T. is currently used to transmit letters of credit from issuing to advising banks. The letter of credit text so transmitted may be printed at the advising bank, stamped "original" and provided to the beneficiary in that form. The printed document may then be used as a way of controlling and recording payments and of recording and authorizing assignments of proceeds or transfers of rights under the letter of credit. Nothing in this section should be construed to conflict with that practice.

To be a record sufficient to serve as a letter of credit or other undertaking under this section, data must have a durability consistent with that function. Because consideration is not required for a binding letter of credit or similar undertaking (Section 5-105 [30-5-125]) yet those undertakings are to be strictly construed (Section 5-108 [30-5-128]), parties to a letter of credit transaction are especially dependent on the continued availability of the terms and conditions of the letter of credit or other undertaking. By declining to specify any particular medium in which the letter of credit must be established or communicated, Section 5-104 [30-5-124] leaves room for future developments.

Official Comment:

It is not to be expected that any issuer will issue its letter of credit without some form of remuneration. But it is not expected that the beneficiary will know what the issuer's remuneration was or whether in fact there was any identifiable remuneration in a given case. And it might be difficult for the beneficiary to prove the issuer's remuneration. This section dispenses with this proof and is consistent with the position of Lord Mansfield in Pillans v. Van Mierop, 97 Eng.Rep. 1035 (K.B. 1765) in making consideration irrelevant.

30-5-126. Issuance, amendment, cancellation, and duration.

Official Comment

Source: Section 5-106, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section adopts the position taken by several courts, namely that letters of credit that are silent as to revocability are irrevocable. See, e.g., Weyerhaeuser Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 27 UCC Rep. Serv. 777 (S.D. Iowa 1979); West Va. Hous. Dev. Fund v. Sroka, 415 F. Supp. 1107 (W.D. Pa. 1976). This is the position of the current UCP (500). Given the usual commercial understanding and purpose of letters of credit, revocable letters of credit offer unhappy possibilities for misleading the parties who deal with them.

2. A person can consent to an amendment by implication. For example, a beneficiary that tenders documents for honor that conform to an amended letter of credit but not to the original letter of credit has probably consented to the amendment. By the same token an applicant that has procured the issuance of a transferable letter of credit has consented to its transfer and to performance under the letter of credit by a person to whom the beneficiary's rights are duly transferred. If some, but not all of the persons involved in a letter of credit transaction consent to performance that does not strictly conform to the original letter of credit, those persons assume the risk that other nonconsenting persons may insist on strict compliance with the original letter of credit. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] those not consenting are not bound. For example, an issuer might agree to amend its letter of credit or honor documents presented after the expiration date in the belief that the applicant has consented or will consent to the amendment or will waive presentation after the original expiration date. If that belief is mistaken, the issuer is bound to the beneficiary by the terms of the letter of credit as amended or waived, even though it may be unable to recover from the applicant.

In general, the rights of a recognized transferee beneficiary cannot be altered without the transferee's consent, but the same is not true of the rights of assignees of proceeds from the beneficiary. When the beneficiary makes a complete transfer of its interest that is effective under the terms for transfer established by the issuer, adviser, or other party controlling transfers, the beneficiary no longer has an interest in the letter of credit, and the transferee steps into the shoes of the beneficiary as the one with rights under the letter of credit. Section 5-102(a)(3) [30-5-122(1)(c)]. When there is a partial transfer, both the original beneficiary and the transferee beneficiary have an interest in performance of the letter of credit and each expects that its rights will not be altered by amendment unless it consents.

The assignee of proceeds under a letter of credit from the beneficiary enjoys no such expectation. Notwithstanding an assignee's notice to the issuer of the assignment of proceeds, the assignee is not a person protected by subsection (b) [subsection (2)]. An assignee of proceeds should understand that its rights can be changed or completely extinguished by amendment or cancellation of the letter of credit. An assignee's claim is precarious, for it depends entirely upon the continued existence of the letter of credit and upon the beneficiary's preparation and presentation of documents that would entitle the beneficiary to honor under Section 5-108 [30-5-128].

3. The issuer's right to cancel a revocable letter of credit does not free it from a duty to reimburse a nominated person who has honored, accepted, or undertaken a deferred obligation prior to receiving notice of the amendment or cancellation. Compare UCP Article 8.

4. Although all letters of credit should specify the date on which the issuer's engagement expires, the failure to specify an expiration date does not invalidate the letter of credit, or diminish or relieve the obligation of any party with respect to the letter of credit. A letter of credit that may be revoked or terminated at the discretion of the issuer by notice to the beneficiary is not "perpetual."

30-5-127. Confirmer, nominated person, and adviser.

Official Comment

Source: Section 5-107, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. A confirmer has the rights and obligations identified in Section 5-108 [30-5-128]. Accordingly, unless the context otherwise requires, the terms "confirmer" and "confirmation" should be read into this article wherever the terms "issuer" and "letter of credit" appear.

A confirmer that has paid in accordance with the terms and conditions of the letter of credit is entitled to reimbursement by the issuer even if the beneficiary committed fraud (see Section 5-109(a)(1)(ii) [30-5-129(1)(a)(ii)]) and, in that sense, has greater rights against the issuer than the beneficiary has. To be entitled to reimbursement from the issuer under the typical confirmed letter of credit, the confirmer must submit conforming documents, but the confirmer's presentation to the issuer need not be made before the expiration date of the letter of credit.

A letter of credit confirmation has been analogized to a guarantee of issuer performance, to a parallel letter of credit issued by the confirmer for the account of the issuer or the letter of credit applicant or both, and to a back-to-back letter of credit in which the confirmer is a kind of beneficiary of the original issuer's letter of credit. Like letter of credit undertakings, confirmations are both unique and flexible, so that no one of these analogies is perfect, but unless otherwise indicated in the letter of credit or confirmation, a confirmer should be viewed by the letter of credit issuer and the beneficiary as an issuer of a parallel letter of credit for the account of the original letter of credit issuer. Absent a direct agreement between the applicant and a confirmer, normally the obligations of a confirmer are to the issuer not the applicant, but the applicant might have a right to injunction against a confirmer under Section 5-109 [30-5-129] or warranty claim under Section 5-110 [30-5-130], and either might have claims against the other under Section 5-117 [30-5-137].

2. No one has a duty to advise until that person agrees to be an adviser or undertakes to act in accordance with the instructions of the issuer. Except where there is a prior agreement to serve or where the silence of the adviser would be an acceptance of an offer to contract, a person's failure to respond to a request to advise a letter of credit does not in and of itself create any liability, nor does it establish a relationship of issuer and adviser between the two. Since there is no duty to advise a letter of credit in the absence of a prior agreement, there can be no duty to advise it timely or at any particular time. When the adviser manifests its agreement to advise by actually doing so (as is normally the case), the adviser cannot have violated any duty to advise in a timely way. This analysis is consistent with the result of Sound of Market Street v. Continental Bank International, 819 F.2d 384 (3d Cir. 1987) which held that there is no such duty. This section takes no position on the reasoning of that case, but does not overrule the result. By advising or agreeing to advise a letter of credit, the adviser assumes a duty to the issuer and to the beneficiary accurately to report what it has received from the issuer, but, beyond determining the apparent authenticity of the letter, an adviser has no duty to investigate the accuracy of the message it has received from the issuer. "Checking" the apparent authenticity of the request to advise means only that the prospective adviser must attempt to authenticate the message (e.g., by "testing" the telex that comes from the purported issuer), and if it is unable to authenticate the message must report that fact to the issuer and, if it chooses to advise the message, to the beneficiary. By proper agreement, an adviser may disclaim its obligation under this section.

3. An issuer may issue a letter of credit which the adviser may advise with different terms. The issuer may then believe that it has undertaken a certain engagement, yet the text in the hands of the beneficiary will contain different terms, and the beneficiary would not be entitled to honor if the documents it submitted did not comply with the terms of the letter of credit as originally issued. On the other hand, if the adviser also confirmed the letter of credit, then as a confirmer it will be independently liable on the letter of credit as advised and confirmed. If in that situation the beneficiary's ultimate presentation entitled it to honor under the terms of the confirmation but not under those in the original letter of credit, the confirmer would have to honor but might not be entitled to reimbursement from the issuer.

4. When the issuer nominates another person to "pay," "negotiate," or otherwise to take up the documents and give value, there can be confusion about the legal status of the nominated person. In rare cases the person might actually be an agent of the issuer and its act might be the act of the issuer itself. In most cases the nominated person is not an agent of the issuer and has no authority to act on the issuer's behalf. Its "nomination" allows the beneficiary to present to it and earns it certain rights to payment under Section 5-109 [30-5-129] that others do not enjoy. For example, when an issuer issues a "freely negotiable credit," it contemplates that banks or others might take up documents under that credit and advance value against them, and it is agreeing to pay those persons but only if the presentation to the issuer made by the nominated person complies with the credit. Usually there will be no agreement to pay, negotiate, or to serve in any other capacity by the nominated person, therefore the nominated person will have the right to decline to take the documents. It may return them or agree merely to act as a forwarding agent for the documents but without giving value against them or taking any responsibility for their conformity to the letter of credit.

30-5-128. Issuer's rights and obligations.

Official Comment

Source: Section 5-108, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section combines some of the duties previously included in Sections 5-114 and 5-109 [30-5-114 and 30-5-109]. Because a confirmer has the rights and duties of an issuer, this section applies equally to a confirmer and an issuer. See Section 5-107(a) [30-5-107(1)].

The standard of strict compliance governs the issuer's obligation to the beneficiary and to the applicant. By requiring that a "presentation" appear strictly to comply, the section requires not only that the documents themselves appear on their face strictly to comply, but also that the other terms of the letter of credit such as those dealing with the time and place of presentation are strictly complied with. Typically, a letter of credit will provide that presentation is timely if made to the issuer, confirmer, or any other nominated person prior to expiration of the letter of credit. Accordingly, a nominated person that has honored a demand or otherwise given value before expiration will have a right to reimbursement from the issuer even though presentation to the issuer is made after the expiration of the letter of credit. Conversely, where the beneficiary negotiates documents to one who is not a nominated person, the beneficiary or that person acting on behalf of the beneficiary must make presentation to a nominated person, confirmer, or issuer prior to the expiration date.

This section does not impose a bifurcated standard under which an issuer's right to reimbursement might be broader than a beneficiary's right to honor. However, the explicit deference to standard practice in Section 5-108(a) and (e) [30-5-128(1) and (5)] and elsewhere expands issuers' rights of reimbursement where that practice so provides. Also, issuers can and often do contract with their applicants for expanded rights of reimbursement. Where that is done, the beneficiary will have to meet a more stringent standard of compliance as to the issuer than the issuer will have to meet as to the applicant. Similarly, a nominated person may have reimbursement and other rights against the issuer based on this article, the UCP, bank-to-bank reimbursement rules, or other agreement or undertaking of the issuer. These rights may allow the nominated person to recover from the issuer even when the nominated person would have no right to obtain honor under the letter of credit.

The section adopts strict compliance, rather than the standard that commentators have called "substantial compliance," the standard arguably applied in Banco Espanol de Credito v. State Street Bank and Trust Company, 385 F.2d 230 (1st Cir. 1967) and Flagship Cruises Ltd. v. New England Merchants Nat. Bank, 569 F.2d 699 (1st Cir. 1978). Strict compliance does not mean slavish conformity to the terms of the letter of credit. For example, standard practice (what issuers do) may recognize certain presentations as complying that an unschooled layman would regard as discrepant. By adopting standard practice as a way of measuring strict compliance, this article indorses the conclusion of the court in New Braunfels Nat. Bank v. Odiorne, 780 S.W.2d 313 (Tex.Ct.App. 1989) (beneficiary could collect when draft requested payment on 'Letter of Credit No. 86-122-5' and letter of credit specified 'Letter of Credit No. 86-122-S' holding strict compliance does not demand oppressive perfectionism). The section also indorses the result in Tosco Corp. v. Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., 723 F.2d 1242 (6th Cir. 1983). The letter of credit in that case called for "drafts Drawn under Bank of Clarksville Letter of Credit Number 105." The draft presented stated "drawn under Bank of Clarksville, Clarksville, Tennessee letter of Credit No. 105." The court correctly found that despite the change of upper case "L" to a lower case "l" and the use of the word "No." instead of "Number," and despite the addition of the words "Clarksville, Tennessee," the presentation conformed. Similarly a document addressed by a foreign person to General Motors as "Jeneral Motors" would strictly conform in the absence of other defects.

Identifying and determining compliance with standard practice are matters of interpretation for the court, not for the jury. As with similar rules in Sections 4A-202(c) and 2-302 [30-4A-202(3) and 30-2-302], it is hoped that there will be more consistency in the outcomes and speedier resolution of disputes if the responsibility for determining the nature and scope of standard practice is granted to the court, not to a jury. Granting the court authority to make these decisions will also encourage the salutary practice of courts' granting summary judgment in circumstances where there are no significant factual disputes. The statute encourages outcomes such as American Coleman Co. v. Intrawest Bank, 887 F.2d 1382 (10th Cir. 1989), where summary judgment was granted.

In some circumstances standards may be established between the issuer and the applicant by agreement or by custom that would free the issuer from liability that it might otherwise have. For example, an applicant might agree that the issuer would have no duty whatsoever to examine documents on certain presentations (e.g., those below a certain dollar amount). Where the transaction depended upon the issuer's payment in a very short time period (e.g., on the same day or within a few hours of presentation), the issuer and the applicant might agree to reduce the issuer's responsibility for failure to discover discrepancies. By the same token, an agreement between the applicant and the issuer might permit the issuer to examine documents exclusively by electronic or electro-optical means. Neither those agreements nor others like them explicitly made by issuers and applicants violate the terms of Section 5-108(a) or (b) [30-5-128(1) or (2)] or Section 5-103(c) [30-5-123(3)].

2. Section 5-108(a) [30-5-128(1)] balances the need of the issuer for time to examine the documents against the possibility that the examiner (at the urging of the applicant or for fear that it will not be reimbursed) will take excessive time to search for defects. What is a "reasonable time" is not extended to accommodate an issuer's procuring a waiver from the applicant. See Article 14c of the UCP.

Under both the UCC and the UCP the issuer has a reasonable time to honor or give notice. The outside limit of that time is measured in business days under the UCC and in banking days under the UCP, a difference that will rarely be significant. Neither business nor banking days are defined in Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5], but a court may find useful analogies in Regulation CC, 12 CFR 229.2, in state law outside of the Uniform Commercial Code, and in Article 4 [Title 30, chapter 4].

Examiners must note that the seven-day period is not a safe harbor. The time within which the issuer must give notice is the lesser of a reasonable time or seven business days. Where there are few documents (as, for example, with the mine run standby letter of credit), the reasonable time would be less than seven days. If more than a reasonable time is consumed in examination, no timely notice is possible. What is a "reasonable time" is to be determined by examining the behavior of those in the business of examining documents, mostly banks. Absent prior agreement of the issuer, one could not expect a bank issuer to examine documents while the beneficiary waited in the lobby if the normal practice was to give the documents to a person who had the opportunity to examine those together with many others in an orderly process. That the applicant has not yet paid the issuer or that the applicant's account with the issuer is insufficient to cover the amount of the draft is not a basis for extension of the time period.

This section does not preclude the issuer from contacting the applicant during its examination; however, the decision to honor rests with the issuer, and it has no duty to seek a waiver from the applicant or to notify the applicant of receipt of the documents. If the issuer dishonors a conforming presentation, the beneficiary will be entitled to the remedies under Section 5-111 [30-5-131], irrespective of the applicant's views.

Even though the person to whom presentation is made cannot conduct a reasonable examination of documents within the time after presentation and before the expiration date, presentation establishes the parties' rights. The beneficiary's right to honor or the issuer's right to dishonor arises upon presentation at the place provided in the letter of credit even though it might take the person to whom presentation has been made several days to determine whether honor or dishonor is the proper course. The issuer's time for honor or giving notice of dishonor may be extended or shortened by a term in the letter of credit. The time for the issuer's performance may be otherwise modified or waived in accordance with Section 5-106 [30-5-126].

The issuer's time to inspect runs from the time of its "receipt of documents." Documents are considered to be received only when they are received at the place specified for presentation by the issuer or other party to whom presentation is made.

Failure of the issuer to act within the time permitted by subsection (b) [subsection (2)] constitutes dishonor. Because of the preclusion in subsection (c) [subsection (3)] and the liability that the issuer may incur under Section 5-111 [30-5-131] for wrongful dishonor, the effect of such a silent dishonor may ultimately be the same as though the issuer had honored, i.e., it may owe damages in the amount drawn but unpaid under the letter of credit.

3. The requirement that the issuer send notice of the discrepancies or be precluded from asserting discrepancies is new to Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. It is taken from the similar provision in the UCP and is intended to promote certainty and finality.

The section thus substitutes a strict preclusion principle for the doctrines of waiver and estoppel that might otherwise apply under Section 1-103 [30-1-103]. It rejects the reasoning in Flagship Cruises Ltd. v. New England Merchants' Nat. Bank, 569 F.2d 699 (1st Cir. 1978) and Wing On Bank Ltd. v. American Nat. Bank & Trust Co., 457 F.2d 328 (5th Cir. 1972) where the issuer was held to be estopped only if the beneficiary relied on the issuer's failure to give notice.

Assume, for example, that the beneficiary presented documents to the issuer shortly before the letter of credit expired, in circumstances in which the beneficiary could not have cured any discrepancy before expiration. Under the reasoning of Flagship and Wing On, the beneficiary's inability to cure, even if it had received notice, would absolve the issuer of its failure to give notice. The virtue of the preclusion obligation adopted in this section is that it forecloses litigation about reliance and detriment.

Even though issuers typically give notice of the discrepancy of tardy presentation when presentation is made after the expiration of a credit, they are not required to give that notice and the section permits them to raise late presentation as a defect despite their failure to give that notice.

4. To act within a reasonable time, the issuer must normally give notice without delay after the examining party makes its decision. If the examiner decides to dishonor on the first day, it would be obliged to notify the beneficiary shortly thereafter, perhaps on the same business day. This rule accepts the reasoning in cases such as Datapoint Corp. v. M & I Bank, 665 F. Supp. 722 (W.D. Wis. 1987) and Esso Petroleum Canada, Div. of Imperial Oil, Ltd. v. Security Pacific Bank, 710 F. Supp. 275 (D. Ore. 1989).

The section deprives the examining party of the right simply to sit on a presentation that is made within seven days of expiration. The section requires the examiner to examine the documents and make a decision and, having made a decision to dishonor, to communicate promptly with the presenter. Nevertheless, a beneficiary who presents documents shortly before the expiration of a letter of credit runs the risk that it will never have the opportunity to cure any discrepancies.

5. Confirmers, other nominated persons, and collecting banks acting for beneficiaries can be presenters and, when so, are entitled to the notice provided in subsection (b) [subsection (2)]. Even nominated persons who have honored or given value against an earlier presentation of the beneficiary and are themselves seeking reimbursement or honor need notice of discrepancies in the hope that they may be able to procure complying documents. The issuer has the obligations imposed by this section whether the issuer's performance is characterized as "reimbursement" of a nominated person or as "honor."

6. In many cases a letter of credit authorizes presentation by the beneficiary to someone other than the issuer. Sometimes that person is identified as a "payor" or "paying bank," or as an "acceptor" or "accepting bank," in other cases as a "negotiating bank," and in other cases there will be no specific designation. The section does not impose any duties on a person other than the issuer or confirmer, however a nominated person or other person may have liability under this article [chapter] or at common law if it fails to perform an express or implied agreement with the beneficiary.

7. The issuer's obligation to honor runs not only to the beneficiary but also to the applicant. It is possible that an applicant who has made a favorable contract with the beneficiary will be injured by the issuer's wrongful dishonor. Except to the extent that the contract between the issuer and the applicant limits that liability, the issuer will have liability to the applicant for wrongful dishonor under Section 5-111 [30-5-131] as a matter of contract law. A good faith extension of the time in Section 5-108(b) [30-5-128(2)] by agreement between the issuer and beneficiary binds the applicant even if the applicant is not consulted or does not consent to the extension.

The issuer's obligation to dishonor when there is no apparent compliance with the letter of credit runs only to the applicant. No other party to the transaction can complain if the applicant waives compliance with terms or conditions of the letter of credit or agrees to a less stringent standard for compliance than that supplied by this article [chapter]. Except as otherwise agreed with the applicant, an issuer may dishonor a noncomplying presentation despite an applicant's waiver.

Waiver of discrepancies by an issuer or an applicant in one or more presentations does not waive similar discrepancies in a future presentation. Neither the issuer nor the beneficiary can reasonably rely upon honor over past waivers as a basis for concluding that a future defective presentation will justify honor. The reasoning of Courtaulds of North America Inc. v. North Carolina Nat. Bank, 528 F.2d 802 (4th Cir. 1975) is accepted and that expressed in Schweibish v. Pontchartrain State Bank, 389 So.2d 731 (La.App. 1980) and Titanium Metals Corp. v. Space Metals, Inc., 529 P.2d 431 (Utah 1974) is rejected.

8. The standard practice referred to in subsection (e) [subsection (5)] includes (i) international practice set forth in or referenced by the Uniform Customs and Practice, (ii) other practice rules published by associations of financial institutions, and (iii) local and regional practice. It is possible that standard practice will vary from one place to another. Where there are conflicting practices, the parties should indicate which practice governs their rights. A practice may be overridden by agreement or course of dealing. See Section 1-205(4) [30-1-205(4)].

9. The responsibility of the issuer under a letter of credit is to examine documents and to make a prompt decision to honor or dishonor based upon that examination. Nondocumentary conditions have no place in this regime and are better accommodated under contract or suretyship law and practice. In requiring that nondocumentary conditions in letters of credit be ignored as surplusage, Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] remains aligned with the UCP (see UCP 500 Article 13c), approves cases like Pringle-Associated Mortgage Corp. v. Southern National Bank, 571 F.2d 871, 874 (5th Cir. 1978), and rejects the reasoning in cases such as Sherwood & Roberts, Inc. v. First Security Bank, 682 P.2d 149 (Mont. 1984).

Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] recognizes that letters of credit sometimes contain nondocumentary terms or conditions. Conditions such as a term prohibiting "shipment on vessels more than 15 years old," are to be disregarded and treated as surplusage. Similarly, a requirement that there be an award by a "duly appointed arbitrator" would not require the issuer to determine whether the arbitrator had been "duly appointed." Likewise a term in a standby letter of credit that provided for differing forms of certification depending upon the particular type of default does not oblige the issuer independently to determine which kind of default has occurred. These conditions must be disregarded by the issuer. Where the nondocumentary conditions are central and fundamental to the issuer's obligation (as for example a condition that would require the issuer to determine in fact whether the beneficiary had performed the underlying contract or whether the applicant had defaulted) their inclusion may remove the undertaking from the scope of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] entirely. See Section 5-102(a)(10) [30-5-122(1)(j)] and Comment 6 to Section 5-102 [30-5-122].

Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] would not permit the beneficiary or the issuer to disregard terms in the letter of credit such as place, time, and mode of presentation. The rule in subsection (g) [subsection (7)] is intended to prevent an issuer from deciding or even investigating extrinsic facts, but not from consulting the clock, the calendar, the relevant law and practice, or its own general knowledge of documentation or transactions of the type underlying a particular letter of credit.

Even though nondocumentary conditions must be disregarded in determining compliance of a presentation (and thus in determining the issuer's duty to the beneficiary), an issuer that has promised its applicant that it will honor only on the occurrence of those nondocumentary conditions may have liability to its applicant for disregarding the conditions.

10. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] condones an issuer's ignorance of "any usage of a particular trade"; that trade is the trade of the applicant, beneficiary, or others who may be involved in the underlying transaction. The issuer is expected to know usage that is commonly encountered in the course of document examination. For example, an issuer should know the common usage with respect to documents in the maritime shipping trade but would not be expected to understand synonyms used in a particular trade for product descriptions appearing in a letter of credit or an invoice.

11. Where the issuer's performance is the delivery of an item of value other than money, the applicant's reimbursement obligation would be to make the "item of value" available to the issuer.

12. An issuer is entitled to reimbursement from the applicant after honor of a forged or fraudulent drawing if honor was permitted under Section 5-109(a) [30-5-129(1)].

13. The last clause of Section 5-108(i)(5) [30-5-128(9)(e)] deals with a special case in which the fraud is not committed by the beneficiary, but is committed by a stranger to the transaction who forges the beneficiary's signature. If the issuer pays against documents on which a required signature of the beneficiary is forged, it remains liable to the true beneficiary.

Official Comment

Official Comment:

1. This recodification makes clear that fraud must be found either in the documents or must have been committed by the beneficiary on the issuer or applicant. See Cromwell v. Commerce & Energy Bank, 464 So.2d 721 (La. 1985).

Secondly, it makes clear that fraud must be "material." Necessarily courts must decide the breadth and width of "materiality." The use of the word requires that the fraudulent aspect of a document be material to a purchaser of that document or that the fraudulent act be significant to the participants in the underlying transaction. Assume, for example, that the beneficiary has a contract to deliver 1,000 barrels of salad oil. Knowing that it has delivered only 998, the beneficiary nevertheless submits an invoice showing 1,000 barrels. If two barrels in a 1,000 barrel shipment would be an insubstantial and immaterial breach of the underlying contract, the beneficiary's act, though possibly fraudulent, is not materially so and would not justify an injunction. Conversely, the knowing submission of those invoices upon delivery of only five barrels would be materially fraudulent. The courts must examine the underlying transaction when there is an allegation of material fraud, for only by examining that transaction can one determine whether a document is fraudulent or the beneficiary has committed fraud and, if so, whether the fraud was material.

Material fraud by the beneficiary occurs only when the beneficiary has no colorable right to expect honor and where there is no basis in fact to support such a right to honor. The section indorses articulations such as those stated in Intraworld Indus. v. Girard Trust Bank, 336 A.2d 316 (Pa. 1975), Roman Ceramics Corp. v. People's Nat. Bank, 714 F.2d 1207 (3d Cir. 1983), and similar decisions and embraces certain decisions under Section 5-114 [30-5-134] that relied upon the phrase "fraud in the transaction." Some of these decisions have been summarized as follows in Ground Air Transfer v. Westate's Airlines, 899 F.2d 1269, 1272-73 (1st Cir. 1990):

We have said throughout that courts may not "normally" issue an injunction because of an important exception to the general "no injunction" rule. The exception, as we also explained in Itek, 730 F.2d at 24-25, concerns "fraud" so serious as to make it obviously pointless and unjust to permit the beneficiary to obtain the money. Where the circumstances "plainly" show that the underlying contract forbids the beneficiary to call a letter of credit, Itek, 730 F.2d at 24; where they show that the contract deprives the beneficiary of even a "colorable" right to do so, id., at 25; where the contract and circumstances reveal that the beneficiary's demand for payment has "absolutely no basis in fact," id.; see Dynamics Corp. of America, 356 F. Supp. at 999; where the beneficiary's conduct has "so vitiated the entire transaction that the legitimate purposes of the independence of the issuer's obligation would no longer be served," Itek, 730 F.2d at 25 (quoting Roman Ceramics Corp. v. Peoples National Bank, 714 F.2d 1207, 1212 n.12, 1215 (3d Cir. 1983) (quoting Intraworld Indus., 336 A.2d at 324-25)); then a court may enjoin payment.

2. Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] makes clear that the issuer may honor in the face of the applicant's claim of fraud. The subsection also makes clear what was not stated in former Section 5-114 [30-5-134], that the issuer may dishonor and defend that dishonor by showing fraud or forgery of the kind stated in subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. Because issuers may be liable for wrongful dishonor if they are unable to prove forgery or material fraud, presumably most issuers will choose to honor despite applicant's claims of fraud or forgery unless the applicant procures an injunction. Merely because the issuer has a right to dishonor and to defend that dishonor by showing forgery or material fraud does not mean it has a duty to the applicant to dishonor. The applicant's normal recourse is to procure an injunction, if the applicant is unable to procure an injunction, it will have a claim against the issuer only in the rare case in which it can show that the issuer did not honor in good faith.

3. Whether a beneficiary can commit fraud by presenting a draft under a clean letter of credit (one calling only for a draft and no other documents) has been much debated. Under the current formulation it would be possible but difficult for there to be fraud in such a presentation. If the applicant were able to show that the beneficiary were committing material fraud on the applicant in the underlying transaction, then payment would facilitate a material fraud by the beneficiary on the applicant and honor could be enjoined. The courts should be skeptical of claims of fraud by one who has signed a "suicide" or clean credit and thus granted a beneficiary the right to draw by mere presentation of a draft.

4. The standard for injunctive relief is high, and the burden remains on the applicant to show, by evidence and not by mere allegation, that such relief is warranted. Some courts have enjoined payments on letters of credit on insufficient showing by the applicant. For example, in Griffin Cos. v. First Nat. Bank, 374 N.W.2d 768 (Minn.App. 1985), the court enjoined payment under a standby letter of credit, basing its decision on plaintiff's allegation, rather than competent evidence, of fraud.

There are at least two ways to prohibit injunctions against honor under this section after acceptance of a draft by the issuer. First is to define honor (see Section 5-102(a)(8)) in the particular letter of credit to occur upon acceptance and without regard to later payment of the acceptance. Second is explicitly to agree that the applicant has no right to an injunction after acceptance — whether or not the acceptance constitutes honor.

5. Although the statute deals principally with injunctions against honor, it also cautions against granting "similar relief" and the same principles apply when the applicant or issuer attempts to achieve the same legal outcome by injunction against presentation (see Ground Air Transfer Inc. v. Westates Airlines, Inc., 899 F.2d 1269 (1st Cir. 1990)), interpleader, declaratory judgment, or attachment. These attempts should face the same obstacles that face efforts to enjoin the issuer from paying. Expanded use of any of these devices could threaten the independence principle just as much as injunctions against honor. For that reason courts should have the same hostility to them and place the same restrictions on their use as would be applied to injunctions against honor. Courts should not allow the "sacred cow of equity to trample the tender vines of letter of credit law."

6. Section 5-109(a)(1) [30-5-129(1)(a)] also protects specified third parties against the risk of fraud. By issuing a letter of credit that nominates a person to negotiate or pay, the issuer (ultimately the applicant) induces that nominated person to give value and thereby assumes the risk that a draft drawn under the letter of credit will be transferred to one with a status like that of a holder in due course who deserves to be protected against a fraud defense.

7. The "loss" to be protected against — by bond or otherwise under subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)] — includes incidental damages. Among those are legal fees that might be incurred by the beneficiary or issuer in defending against an injunction action.

Official Comment

Source: Section 5-110, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Since the warranties in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] are not given unless a letter of credit has been honored, no breach of warranty under this subsection can be a defense to dishonor by the issuer. Any defense must be based on Section 5-108 or 5-109 [30-5-128 or 30-5-129] and not on this section. Also, breach of the warranties by the beneficiary in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] cannot excuse the applicant's duty to reimburse.

2. The warranty in Section 5-110(a)(2) [30-5-130(1)(b)]assumes that payment under the letter of credit is final. It does not run to the issuer, only to the applicant. In most cases the applicant will have a direct cause of action for breach of the underlying contract. This warranty has primary application in standby letters of credit or other circumstances where the applicant is not a party to an underlying contract with the beneficiary. It is not a warranty that the statements made on the presentation of the documents presented are truthful nor is it a warranty that the documents strictly comply under Section 5-108(a) [30-5-128(1)]. It is a warranty that the beneficiary has performed all the acts expressly and implicitly necessary under any underlying agreement to entitle the beneficiary to honor. If, for example, an underlying sales contract authorized the beneficiary to draw only upon "due performance" and the beneficiary drew even though it had breached the underlying contract by delivering defective goods, honor of its draw would break the warranty. By the same token, if the underlying contract authorized the beneficiary to draw only upon actual default or upon its or a third party's determination of default by the applicant and if the beneficiary drew in violation of its authorization, then upon honor of its draw the warranty would be breached. In many cases, therefore, the documents presented to the issuer will contain inaccurate statements (concerning the goods delivered or concerning default or other matters), but the breach of warranty arises not because the statements are untrue but because the beneficiary's drawing violated its express or implied obligations in the underlying transaction.

3. The damages for breach of warranty are not specified in Section 5-111 [30-5-131]. Courts may find damage analogies in Section 2-714 [30-2-714] in Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] and in warranty decisions under Articles 3 and 4 [Title 30, chapters 3 and 4].

Unlike wrongful dishonor cases — where the damages usually equal the amount of the draw — the damages for breach of warranty will often be much less than the amount of the draw, sometimes zero. Assume a seller entitled to draw only on proper performance of its sales contract. Assume it breaches the sales contract in a way that gives the buyer a right to damages but no right to reject. The applicant's damages for breach of the warranty in subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] are limited to the damages it could recover for breach of the contract of sale. Alternatively assume an underlying agreement that authorizes a beneficiary to draw only the "amount in default." Assume a default of $200,000 and a draw of $500,000. The damages for breach of warranty would be no more than $300,000.

Official Comment

Official Comment:

1. The right to specific performance is new. The express limitation on the duty of the beneficiary to mitigate damages adopts the position of certain courts and commentators. Because the letter of credit depends upon speed and certainty of payment, it is important that the issuer not be given an incentive to dishonor. The issuer might have an incentive to dishonor if it could rely on the burden of mitigation falling on the beneficiary, (to sell goods and sue only for the difference between the price of the goods sold and the amount due under the letter of credit). Under the scheme contemplated by Section 5-111(a) [30-5-131(1)], the beneficiary would present the documents to the issuer. If the issuer wrongfully dishonored, the beneficiary would have no further duty to the issuer with respect to the goods covered by documents that the issuer dishonored and returned. The issuer thus takes the risk that the beneficiary will let the goods rot or be destroyed. Of course the beneficiary may have a duty of mitigation to the applicant arising from the underlying agreement, but the issuer would not have the right to assert that duty by way of defense or setoff. See Section 5-117(d) [30-5-137(4)]. If the beneficiary sells the goods covered by dishonored documents or if the beneficiary sells a draft after acceptance but before dishonor by the issuer, the net amount so gained should be subtracted from the amount of the beneficiary's damages — at least where the damage claim against the issuer equals or exceeds the damage suffered by the beneficiary. If, on the other hand, the beneficiary suffers damages in an underlying transaction in an amount that exceeds the amount of the wrongfully dishonored demand (e.g., where the letter of credit does not cover 100 percent of the underlying obligation), the damages avoided should not necessarily be deducted from the beneficiary's claim against the issuer. In such a case, the damages would be the lesser of (i) the amount recoverable in the absence of mitigation (that is, the amount that is subject to the dishonor or repudiation plus any incidental damages) and (ii) the damages remaining after deduction for the amount of damages actually avoided.

A beneficiary need not present documents as a condition of suit for anticipatory repudiation, but if a beneficiary could never have obtained documents necessary for a presentation conforming to the letter of credit, the beneficiary cannot recover for anticipatory repudiation of the letter of credit. Doelger v. Battery Park Bank, 201 A.D. 515, 194 N.Y.S. 582 (1922) and Decor by Nikkei Int'l, Inc. v. Federal Republic of Nigeria, 497 F.Supp. 893 (S.D.N.Y. 1980), aff'd, 647 F.2d 300 (2d Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 454 U.S. 1148 (1982). The last sentence of subsection (c) [subsection (3)] does not expand the liability of a confirmer to persons to whom the confirmer would not otherwise be liable under Section 5-107 [30-5-127].

Almost all letters of credit, including those that call for an acceptance, are "obligations to pay money" as that term is used in Section 5-111(a) [30-5-131(1)].

2. What damages "result" from improper honor is for the courts to decide. Even though an issuer pays a beneficiary in violation of Section 5-108(a) [30-5-128(1)] or of its contract with the applicant, it may have no liability to an applicant. If the underlying contract has been fully performed, the applicant may not have been damaged by the issuer's breach. Such a case would occur when A contracts for goods at $100 per ton, but, upon delivery, the market value of conforming goods has decreased to $25 per ton. If the issuer pays over discrepancies, there should be no recovery by A for the price differential if the issuer's breach did not alter the applicant's obligation under the underlying contract, i.e., to pay $100 per ton for goods now worth $25 per ton. On the other hand, if the applicant intends to resell the goods and must itself satisfy the strict compliance requirements under a second letter of credit in connection with its sale, the applicant may be damaged by the issuer's payment despite discrepancies because the applicant itself may then be unable to procure honor on the letter of credit where it is the beneficiary, and may be unable to mitigate its damages by enforcing its rights against others in the underlying transaction. Note that an issuer found liable to its applicant may have recourse under Section 5-117 [30-5-137] by subrogation to the applicant's claim against the beneficiary or other persons.

One who inaccurately advises a letter of credit breaches its obligation to the beneficiary, but may cause no damage. If the beneficiary knows the terms of the letter of credit and understands the advice to be inaccurate, the beneficiary will have suffered no damage as a result of the adviser's breach.

3. Since the confirmer has the rights and duties of an issuer, in general it has an issuer's liability, see subsection (c) [subsection (3)]. The confirmer is usually a confirming bank. A confirming bank often also plays the role of an adviser. If it breaks its obligation to the beneficiary, the confirming bank may have liability as an issuer or, depending upon the obligation that was broken, as an adviser. For example, a wrongful dishonor would give it liability as an issuer under Section 5-111(a) [30-5-131(1)]. On the other hand a confirming bank that broke its obligation to advise the credit but did not commit wrongful dishonor would be treated under Section 5-111(c) [30-5-131(3)].

4. Consequential damages for breach of obligations under this article [chapter] are excluded in the belief that these damages can best be avoided by the beneficiary or the applicant and out of the fear that imposing consequential damages on issuers would raise the cost of the letter of credit to a level that might render it uneconomic. A fortiori punitive and exemplary damages are excluded, however, this section does not bar recovery of consequential or even punitive damages for breach of statutory or common law duties arising outside of this article [chapter].

5. The section does not specify a rate of interest. It leaves the setting of the rate to the court. It would be appropriate for a court to use the rate that would normally apply in that court in other situations where interest is imposed by law.

6. The court must award attorney's fees to the prevailing party, whether that party is an applicant, a beneficiary, an issuer, a nominated person, or adviser. Since the issuer may be entitled to recover its legal fees and costs from the applicant under the reimbursement agreement, allowing the issuer to recover those fees from a losing beneficiary may also protect the applicant against undeserved losses. The party entitled to attorneys' fees has been described as the "prevailing party." Sometimes it will be unclear which party "prevailed," for example, where there are multiple issues and one party wins on some and the other party wins on others. Determining which is the prevailing party is in the discretion of the court. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] authorizes attorney's fees in all actions where a remedy is sought "under this article [chapter]." It applies even when the remedy might be an injunction under Section 5-109 [30-5-129] or when the claimed remedy is otherwise outside of Section 5-111 [30-5-131]. Neither an issuer nor a confirmer should be treated as a "losing" party when an injunction is granted to the applicant over the objection of the issuer or confirmer; accordingly neither should be liable for fees and expenses in that case.

"Expenses of litigation" is intended to be broader than "costs." For example, expense of litigation would include travel expenses of witnesses, fees for expert witnesses, and expenses associated with taking depositions.

7. For the purposes of Section 5-111(f) [30-5-131(6)] "harm anticipated" must be anticipated at the time when the agreement that includes the liquidated damage clause is executed or at the time when the undertaking that includes the clause is issued. See Section 2A-504 [30-2A-504].

Case Notes

Construction Contract — Letter of Credit: Haines Pipeline Construction, Inc., contracted to build a pipeline for Montana Power Company (MPC). Performance was secured by an irrevocable letter of credit. The project ran into regulatory problems, and a settlement agreement was signed between the parties. The parties entered a second contract for miscellaneous repair work on the completed portion of the pipeline, including repair of buried pipeline. Haines extended the letter of credit at the request of MPC, and MPC subsequently drew upon the letter of credit. Haines sued to recover damages against MPC for breach of the construction contract. The District Court found that MPC had accepted Haines' work, that MPC had no authority to draw upon the letter of credit, and that presentment of the letter of credit constituted a breach of the construction contract. Official Comment

Source: Section 5-112, U.C.C.
Official Comment:

1. In order to protect the applicant's reliance on the designated beneficiary, letter of credit law traditionally has forbidden the beneficiary to convey to third parties its right to draw or demand payment under the letter of credit. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] codifies that rule. The term "transfer" refers to the beneficiary's conveyance of that right. Absent incorporation of the UCP (which make elaborate provision for partial transfer of a commercial letter of credit) or similar trade practice and absent other express indication in the letter of credit that the term is used to mean something else, a term in the letter of credit indicating that the beneficiary has the right to transfer should be taken to mean that the beneficiary may convey to a third party its right to draw or demand payment. Even in that case, the issuer or other person controlling the transfer may make the beneficiary's right to transfer subject to conditions, such as timely notification, payment of a fee, delivery of the letter of credit to the issuer or other person controlling the transfer, or execution of appropriate forms to document the transfer. A nominated person who is not a confirmer has no obligation to recognize a transfer.

The power to establish "requirements" does not include the right absolutely to refuse to recognize transfers under a transferable letter of credit. An issuer who wishes to retain the right to deny all transfers should not issue transferable letters of credit or should incorporate the UCP. By stating its requirements in the letter of credit an issuer may impose any requirement without regard to its conformity to practice or reasonableness. Transfer requirements of issuers and nominated persons must be made known to potential transferors and transferees to enable those parties to comply with the requirements. A common method of making such requirements known is to use a form that indicates the information that must be provided and the instructions that must be given to enable the issuer or nominated person to comply with a request to transfer.

2. The issuance of a transferable letter of credit with the concurrence of the applicant is ipso facto an agreement by the issuer and applicant to permit a beneficiary to transfer its drawing right and permit a nominated person to recognize and carry out that transfer without further notice to them. In international commerce, transferable letters of credit are often issued under circumstances in which a nominated person or adviser is expected to facilitate the transfer from the original beneficiary to a transferee and to deal with that transferee. In those circumstances it is the responsibility of the nominated person or adviser to establish procedures satisfactory to protect itself against double presentation or dispute about the right to draw under the letter of credit. Commonly such a person will control the transfer by requiring that the original letter of credit be given to it or by causing a paper copy marked as an original to be issued where the original letter of credit was electronic. By keeping possession of the original letter of credit the nominated person or adviser can minimize or entirely exclude the possibility that the original beneficiary could properly procure payment from another bank. If the letter of credit requires presentation of the original letter of credit itself, no other payment could be procured. In addition to imposing whatever requirements it considers appropriate to protect itself against double payment the person that is facilitating the transfer has a right to charge an appropriate fee for its activity.

"Transfer" of a letter of credit should be distinguished from "assignment of proceeds." The former is analogous to a novation or a substitution of beneficiaries. It contemplates not merely payment to but also performance by the transferee. For example, under the typical terms of transfer for a commercial letter of credit, a transferee could comply with a letter of credit transferred to it by signing and presenting its own draft and invoice. An assignee of proceeds, on the other hand, is wholly dependent on the presentation of a draft and invoice signed by the beneficiary.

By agreeing to the issuance of a transferable letter of credit, which is not qualified or limited, the applicant may lose control over the identity of the person whose performance will earn payment under the letter of credit.

An issuer's requirements for recognition of a successor's status might include presentation of a certificate of merger, a court order appointing a bankruptcy trustee or receiver, a certificate of appointment as bankruptcy trustee, or the like. The issuer is entitled to rely upon such documents which on their face demonstrate that presentation is made by a successor of a beneficiary. It is not obliged to make an independent investigation to determine the fact of succession.

30-5-134. Assignment of proceeds.

Official Comment

Source: Section 5-114, U.C.C.
Official Comment:

1. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] expressly validates the beneficiary's present assignment of letter of credit proceeds if made after the credit is established but before the proceeds are realized. This section adopts the prevailing usage — "assignment of proceeds" — to an assignee. That terminology carries with it no implication, however, that an assignee acquires no interest until the proceeds are paid by the issuer. For example, an "assignment of the right to proceeds" of a letter of credit for purposes of security that meets the requirements of Section 9-203(1) [30-9-203(1), now repealed, see 30-9A-203] would constitute the present creation of a security interest in that right. This security interest can be perfected by possession (Section 9-305 [30-9-305, now repealed, see 30-9A-313]) if the letter of credit is in written form. Although subsection (a) [subsection (1)] explains the meaning of "'proceeds' of a letter of credit," it should be emphasized that those proceeds also may be Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] proceeds of other collateral. For example, if a seller of inventory receives a letter of credit to support the account that arises upon the sale, payments made under the letter of credit are Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] proceeds of the inventory, account, and any document of title covering the inventory. Thus, the secured party who had a perfected security interest in that inventory, account, or document has a perfected security interest in the proceeds collected under the letter of credit, so long as they are identifiable cash proceeds (Section 9-306(2), (3) [30-9-306(2) and (3), now repealed, see 30-9A-315]. This perfection is continuous, regardless of whether the secured party perfected a security interest in the right to letter of credit proceeds.

2. An assignee's rights to enforce an assignment of proceeds against an issuer and the priority of the assignee's rights against a nominated person or transferee beneficiary are governed by Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. Those rights and that priority are stated in subsections (c), (d), and (e) [subsections (3), (4), and (5)]. Note also that Section 4-210 [30-4-210] gives first priority to a collecting bank that has given value for a documentary draft.

3. By requiring that an issuer or nominated person consent to the assignment of proceeds of a letter of credit, subsections (c) and (d) [subsections (3) and (4)] follow more closely recognized national and international letter of credit practices than did prior law. In most circumstances, it has always been advisable for the assignee to obtain the consent of the issuer in order better to safeguard its right to the proceeds. When notice of an assignment has been received, issuers normally have required signatures on a consent form. This practice is reflected in the revision. By unconditionally consenting to such an assignment, the issuer or nominated person becomes bound, subject to the rights of the superior parties specified in subsection (e) [subsection (5)], to pay to the assignee the assigned letter of credit proceeds that the issuer or nominated person would otherwise pay to the beneficiary or another assignee.

Where the letter of credit must be presented as a condition to honor and the assignee holds and exhibits the letter of credit to the issuer or nominated person, the risk to the issuer or nominated person of having to pay twice is minimized. In such a situation, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides that the issuer or nominated person may not unreasonably withhold its consent to the assignment.

Case Notes

Letter of Credit — Guaranty Distinguished: Plaintiff agreed to lend Prospect Associates, Inc. (Prospect) money to finance construction of a subdivision. As part of the security for the loan, Prospect was required to obtain a letter of credit with plaintiff as beneficiary. Prospect defaulted on the promissory note evidencing the loan. Defendant refused payment on the letter of credit, contending it was a guaranty on which it was not primarily liable. The District Court granted summary judgment to plaintiff, and defendant appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed the decision, saying the document was clearly entitled a letter of credit and its intent was to hold the bank primarily liable upon nonperformance of one of the named instruments, as opposed to secondarily liable as under a guaranty. 1. This section is based upon Sections 4-111 and 2-725(2) [30-4-112 and 30-2-725(2)].

2. This section applies to all claims for which there are remedies under Section 5-111 [30-5-131] and to other claims made under this article [chapter], such as claims for breach of warranty under Section 5-110 [30-5-130]. Because it covers all claims under Section 5-111 [30-5-131], the statute of limitations applies not only to wrongful dishonor claims against the issuer but also to claims between the issuer and the applicant arising from the reimbursement agreement. These might be for reimbursement (issuer v. applicant) or for breach of the reimbursement contract by wrongful honor (applicant v. issuer).

3. The statute of limitations, like the rest of the statute, applies only to a letter of credit issued on or after the effective date and only to transactions, events, obligations, or duties arising out of or associated with such a letter. If a letter of credit was issued before the effective date and an obligation on that letter of credit was breached after the effective date, the complaining party could bring its suit within the time that would have been permitted prior to the adoption of Section 5-115 [30-5-135] and would not be limited by the terms of Section 5-115 [30-5-135].

30-5-136. Choice of law and forum.

Official Comment

Source: Section 5-116, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Although it would be possible for the parties to agree otherwise, the law normally chosen by agreement under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] and that provided in the absence of agreement under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is the substantive law of a particular jurisdiction not including the choice of law principles of that jurisdiction. Thus, two parties, an issuer and an applicant, both located in Oklahoma might choose the law of New York. Unless they agree otherwise, the section anticipates that they wish the substantive law of New York to apply to their transaction and they do not intend that a New York choice of law principle might direct a court to Oklahoma law. By the same token, the liability of an issuer located in New York is governed by New York substantive law — in the absence of agreement — even in circumstances in which choice of law principles found in the common law of New York might direct one to the law of another State. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] states the relevant choice of law principles and it should not be subordinated to some other choice of law rule. Within the States of the United States renvoi will not be a problem once every jurisdiction has enacted Section 5-116 [30-5-136] because every jurisdiction will then have the same choice of law rule and in a particular case all choice of law rules will point to the same substantive law.

Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] does not state a choice of law rule for the "liability of an applicant." However, subsection (b) [subsection (2)] does state a choice of law rule for the liability of an issuer, nominated person, or adviser, and since some of the issues in suits by applicants against those persons involve the "liability of an issuer, nominated person, or adviser," subsection (b) [subsection (2)] states the choice of law rule for those issues. Because an issuer may have liability to a confirmer both as an issuer (Section 5-108(a) [30-5-128(1)], Comment 5 to Section 5-108 [30-5-128]) and as an applicant (Section 5-107(a) [30-5-127], Comment 1 to Section 5-107 [30-5-127], Section 5-108(i) [30-5-128(9)]), subsection (b) [subsection (2)] may state the choice of law rule for some but not all of the issuer's liability in a suit by a confirmer.

2. Because the confirmer or other nominated person may choose different law from that chosen by the issuer or may be located in a different jurisdiction and fail to choose law, it is possible that a confirmer or nominated person may be obligated to pay (under their law) but will not be entitled to payment from the issuer (under its law). Similarly, the rights of an unreimbursed issuer, confirmer, or nominated person against a beneficiary under Section 5-109, 5-110, or 5-117 [30-5-129, 30-5-130, or 30-5-137], will not necessarily be governed by the same law that applies to the issuer's or confirmer's obligation upon presentation. Because the UCP and other practice are incorporated in most international letters of credit, disputes arising from different legal obligations to honor have not been frequent. Since Section 5-108 [30-5-128] incorporates standard practice, these problems should be further minimized — at least to the extent that the same practice is and continues to be widely followed.

3. This section does not permit what is now authorized by the nonuniform Section 5-102(4) in New York. Under the current law in New York a letter of credit that incorporates the UCP is not governed in any respect by Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. Under revised Section 5-116 [30-5-136] letters of credit that incorporate the UCP or similar practice will still be subject to Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] in certain respects. First, incorporation of the UCP or other practice does not override the nonvariable terms of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. Second, where there is no conflict between Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] and the relevant provision of the UCP or other practice, both apply. Third, practice provisions incorporated in a letter of credit will not be effective if they fail to comply with Section 5-103(c) [30-5-123(3)]. Assume, for example, that a practice provision purported to free a party from any liability unless it were "grossly negligent" or that the practice generally limited the remedies that one party might have against another.

Depending upon the circumstances, that disclaimer or limitation of liability might be ineffective because of Section 5-103(c) [30-5-123(3)].

Even though Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] is generally consistent with UCP 500, it is not necessarily consistent with other rules or with versions of the UCP that may be adopted after Article 5's [Title 30, chapter 5's] revision, or with other practices that may develop. Rules of practice incorporated in the letter of credit or other undertaking are those in effect when the letter of credit or other undertaking is issued. Except in the unusual cases discussed in the immediately preceding paragraph, practice adopted in a letter of credit will override the rules of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] and the parties to letter of credit transactions must be familiar with practice (such as future versions of the UCP) that is explicitly adopted in letters of credit.

4. In several ways Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] conflicts with and overrides similar matters governed by Articles 3 and 4 [Title 30, chapters 3 and 4]. For example, "draft" is more broadly defined in letter of credit practice than under Section 3-104 [30-3-104]. The time allowed for honor and the required notification of reasons for dishonor are different in letter of credit practice than in the handling of documentary and other drafts under Articles 3 and 4 [Title 30, chapters 3 and 4].

5. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] must be read in conjunction with existing law governing subject matter jurisdiction. If the local law restricts a court to certain subject matter jurisdiction not including letter of credit disputes, subsection (e) [subsection (5)] does not authorize parties to choose that forum. For example, the parties' agreement under Section 5-116(e) [30-5-136(5)] would not confer jurisdiction on a probate court to decide a letter of credit case.

If the parties choose a forum under subsection (e) [subsection (5)] and if — because of other law — that forum will not take jurisdiction, the parties' agreement or undertaking should then be construed (for the purpose of forum selection) as though it did not contain a clause choosing a particular forum. That result is necessary to avoid sentencing the parties to eternal purgatory where neither the chosen State nor the State which would have jurisdiction but for the clause will take jurisdiction — the former in disregard of the clause and the latter in honor of the clause.

Official Comment

Source: Section 5-117, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. By itself this section does not grant any right of subrogation. It grants only the right that would exist if the person seeking subrogation "were a secondary obligor." (The term "secondary obligor" refers to a surety, guarantor, or other person against whom or whose property an obligee has recourse with respect to the obligation of a third party. See Restatement of the Law Third, Suretyship §1 (1995).) If the secondary obligor would not have a right to subrogation in the circumstances in which one is claimed under this section, none is granted by this section. In effect, the section does no more than to remove an impediment that some courts have found to subrogation because they conclude that the issuer's or other claimant's rights are "independent" of the underlying obligation. If, for example, a secondary obligor would not have a subrogation right because its payment did not fully satisfy the underlying obligation, none would be available under this section. The section indorses the position of Judge Becker in Tudor Development Group, Inc. v. United States Fidelity and Guaranty, 968 F.2d 357 (3rd Cir. 1991).

2. To preserve the independence of the letter of credit obligation and to insure that subrogation not be used as an offensive weapon by an issuer or others, the admonition in subsection (d) [subsection (4)] must be carefully observed. Only one who has completed its performance in a letter of credit transaction can have a right to subrogation. For example, an issuer may not dishonor and then defend its dishonor or assert a setoff on the ground that it is subrogated to another person's rights. Nor may the issuer complain after honor that its subrogation rights have been impaired by any good faith dealings between the beneficiary and the applicant or any other person. Assume, for example, that the beneficiary under a standby letter of credit is a mortgagee. If the mortgagee were obliged to issue a release of the mortgage upon payment of the underlying debt (by the issuer under the letter of credit), that release might impair the issuer's rights of subrogation, but the beneficiary would have no liability to the issuer for having granted that release.

Official Comment

This Chapter is a consolidation and revision of the Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act and the Uniform Bills of Lading Act, and embraces also the provisions of the Uniform Sales Act relating to negotiation of documents of title.

The only substantial omissions of material covered in the previous uniform acts are the criminal provisions found in the Warehouse Receipts and Bills of Lading acts. These criminal provisions are inappropriate to a Commercial Code, and for the most part duplicate portions of the ordinary criminal law relating to frauds.

The Chapter does not attempt to define the tort liability of bailees, except to hold certain classes of bailees to a minimum standard of reasonable care. For important classes of bailees, liabilities in case of loss, damage or destruction, as well as other legal questions associated with particular documents of title, are governed by federal statutes, international treaties, and in some cases regulatory state laws, which supersede the provisions of this Chapter in case of inconsistency. See Section 30-7-103.

30-7-102. Definitions and index of definitions.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 76, Uniform Sales Act; Section 58, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Sections 1 and 53, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Applicable definitions from the uniform acts have been consolidated and revised; definition of delivery order is new.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter:

1. "Bailee" was not defined in the old uniform acts. It is used in this Chapter as a blanket term to designate carriers, warehousemen and others who normally issue documents of title on the basis of goods which they have received. The definition does not, however, require actual possession of the goods. If a bailee acknowledges possession when he does not have it he is bound by sections of this Chapter which declare "bailee's" obligations. (See definition of "Issuer" in this section and Sections 30-7-203 and 30-7-301 on liability in case of non-receipt.)

2. The definition of warehouse receipt contained in the general definitions section of this Act (Section 30-1-201) eliminates the requirement of the Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act that the issuing warehouseman be "lawfully engaged" in business. The warehouseman's compliance with applicable state regulations such as the filing of a bond has no bearing on the substantive issues dealt with in this Chapter. Certainly the issuer's violations of law should not diminish his responsibility on documents he has put in commercial circulation. The Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act requirement that the warehouseman be engaged "for profit" has also been eliminated in view of the existence of state operated and co-operative warehouses. But it is still essential that the business be storing goods "for hire" (Section 30-1-201 and this section). A person does not become a warehouseman by storing his own goods.

3. Delivery orders, which were included without qualification in the Uniform Sales Act definition of document of title, must be treated differently in this consolidation of provisions from the three uniform acts. When a delivery order has been accepted by the bailee it is for practical purposes indistinguishable from a warehouse receipt. Prior to such acceptance there is no basis for imposing obligations on the bailee other than the ordinary obligation of contract which the bailee may have assumed to the depositor of the goods.

Case Notes

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM WAREHOUSE RECEIPTS ACT

Warehouseman: One conducting a warehouse for the storage of beans, exacting a storage and handling charge from those using the warehouse facilities, and issuing negotiable warehouse receipts was a "public warehouseman" within the general meaning of the term. Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. To make clear what would of course be true without the Section, that applicable Federal law is paramount.

2. To make clear also that regulatory state statutes (such as those fixing or authorizing a commission to fix rates and prescribe services, authorizing different charges for goods of different values, and limiting liability for loss to the declared value on which the charge was based) are not affected by the Chapter and are controlling on the matters which they cover. Notice that the reference is not only to such statutes, but to tariffs, classifications and regulations filed or issued pursuant to them.

30-7-104. Negotiable and nonnegotiable warehouse receipt, bill of lading or other document of title.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 27 and 76, Uniform Sales Act; Sections 2, 3, 4, and 5, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Sections 2, 3, 4, 5 and 53, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Consolidated and rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

This Chapter deals with a class of commercial paper representing commodities in storage or transportation. This "commodity paper" is to be distinguished from what might be called "money paper" dealt with in the Chapter of this Act on Commercial Paper (Chapter 3) and "investment paper" dealt with in the Chapter of this Act on Investment Securities (Chapter 8). The class of "commodity paper" is designated "document of title" following the terminology of the Uniform Sales Act Section 76. Section 30-1-201. The distinctions between negotiable and nonnegotiable documents in this section makes the most important subclassification employed in the Chapter, in that the holder of negotiable documents may acquire more rights than his transferor had (See Section 30-7-502).

A document of title is negotiable only if it satisfies this section. "Deliverable on proper indorsement and surrender of this receipt" will not render a document negotiable. Bailees often include such provisions as a means of insuring return of nonnegotiable receipts for record purposes. Such language may be regarded as insistence by the bailee upon a particular kind of receipt in connection with delivery of the goods. Subsections (1)(a) and (2) make it clear that a document is not negotiable which provides for delivery to order or bearer only if written instructions to that effect are given by a named person.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 20, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act.

Changes: New section confined to problem of non-receipt and misdescription.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter:

This section is a simplified restatement of existing law as to the method by which a bailee may avoid responsibility for the accuracy of descriptions which are made by or in reliance upon information furnished by the depositor. The issuer is liable on documents issued by an agent, contrary to instructions of his principal, without receiving goods. No disclaimer of the latter liability is permitted.

30-7-204. Duty of care — contractual limitation of warehouseman's liability.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 3 and 21, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act.

Changes: Consolidated and rewritten; material on limitation of remedy is new.

Purposes of Changes: The old uniform acts provided that receipts could not contain terms impairing the obligation of reasonable care. Whether this is violated by a stipulation that in case of loss the bailee's liability is limited to stated amounts has been much controverted. The section is intended to eliminate that controversy by setting forth the conditions under which liability is so limited. However, as subsection (4) makes clear, the states as well as the federal government may supplement this section with more rigid standards of responsibility for some or all bailees.

Compiler's Comments

Omitted Subsection: Montana has no subsection (4) which under the proposed version provides that states may wish to supplement this section with more rigid standards for bailees.

30-7-205. Title under warehouse receipt defeated in certain cases.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

The typical case covered by this section is that of the warehouseman-dealer in grain, and the substantive question at issue is whether in case the warehouseman becomes insolvent the receipt holders shall be able to trace and recover grain shipped to farmers and other purchasers from the elevator. This was possible under the old acts, although courts were eager to find estoppels to prevent it. The practical difficulty of tracing fungible grain means that the preservation of this theoretical right adds little to the commercial acceptability of negotiable grain receipts, which really circulate on the credit of the warehouseman. Moreover, on default of the warehouseman, the receipt holders at least share in what grain remains, whereas retaking the grain from a good faith cash purchaser reduces him completely to the status of general creditor in a situation where there was very little he could do to guard against the loss. Compare 15 U.S.C. Section 714p, enacted in 1955.

30-7-206. Termination of storage at warehouseman's option.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 34, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act.

Changes: Rewritten and expanded to define the warehouseman's right to terminate the storage not only where the goods are perishable or hazardous as in Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act, Section 34, but also for any other reason including decline in value of the goods imperiling the warehouseman's security for charges.

Purposes of Changes:

1. Most warehousing is for an indefinite term, the bailor being entitled to delivery on reasonable demand. It is necessary to define the warehouseman's power to terminate the bailment, since it would be commercially intolerable to allow warehousemen to order removal of the goods on short notice. The thirty day period provided where the document does not carry its own period of termination corresponds to commercial practice of computing rates on a monthly basis. The right to terminate under subsection (1) includes a right to require payment of "any charges", but does not depend on the existence of unpaid charges.

2. In permitting expeditious disposition of perishable and hazardous goods Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act, Section 34, made no distinction between cases where the warehouseman knowingly undertook to store such goods and cases where the goods were discovered to be of that character subsequent to storage. The former situation presents no such emergency as justifies the summary power of removal and sale. Subsections (2) and (3) distinguish between the two situations.

3. Protection of his lien is the only interest which the warehouseman has to justify summary sale of perishable goods which are not hazardous. This same interest must be recognized when the stored goods, although not perishable, decline in market value to a point which threatens the warehouseman's security.

4. The right to order removal of stored goods is subject to provisions of the public warehousing laws of some states forbidding warehousemen from discriminating among customers. Nor does the section relieve the warehouseman of any obligation under the state laws to secure the approval of a public official before disposing of deteriorating goods. Such regulatory statutes and the regulations under them remain in force and operative. Section 30-7-103 and Section 10-103, Chapter 264, Laws of 1963.

30-7-207. Goods must be kept separate — fungible goods.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 22, 23 and 24, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act.

Changes: Consolidated and revised; holders of overissued receipts permitted to share in mass of fungible goods.

Purposes of Changes:

No change of substance is made other than the explicit statement that holders to whom overissued receipts have been duly negotiated shall share in a mass of fungible goods. Where individual ownership interests are merged into claims on a common fund, as is necessarily the case with fungible goods, there is no policy reason for discriminating between successive purchasers of similar claims.

30-7-208. Altered warehouse receipts.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 13, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act.

Changes: Generally revised and simplified; explicit treatment of the situation where a blank in an executed document is filled without authority.

Purposes of Changes:

1. The execution of warehouse receipts in blank is a dangerous practice. As between the issuer and an innocent purchaser the risks should clearly fall on the former.

2. An unauthorized alteration whether made with or without fraudulent intent does not relieve the issuer of his liability on the warehouse receipt as originally executed. The unauthorized alteration itself is of course ineffective against the warehouseman.

30-7-209. Lien of warehouseman.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 27 through 32, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

1. Subsection (1) defines the warehouseman's statutory lien. A specific lien attaches automatically, without express notation on the receipt, to goods stored under a non-negotiable receipt. That lien is limited to the usual charges arising out of a storage transaction; by notation on the receipt it can be made a general lien extending to like charges in relation to other goods. The same rules apply where the receipt is negotiable, except that as against a holder by due negotiation the lien is limited to the amount or rate specified on the receipt, or, if none is specified, to a reasonable charge for storage of the specific goods after the date of the receipt.

2. Subsection (2) provides for a security interest based upon agreement. Such a security interest arises out of relations between the parties other than bailment for storage or transportation, as where the bailee assumes the role of financer or performs a manufacturing operation, extending credit in reliance upon the goods covered by the receipt. Such a security interest is not a statutory lien. Compare Sections 30-9-102(2) [now repealed, see 30-9A-109] and 30-9-310 [now repealed, see 30-9A-333]. It is governed in all respects by Chapter 9A, except that subsection (2) requires that the receipt specify a maximum amount and limits the security interest to the amount specified.

3. Subsections (1) and (2) validate the lien and security interest "against the bailor." As against third parties, subsection (3)(a) continues the rule under the prior uniform statutory provision that to validate the lien the owner must have entrusted the goods to the depositor, and that the circumstances must be such that a pledge by the depositor to a good faith purchaser for value would have been valid. Thus the owner's interest will not be subjected to a lien or security interest arising out of a deposit of his goods by a thief. The warehouseman may be protected because of the actual, implied or apparent authority of the depositor, because of a Factor's Act, or because of other circumstances which would protect a bona fide pledgee, unless those circumstances are denied effect under Section 30-7-503. Where the third party is the holder of a security interest, the rights of the warehouseman depend on the priority given to a hypothetical bona fide pledgee by Chapter 9A, particularly Section 30-9-312 [now repealed, see 30-9A-324]. Thus the special priority granted to statutory liens by Section 30-9-310 [now repealed, see 30-9A-333] does not apply to liens under subsection (1) of this section, since subsection (3) "expressly provides otherwise" within the meaning of Section 30-9-310 [now repealed, see 30-9A-333]. As to household goods, however, subsection (3)(b) makes the warehouseman's lien "for charges and expenses in relation to the goods" effective against all persons if the depositor was the legal possessor. The purpose of the exception is to permit the warehouseman to accept household goods for storage in sole reliance on the value of the goods themselves, especially in situations of family emergency.

4. It is unnecessary to state here, as in Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act 31, that a bailee with a valid lien need not deliver until the lien is satisfied. Section 30-7-403 provides that a person demanding delivery under a document must be prepared to satisfy the bailee's lien.

5. Where goods have been stored under a non-negotiable warehouse receipt and are sold by the person to whom the receipt has been issued, frequently the goods are not withdrawn by the new owner. The obligations of the seller of the goods in this situation are set forth in Section 30-2-503(4) on tender of delivery and include procurement of an acknowledgment by the bailee of the buyer's right to possession of the goods. If a new receipt is requested, such an acknowledgment can be withheld until storage charges have been paid or provided for. The statutory lien for charges on the goods sold, granted by the first sentence of subsection (1), continues valid unless the bailee gives it up. But once a new receipt is issued to the buyer, the buyer becomes "the person on whose account the goods are held" under the second sentence of subsection (1); unless he undertakes liability for charges in relation to other goods stored by the seller, there is no general lien against the buyer for such charges. Of course, the bailee may preserve the general lien in such a case either by an arrangement by which the buyer "is liable for" such charges, or by reserving a security interest under subsection (2).

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 33, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act.

Changes: Rewritten; simplified foreclosure proceeding provided for all liens other than warehousemen's lien in non-commercial storage.

Purposes of Changes:

1. Subsection (1) makes "commercial reasonableness" the standard for foreclosure proceedings in all cases except non-commercial storage with a warehouseman. The latter category embraces principally storage of household goods by private owners; and for such cases the detailed provisions as to notification, publication and public sale, found in Section 33 of the Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act are retained in subsection (2). The swifter, more flexible procedure of subsection (1) is appropriate to commercial storage. Compare seller's power of resale on breach by buyer under the provisions of the Chapter on Sales (Section 30-2-706).

2. The provisions of subsections (4) and (5) permitting the bailee to bid at public sales and confirming the title of purchasers at foreclosure sales are designed to secure more bidding and better prices.

Part Case Notes

Limitation of Amount Where Value Not Disclosed: Shipper's failure to list antique mirrors as items of extraordinary value did not bar its recovery from carrier for their destruction in transit where, although bills of lading contained provisions limiting carrier's liability for articles of extraordinary value unless specifically listed, the shipper was not advised of such provision nor given an opportunity to list the mirrors as having extraordinary value and, in fact, did not see the bills until the carrier had completed the trip. Cordingley v. Allied Van Lines, Inc., 563 F2d 960 (C.A. Mont. 1977).

30-7-301. Liability for nonreceipt or misdescription — "said to contain" — "shipper's load and count" — improper handling.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 23, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Rewritten in part.

Purposes of Changes:

1. The provision as to misdating in subsection (1) conforms to the policy of the amendment to the Federal Bills of Lading Act by 44 Stat. 1450 (1927), as amended 49 U.S.C. Section 102, after the holding in Browne v. Union Pac. R. Co., 113 Kan. 726, 216 P. 299 (1923), affirmed on other grounds 267 U.S. 255, 45 S.Ct. 315, 69 L.Ed. 601 (1925). Subsections (2) and (3) conform to the policy of the Federal Bills of Lading Act, 49 U.S.C. Sections 100, 101, and the laws of several states. See, e.g., N.Y.Pers.Prop. Law Section 209; Report of N.Y. Law Revision Commission, N.Y.Leg.Doc. (1941) No. 65(F).

2. The language of the old Uniform Act suggested that a carrier is ordinarily liable for damage caused by improper loading, but may relieve himself of liability by disclosing on the bill that shipper actually loaded. A more accurate statement of the law is that the carrier is not liable for losses caused by act or default of the shipper, which would include improper loading. There is some question whether under present law a carrier is liable even to a good faith purchaser of a negotiable bill for such losses, if the shipper's faulty loading in fact caused the loss. It is this doubtful liability which subsection (4) permits the carrier to bar by disclosure of shipper's loading. There is no implication that decisions such as Modern Tool Corp. v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 100 F.Supp. 595 (D.N.J. 1951), are disapproved.

3. This section is a simplified restatement of existing law as to the method by which a bailee may avoid responsibility for the accuracy of descriptions which are made by or in reliance upon information furnished by the depositor or shipper. The issuer is liable on documents issued by an agent, contrary to instructions of his principal, without receiving goods. No disclaimer of this liability is permitted since it is not a matter either of the care of the goods or their description.

4. The shipper's erroneous report to the carrier concerning the goods may cause damage to the carrier. Subsection (5) therefore provides appropriate indemnity.

30-7-302. Through bills of lading and similar documents.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. The purpose of this section is to subject the initial carrier under a through bill to suit for breach of the contract of carriage by any connecting carrier and to make it clear that any such connecting carrier holds the goods on terms which are defined by the document of title even though such connecting carrier did not issue the document. Since the connecting carrier does hold on the terms of the document, it must honor a proper demand for delivery or a diversion order just as the original bailee would have to. Similarly it has the benefits of the excuses for nondelivery and limitations of liability provided for the original bailee. Unlike the original bailee-issuer, the connecting carrier's responsibility is limited to the period while the goods are in its possession. The section is patterned generally after the Interstate Commerce Act, but does not impose any obligation to issue through bills.

2. The reference to documents other than through bills looks to the possibility that multi-purpose documents may come into use, e.g., combination warehouse receipts and bills of lading.

3. Where the obligations or standards applicable to different parties bound by a document of title are different, the initial carrier's responsibility for portions of the journey not on its own lines will be determined by the standards appropriate to the connecting carrier. Thus a land carrier issuing a through bill of lading involving water carriage at a later stage will have the benefit of the water carrier's immunity from liability for negligence of its servants in navigating the vessel, where the law provides such an immunity for water carriers and the loss occurred while the goods were in the water carrier's possession.

4. Under Subsection (1) the issuer of a through bill of lading may become liable for the fault of another person. Subsection (3) gives it appropriate rights of recourse.

30-7-303. Diversion — reconsignment — change of instructions.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

1. The old Acts contained no reference to diversion, a very common commercial practice which defeats delivery to the consignee originally named in a bill of lading. The carrier was protected under the heading of "justified delivery" if the substituted consignee who received delivery was "a person lawfully entitled to possession of the goods." Cf. subsection (1) (d). This in turn depended on whether the person ordering the diversion was the owner of the goods or empowered to dispose of them, which again might depend upon whether under sales law title had passed from the consignor-seller to the consignee-buyer. The carrier is plainly not in a position to decide such questions when directed by the person with whom it has contracted for transportation to change the destination of the goods in transit. Carriers may as a business matter be willing to accept instructions from consignees in which case, as under the old uniform acts, the carrier will be liable for misdelivery if the consignee was not the owner or otherwise empowered to dispose of the goods. The section imposes no duty on carriers to undertake diversion; it is of course subject to the provisions of filed tariffs. Section 30-7-103.

2. It should be noted that the section provides only an immunity for carriers against liability for "misdelivery." It does not, for example, defeat the title to the goods which the consignee-buyer may have acquired from the consignor-seller upon delivery of the goods to the carrier under a non-negotiable bill of lading. Thus if the carrier, upon instructions from the consignor, returns the goods to him, the consignee may recover the goods from the consignor or his insolvent estate. However, under certain circumstances, the consignee's title may be defeated by diversion of the goods in transit to a different consignee.

30-7-304. Bills of lading in a set.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 6, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: This section adds to existing legislation, which merely prohibits bills in a set in ordinary domestic trade, a statement of the legal effect of a lawfully issued set.

Purposes of Changes:

The statement of the legal effect of a lawfully issued set is in accord with existing commercial law relating to maritime and other overseas bills. This law has been codified in the Hague and Warsaw Conventions and in the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, the provisions of which would ordinarily govern in situations where bills in a set are recognized by this Chapter.

30-7-305. Destination bills.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: None.

Purposes:

This proposal is designed to facilitate the use of order bills in connection with fast shipments. Use of order bills on high speed shipments is impeded by the fact that the goods may arrive at destination before the documents, so that no one is ready to take delivery from the carrier. This is especially inconvenient for carriers by truck and air, who do not have terminal facilities where shipments can be held to await consignee's appearance. Order bills would be useful to take advantage of bank collection. This may be preferable to C.O.D. shipment in which the carrier, e.g., a truck driver, is the collecting and remitting agent. Financing of shipments under this plan would be handled as follows: seller at San Francisco delivers the goods to an airline with instructions to issue a bill in New York to a named bank. Seller receives a receipt embodying this undertaking to issue a destination bill. Airline wires its New York freight agent to issue the bill as instructed by the seller. Seller wires the New York bank a draft on buyer. New York bank indorses the bill to buyer when he honors the draft. Normally seller would act through his own bank in San Francisco, which would extend him credit in reliance on the airline's contract to deliver a bill to the order of its New York correspondent. This section is entirely permissive; it imposes no duty to issue such bills. Whether a connecting carrier will act as issuing agent is left to agreement between carriers.

30-7-306. Altered bills of lading.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 16, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Generally revised and simplified; explicit treatment of the situation where a blank in an executed document is filled without authority.

Purposes of Changes:

An unauthorized alteration whether made with or without fraudulent intent does not relieve the issuer of his liability on the document as originally executed. Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act 13 excused the issuer from any liability to a fraudulent alterer, other than the liability to deliver the goods according to the terms of the original document. It is difficult to conceive what liability the draftsman intended to excuse. Uniform Bills of Lading Act 16 contains no such excuse provision, and is followed in this respect in the present section. Uniform Bills of Lading Act 16 characterizes an unauthorized alteration as "void" but apparently nothing more was intended than that the alteration did not change the obligation of the issuer. This is sufficiently covered by the terms of this Section. Moreover cases are conceivable in which an alteration would not be "void"; for example, an alteration made by common consent of a transferor and transferee of a document might evidence an enforceable contract between them. The same rule is made applicable to the filling in of blanks, a matter on which the prior Acts were silent.

30-7-307. Lien of carrier.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 27 through 32, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act.

Changes: Rewritten; lien extended to carrier. Lien of common carrier validated unless carrier had notice that consignor lacked authority to subject the goods to charges and expenses. Where the carrier is not required by law to receive the goods for transportation, lien validated against anyone who permitted the bailor to have possession even if he had no real or apparent authority.

Purposes of Changes:

The section is intended to give carriers a specific statutory lien for charges and expenses similar to that given to warehousemen by the first sentence of Section 30-7-209. But since carriers do not commonly claim a lien for charges in relation to other goods or lend money on the security of goods in their hands, provisions for a general lien or a security interest similar to those in Section 30-7-209(1) and (2) are omitted. See Comment to Section 30-7-105. Since the lien given by this section is specific, and the storage or transportation often preserves or increases the value of the goods, subsection (2) validates the lien against anyone who permitted the bailor to have possession of the goods. Where the carrier is required to receive the goods for transportation, the owner's interest may be subjected to charges and expenses arising out of deposit of his goods by a thief. Cf. Section 30-9-310 [now repealed, see 30-9A-333]. The crucial mental element is the carrier's knowledge or reason to know of the bailor's lack of authority.

30-7-308. Enforcement of carrier's lien.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 33, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act.

Changes: Rewritten; provisions extended to carriers' liens; simplified foreclosure proceeding provided.

Purposes of Changes:

This section is intended to give the carrier an enforcement procedure of his lien coextensive with that given the warehousemen in cases other than those covering noncommercial storage by him. See Comment to Section 30-7-210.

30-7-309. Duty of care — contractual limitation of carrier's liability.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 3, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Consolidated and rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

The old uniform act provided that bills of lading could not contain terms impairing the obligation of reasonable care. Whether this is violated by a stipulation that in case of loss the bailee's liability is limited to stated amounts has been much controverted. For interstate rail transportation the matter is settled by the Carmack Amendment to the Interstate Commerce Act (See 49 U.S.C.A. §20(11)). The present section is a generalized version of the Interstate Commerce Act provisions. The obligation of due care is radically qualified, in the case of maritime bills and international airbills, by federal legislation and treaty. All this special legislation would remain in effect even if Congress enacts this Code, including the present Chapter. See Section 30-7-103.

Subsection (1) does not impair any rule of law imposing the liability of an insurer on a common carrier in intrastate commerce. Subsection (2), however, applies to such liability as well as to liability based on negligence. The entire section is subject under Section 30-7-103 to applicable provisions in filed tariffs, such as the common disclaimer of responsibility for undeclared articles of extraordinary value, hidden from view. Tariffs which lawfully provide a maximum unit value beyond which goods are not taken fall within the same principle, and are expressly covered by the words "value as lawfully provided in the tariff."

30-7-401. Irregularities in issue of receipt or bill or conduct of issuer.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 20, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Section 23, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Most of the material is new; the uniform act sections cited deal only with non-receipt and misdescription.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter:

The bailee's liability on his document despite non-receipt or misdescription of the goods is affirmed in Sections 30-7-203 and 30-7-301. The purpose of this section is to make it clear that regardless of irregularities a document which falls within the definition of document of title imposes on the issuer the obligations stated in this Chapter. For example, a bailee will not be permitted to avoid his obligation to deliver the goods (Section 30-7-403) or his obligation of due care with respect to them (Sections 30-7-204 and 30-7-309) by taking the position that no valid "document" was issued because he failed to file a statutory bond or did not pay stamp taxes or did not disclose the place of storage in the document. Sanctions against violations of statutory or administrative duties with respect to documents should be limited to revocation of license or other measures prescribed by the regulation imposing the duty. As to the continuing vitality of regulations, in addition to those found in this Chapter, of documents of title, see Section 30-7-103 and Section 10-103, Chapter 264, Laws of 1963.

30-7-402. Duplicate receipt or bill — overissue.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 6, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Section 7, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Consolidated and rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

1. This section treats a duplicate which is not properly identified as such like any other overissue of documents: a purchaser of such a document acquires no title but only a cause of action for damages against the person who made his deception possible, except in the cases noted in the section. But parts of a bill lawfully issued in a set of parts are not "overissue" (Section 30-7-304). Of course, if the issuer has clearly indicated that a document is a duplicate so that no one can be deceived by it, and in fact the duplicate is a correct copy of the original, the warehouseman is not liable for preparing and delivering such a duplicate copy.

2. The section applies to nonnegotiable documents to the extent of providing an action for damages for one who acquires an unmarked duplicate from a transferor who knew the facts and would therefore himself have had no cause of action against the issuer of the duplicate. Ordinarily the transferee of a nonnegotiable document acquires only the rights of his transferor.

3. Overissue is defined so as to exclude the common situation where two valid documents of different issuers are outstanding for the same goods at the same time. Thus freight forwarders commonly issue bills of lading to their customers for small shipments to be combined into carload shipments for which the railroad will issue a bill of lading to the forwarder. So also a warehouse receipt may be outstanding against goods, and the holder of the receipt may issue delivery orders against the same goods. In these cases dealings with the subsequently issued documents may be effective to transfer title; e.g., negotiation of a delivery order will effectively transfer title in the ordinary case where no dishonesty has occurred and the goods are available to satisfy the orders. Section 30-7-503 provides for cases of conflict between documents of different issuers.

30-7-403. Obligation of warehouseman or carrier to deliver — excuse.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 8 through 12, 16 and 19, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Sections 11 through 15, 19 and 22, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Consolidated and rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

1. The general and primary purpose of this revision is to simplify the statement of the bailee's obligation on the document. The interrelations of the separate sections of the old uniform acts dealing with "obligation to deliver," "justification in delivering," and "liability for misdelivery" are obscure. The present section is constructed on the basis of stating what previous deliveries or other circumstances operate to excuse the bailee's normal obligation on the document. Accordingly, "justified" deliveries under the old uniform acts now find their place as "excuse" under subsection (1). Unjustified deliveries, i.e., "misdeliveries" under the old acts, are simply omitted from the list of excuses, thus permitting the normal obligation on the document to be asserted.

2. The principal case covered by subsection (1)(a) is delivery to a person whose title is paramount to the rights represented by the document. For example, if a thief deposits stolen goods in a warehouse and takes a negotiable receipt, the warehouseman is not liable on the receipt if he has surrendered the goods to the true owner, even though the receipt is held by a good faith purchaser. See Section 30-7-503(1). However, if the owner entrusted the goods to a person with power of disposition, and that person deposited the goods and took a negotiable document, the owner's receipt would not be rightful as against a holder to whom the negotiable document was duly negotiated, and delivery to the owner would not give the bailee a defense against such a holder. See Sections 30-7-502(1)(b), 30-7-503(1)(a).

3. Subsection (1)(b) amounts to a cross reference to all the tort law that determines the varying responsibilities and standards of care applicable to commercial bailees. A restatement of this tort law would be beyond the scope of this Act. Much of the applicable law as to responsibility of bailees for the preservation of the goods and limitation of liability in case of loss has been codified for particular classes of bailees in interstate and foreign commerce by federal legislation and treaty and for intrastate carriers and other bailees by the regulatory state laws preserved by Section 30-7-103. In the absence of governing legislation the common law will prevail subject to the minimum standard of reasonable care prescribed by Sections 30-7-204 and 30-7-309 of this Chapter. The optional language in subsection (1)(b) states the rule laid down for interstate carriers in many federal cases. State decisions are in conflict as to both carriers and warehousemen. Particular states may prefer to adopt the federal rule.

4. Subsection (2) eliminates the implication of the old uniform acts that a request for delivery must be accompanied by a formal tender of the amount of the charges due. Rather, the bailee must request payment of the amount of his lien when asked to deliver, and only in case this request is refused is he justified in declining to deliver because of nonpayment of charges. Where delivery without payment is forbidden by law, the request is treated as implicit. Such a prohibition reflects a policy of uniformity to prevent discrimination by failure to request payment in particular cases.

5. Subsection (3) states the obvious duty of a bailee to take up a negotiable document or note partial deliveries conspicuously thereon, and the result of failure in that duty. It is subject to only one exception, that stated in subsection 1(a) of this section and in Section 30-7-503(1). It is limited to cases of delivery to a claimant; it has no application, for example, where goods held under a negotiable document are lawfully sold to enforce the bailee's lien.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 10, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Section 13, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Consolidated and rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

The generalized test of good faith and observance of reasonable commercial standards is substituted for the attempts to particularize what constitutes good faith in the cited sections of the old uniform acts. The section states explicitly what is perhaps an implication from the old acts that the common law rule of "innocent conversion" by unauthorized "intermeddling" with another's property is inapplicable to the operations of commercial carriers and warehousemen, who in good faith and with reasonable observance of commercial standards perform obligations which they have assumed and which generally they are under a legal compulsion to assume. The section applies to delivery to a fraudulent holder of a valid document as well as to delivery to the holder of an invalid document.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 28, 29, 31, 32 and 38, Uniform Sales Act; Sections 37, 38, 39, 40 and 47, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Sections 9, 28, 29, 30, 31 and 38, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Consolidated and rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

1. In general this section is intended to clarify the language of the old acts and to restate the effect of the better decisions thereunder. An important new concept is added, however, in the requirement of "regular course of business or financing" to effect the "due negotiation" which will transfer greater rights than those held by the person negotiating. The foundation of the mercantile doctrine of good faith purchase for value has always been, as shown by the case situations, the furtherance and protection of the regular course of trade. The reason for allowing a person, in bad faith or in error, to convey away rights which are not his own has from the beginning been to make possible the speedy handling of that great run of commercial transactions which are patently usual and normal.

There are two aspects to the usual and normal course of mercantile dealings, namely, the person making the transfer and the nature of the transaction itself. The first question which arises is: Is the transferor a person with whom it is reasonable to deal as having full powers? In regard to documents of title the only holder whose possession appears, commercially, to be in order is almost invariably a person in the trade. No commercial purpose is served by allowing a tramp or a professor to "duly negotiate" an order bill of lading for hides or cotton not his own, and since such a transfer is obviously not in the regular course of business, it is excluded from the scope of the protection of subsection (4).

The second question posed by the "regular course" qualification is: Is the transaction one which is normally proper to pass full rights without inquiry, even though the transferor himself may not have such rights to pass, and even though he may be acting in breach of duty? In raising this question the "regular course" criterion has the further advantage of limiting the effective wrongful disposition to transactions whose protection will really further trade. Obviously, the snapping up of goods for quick resale at a price suspiciously below the market deserves no protection as a matter of policy: it is also clearly outside the range of regular course.

Any notice from the face of the document sufficient to put a merchant on inquiry as to the "regular course" quality of the transaction will frustrate a "due negotiation". Thus irregularity of the document on its face or unexplained staleness of a bill of lading may appropriately be recognized as negating a negotiation in "regular" course.

A pre-existing claim constitutes value, and "due negotiation" does not require "new value." A usual and ordinary transaction in which documents are received as security for credit previously extended may be in "regular" course, even though there is a demand for additional collateral because the creditor "deems himself insecure." But the matter has moved out of the regular course of financing if the debtor is thought to be insolvent, the credit previously extended is in effect cancelled, and the creditor snatches a plank in the shipwreck under the guise of a demand for additional collateral. Where a money debt is "paid" in commodity paper, any question of "regular" course disappears, as the case is explicitly excepted from "due negotiation".

2. Negotiation under this section may be made by any holder no matter how he acquired possession of the document. The present section follows in this respect the Uniform Bills of Lading Act and amendments of the original Uniform Sales Act and Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act proposed by the Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in 1922.

3. Subsection (2)(b) makes explicit a matter upon which the intent of the old acts was clear but the language somewhat obscure: a negotiation results from a delivery to a banker or buyer to whose order the document has been taken by the person making the bailment. There is no presumption of irregularity in such a negotiation; it may very well be in "regular course."

4. This Chapter does not contain any provision creating a presumption of due negotiation to, and full rights in, a holder of a document of title akin to that created by Sections 16, 24 and 59 of the Negotiable Instruments Law. But the reason of the provisions of this Act (Section 30-1-202) on the prima facie authenticity and accuracy of third party documents, joins with the reason of the present section to work such a presumption in favor of any person who has power to make a due negotiation. It would not make sense for this Act to authorize a purchaser to indulge the presumption of regularity if the courts were not also called upon to do so.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Sections 20(4), 25, 33, 38 and 62, Uniform Sales Act; Sections 41, 47, 48 and 49, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Sections 32, 38, 39, 40 and 42, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

1. The several necessary qualifications of the broad principle that the holder of a document acquired in a due negotiation is the owner of the document and the goods have been brought together in the next section.

2. Subsection (1)(c) covers the case of "feeding" of a duly negotiated document by subsequent delivery to the bailee of such goods as the document falsely purported to cover; the bailee in such case is estopped as against the holder of the document.

3. The explicit statement in subsection (1)(d) of the bailee's direct obligation to the holder precludes the defense, sometimes successfully asserted under the old acts, that the document in question was "spent" after the carrier had delivered the goods to a previous holder. But the holder is subject to such defenses as non-negligent destruction even though not apparent on the face of the document, and the bailee's obligation is of course subject to lawful provisions in filed classifications and tariffs. See Sections 30-7-103, 30-7-403. The sentence on delivery orders applies only to delivery orders in negotiable form which have been duly negotiated. On delivery orders, see also Section 30-7-503(2) and Comment.

4. Subsection (2) condenses and continues the law of a number of sections of the prior acts which gave full effect to the issuance or due negotiation of a negotiable document. The subsection adds nothing to the effect of the rules stated in subsection (1), but it has been included since such explicit references were relied upon under the prior acts to preserve the rights of a purchaser by due negotiation unimpaired. The listing is not exhaustive. Only those matters have been repeated in this subsection which were explicitly reserved in the prior acts except in the case of stoppage in transit. Here, the language has been broadened to include "any stoppage" lest an inference be drawn that a stoppage of the goods before or after transit might cut off or otherwise impair the purchaser's rights.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 33, Uniform Sales Act; Section 41, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Section 32, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Subsection (1) narrows, as compared to the cited sections, the occasions for defeating the document holder's title.

Purposes of Changes:

1. In general it may be said that the title of a purchaser by due negotiation prevails over almost any interest in the goods which existed prior to the procurement of the document of title if the possession of the goods by the person obtaining the document derived from any action by the prior claimant which introduced the goods into the stream of commerce or carried them along that stream. A thief of the goods cannot indeed by shipping or storing them to his own order acquire power to transfer them to a good faith purchaser. Nor can a tenant or mortgagor defeat any rights of a landlord or mortgagee which have been perfected under the local law merely by wrongfully shipping or storing a portion of the crop or other goods. However, "acquiescence" by the landlord or tenant does not require active consent under subsection (1)(b) and knowledge of the likelihood of storage or shipment with no objection or effort to control it is sufficient to defeat his rights as against one who takes by "due" negotiation of a negotiable document.

On the other hand, where goods are delivered to a factor for sale, even though the factor has made no advances and is limited in his duty to sell for cash, the goods are "entrusted" to him "with actual . . . authority . . . to sell" under subsection (1)(a), and if he procures a negotiable document of title he can transfer the owner's interest to a purchaser by due negotiation. Further, where the factor is in the business of selling, goods entrusted to him simply for safekeeping or storage may be entrusted under circumstances which give him "apparent authority to ship, store or sell" under subsection (1)(a), or power of disposition under Section 30-2-403, 30-7-205 or 30-9-307 [now repealed, see 30-9A-320], or under a statute such as the earlier Factors Acts, or under a rule of law giving effect to apparent ownership. See Section 30-1-103.

Persons having an interest in goods also frequently deliver or entrust them to agents or servants other than factors for the purpose of shipping or warehousing or under circumstances reasonably contemplating such action. Rounding out the case law development under the prior Acts, this Act is clear that such persons assume full risk that the agent to whom the goods are so delivered may ship or store in breach of duty, take a document to his own order and then proceed to misappropriate it. This Act makes no distinction between possession or mere custody in such situations and finds no exception in the case of larceny by a bailee or the like. The safeguard in such situations lies in the requirement that a due negotiation can occur only "in the regular course of business or financing" and that the purchase be in good faith and without notice. See Section 30-7-501. Documents of title have no market among the commercially inexperienced and the commercially experienced do not take them without inquiry from persons known to be truck drivers or petty clerks even though such persons purport to be operating in their own names.

Again, where the seller allows a buyer to receive goods under a contract for sale, though as a "conditional delivery" or under "cash sale" terms and on explicit agreement for immediate payment, the buyer thereby acquires power to defeat the seller's interest by transfer of the goods to certain good faith purchasers. See Section 30-2-403. Both in policy and under the language of subsection (1)(a) that same power must be extended to accomplish the same result if the buyer procures a negotiable document of title to the goods and duly negotiates it.

2. Under subsection (1) a delivery order issued by a person having no right in or power over the goods is ineffective unless the owner acts as provided in subsection (1)(a) or (b). Thus the rights of a transferee of a non-negotiable warehouse receipt can be defeated by a delivery order subsequently issued by the transferor only if the transferee "delivers or entrusts" to the "person procuring" the delivery order or "acquiesces" in his procurement. Similarly, a second delivery order issued by the same issuer for the same goods will ordinarily be subject to the first, both under this section and under Section 30-7-402. After a delivery order is validly issued but before it is accepted, it may nevertheless be defeated under subsection (2) in much the same way that the rights of a transferee may be defeated under Section 30-7-504. For example, a buyer in ordinary course from the issuer may defeat the rights of the holder of a prior delivery order if the bailee receives notification of the buyer's rights before notification of the holder's rights. Section 30-7-504(2)(b). But an accepted delivery order has the same effect as a document issued by the bailee.

3. Under subsection (3) a bill of lading issued to a freight forwarder is subordinated to the freight forwarder's certificate, since the bill on its face gives notice of the fact that a freight forwarder is in the picture and has in all probability issued a certificate. But the carrier is protected in following the terms of its own bill of lading.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 34, Uniform Sales Act; Sections 41(b) and 42, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Sections 32(b) and 33, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Generally rewritten; Subsection (3) is new.

Purposes of Changes and New Matter:

1. Under the general principles controlling negotiable documents, it is clear that in the absence of due negotiation a transferor cannot convey greater rights than he himself has, even when the negotiation is formally perfect. This section recognizes the transferor's power to transfer rights which he himself has or has "actual authority to convey." Thus, where a negotiable document of title is being transferred the operation of the principle of estoppel is not recognized, as contrasted with situations involving the transfer of the goods themselves. (Compare Section 30-2-403 on good faith purchase of goods.)

A necessary part of the price for the protection of regular dealings with negotiable documents of title is an insistence that no dealing which is in any way irregular shall be recognized as a good faith purchase of the document or of any rights pertaining to it. So, where the transfer of a negotiable document fails as a negotiation because a requisite indorsement is forged or otherwise missing, the purchaser in good faith and for value may be in the anomalous position of having less rights, in part, than if he had purchased the goods themselves. True, his rights are not subject to defeat by attachment of the goods or surrender of them to his transferor [Contrast subsection (2)]; but on the other hand, he cannot acquire enforceable rights to control or receive the goods over the bailee's objection merely by giving notice to the bailee. Similarly, a consignee who makes payment to his consignor against a straight bill of lading can thereby acquire the position of a good faith purchaser of goods under provisions of the Chapter of this Act on Sales (Section 30-2-403), whereas the same payment made in good faith against an unindorsed order bill would not have such effect. The appropriate remedy of a purchaser in such a situation is to regularize his status by compelling indorsement of the document (see Section 30-7-506).

2. As in the case of transfer—as opposed to "due negotiation"—of negotiable documents, subsection (1) empowers the transferor of a nonnegotiable document to transfer only such rights as he himself has or has "actual authority" to convey. In contrast to situations involving the goods themselves the operation of estoppel or agency principles is not here recognized to enable the transferor to convey greater rights than he actually has. Subsection (2) makes it clear, however, that the transferee of a nonnegotiable document may acquire rights greater in some respects than those of his transferor by giving notice of the transfer to the bailee.

3. Subsection (3) is in part a reiteration of the carrier's immunity from liability if it honors instructions of the consignor to divert, but there is added a provision protecting the title of the substituted consignee if the latter is a buyer in ordinary course of business. A typical situation would be where a manufacturer, having shipped a lot of standardized goods to A on nonnegotiable bill of lading, diverts the goods to customer B who pays for them. Under orthodox passage-of-title-by-appropriation doctrine A might reclaim the goods from B. However, no consideration of commercial policy supports this involvement of an innocent third party in the default of the manufacturer on his contract to A; and the common commercial practice of diverting goods in transit suggests a trade understanding in accordance with this subsection.

4. Subsection (4) gives the carrier an express right to indemnity where he honors a seller's request to stop delivery.

5. Section 30-1-201(27) gives the bailee protection, if due diligence is exercised, similar to that found in the third paragraph of Section 33, Uniform Bills of Lading Act, where the bailee's organization has not had time to act on a notification.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 37, Uniform Sales Act; Section 45, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Section 36, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: No substantial change.

Purposes of Changes:

The indorsement of a document of title is generally understood to be directed towards perfecting the transferee's rights rather than towards assuming additional obligations. The language of the present section, however, does not preclude the one case in which an indorsement given for value guarantees future action, namely, that in which the bailee has not yet become liable upon the document at the time of the indorsement. Under such circumstances the indorser, of course, engages that appropriate honor of the document by the bailee will occur. See Section 30-7-502(1) (d) as to negotiable delivery orders. However, even in such a case, once the bailee attorns to the transferee, the indorser's obligation has been fulfilled and the policy of this section excludes any continuing obligation on the part of the indorser for the bailee's ultimate actual performance.

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 35, Uniform Sales Act; Section 43, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Section 34, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Consolidated and rewritten; former requirement that transfer be "for value" eliminated.

Purposes of Changes:

1. From a commercial point of view the intention to transfer a negotiable document of title which requires an indorsement for its transfer, is incompatible with an intention to withhold such indorsement and so defeat the effective use of the document. This position is sustained by the absence of any reported case applying the prior provisions in almost forty years of decisions. Further, the preceding section and the Comment thereto make it clear that an indorsement generally imposes no responsibility on the indorser.

2. Although this section provides that delivery of a document of title without the necessary indorsement is effective as a transfer, the transferee, of course, has not regularized his position until such indorsement is supplied. Until this is done he cannot claim rights under due negotiation within the requirements of this Chapter (subsection (4) of Section 30-7-501) on "due negotiation." Similarly, despite the transfer to him of his transferor's title, he cannot demand the goods from the bailee until the negotiation has been completed and the document is in proper form for surrender. See Section 30-7-403(2).

Official Comment

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 36, Uniform Sales Act; Section 44, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Section 35, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Consolidated and rewritten without change in policy.

Purposes of Changes:

1. This section omits provisions of the prior acts on warranties as to the goods as unnecessary and incomplete. It is unnecessary because such warranties derive from the contract of sale and not from the transfer of the documents. The fact that transfer of control occurs by way of a document of title does not limit or displace the ordinary obligations of a seller. The former provision, moreover, was incomplete because it did not expressly include all of the warranties which might rest upon a seller under such circumstances. This Act handles the problem by means of the precautionary reference to "any warranty made in selling the goods." If the transfer of documents attends or follows the making of a contract for the sale of goods, the general obligations on warranties as to the goods (Sections 30-2-312 through 30-2-318) are brought to bear as well as the special warranties under this section.

2. The limited warranties of a delivering or collecting intermediary are stated in Section 30-7-508.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 14, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Section 17, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes:

General Revision. Principal innovations include: affirmation of bailee's privilege to deliver to claimant without resort to judicial proceedings if the bailee acts in good faith and is willing to take the full risk of loss in case the lost document turns up in the hands of an innocent purchaser; explicit authorization to the court to order bailee to issue a substitute document rather than make physical delivery of the goods; inclusion of "stolen" as well as lost documents; extension of section to non-negotiable documents.

Purposes of Changes: The purposes of the changes insofar as they are not self-evident are as follows:

1. As to bailee's privilege to deliver without court order, doubt had arisen as to the propriety of such action under Section 54 of the Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act, which made it a crime to deliver goods covered by negotiable receipts without taking up the receipts "except in the cases provided for in Section 14" (the lost receipts section). This has been interpreted by one court as exempting from criminal liability only if the judicial procedure of Section 14 was followed. Dahl v. Winter-Truesdell-Diercks Co., 61 N.D. 84, 237 N.W. 202 (1931). Although the criminal provisions are not being re-enacted in this Act (and the Uniform Bills of Lading Act never did include such a criminal provision), it seems advisable to clarify the legality of the well established commercial practice of bailees to make delivery where they are satisfied that the claimant is the person entitled under a lost document. Since the bailee remains liable on the document in such cases, he will usually insist that the claimant provide an indemnity bond.

2. The old acts provide only for compulsory delivery of goods; this Section provides also for compulsory issuance of a substitute document. If continuance of the bailment is desirable there is no reason to require the goods to be withdrawn and redeposited in order to secure a negotiable document. The present acts would probably be so interpreted. Section 20 of the Federal Warehouse Act and some state laws expressly require issuance of a new receipt on proof of loss and posting of bond.

3. Claimants on non-negotiable instruments are permitted to avail themselves of this procedure because straight bills of lading sometimes contain provisions that the goods shall not be delivered except upon production of the bill. If the carrier should choose to insist upon production of the bill, the consignee should have some means of compelling delivery on satisfactory proof of entitlement.

Ordinarily no security would be necessary to indemnify a bailee in delivering to the person named in a non-negotiable document. But disputes as to negotiability may arise, in which case if there is a reasonable doubt on the point the bailee should be protected against the possibility that the missing document would, in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value, be held negotiable.

4. It seems unnecessary to state, as do the present acts, that the court shall act "on satisfactory proof of such loss or destruction." The right of action created by the section is conditioned on a document being lost, stolen or destroyed. Plaintiff must of course bring himself within the section. There is nothing in the language of the old acts to suggest that they intended to impose anything but the normal burden of proof on the plaintiff in such proceedings.

5. Subsection (2) makes it clear that after delivery without court order the bailee remains liable for actual damages. Liability for conversion is provided where the delivery is dishonest, but excluded where a filed classification or tariff is followed in good faith, or where the described bond is posted in good faith and no classification or tariff is filed. Liability for conversion in other cases is left to judicial decision.

Prior Uniform Statutory Provision: Section 25, Uniform Warehouse Receipts Act; Section 24, Uniform Bills of Lading Act.

Changes: Consolidated and rewritten.

Purposes of Changes:

1. The purpose of the section is to protect the bailee from conflicting claims of the document holder and the judgment creditors of the person who deposited the goods. The rights of the former prevail unless, in effect, the judgment creditors immobilize the negotiable document. However, if the document was issued upon deposit of the goods by a person who had no power to dispose of the goods so that the document is ineffective to pass title, judgment liens are valid to the extent of the debtor's interest in the goods.

2. The last sentence covers the possibility that the holder of a document who has been enjoined from negotiating it will violate the injunction by negotiating to an innocent purchaser for value. In such case the lien will be defeated.

CHAPTER 8
UNIFORM COMMERCIAL CODE
INVESTMENT SECURITIES

Chapter Official Comment

Reporter's Prefatory Note to 1997 Revision:

The present version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is the product of a major revision made necessary by the fact that the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] did not adequately deal with the system of securities holding through securities intermediaries that has developed in the past few decades. Although the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] did contain some provisions dealing with securities holding through securities intermediaries, these were engrafted onto a structure designed for securities practices of earlier times. The resulting legal uncertainties adversely affected all participants. The revision is intended to eliminate these uncertainties by providing a modern legal structure for current securities holding practices.

I. EVOLUTION OF SECURITIES HOLDING SYSTEMS

A. The Traditional Securities Holding System

The original version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], drafted in the 1940s and 1950s, was based on the assumption that possession and delivery of physical certificates are the key elements in the securities holding system. Ownership of securities was traditionally evidenced by possession of the certificates, and changes were accomplished by delivery of the certificates.

Transfer of securities in the traditional certificate-based system was a complicated, labor-intensive process. Each time securities were traded, the physical certificates had to be delivered from the seller to the buyer, and in the case of registered securities the certificates had to be surrendered to the issuer or its transfer agent for registration of transfer. As is well known, the mechanical problems of processing the paperwork for securities transfers reached crisis proportions in the late 1960s, leading to calls for the elimination of the physical certificate and development of modern electronic systems for recording ownership of securities and transfers of ownership. That was the focus of the revision effort that led to the promulgation of the 1978 amendments to Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] concerning uncertificated securities.

B. The Uncertificated Securities System Envisioned by the 1978 Amendments

In 1978, amendments to Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] were approved to establish the commercial law rules that were thought necessary to permit the evolution of a system in which issuers would no longer issue certificates. The Drafting Committee that produced the 1978 amendments was given a fairly limited charge. It was to draft the revisions that would be needed for uncertificated securities, but otherwise leave the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules unchanged. Accordingly, the 1978 amendments primarily took the form of adding parallel provisions dealing with uncertificated securities to the existing rules of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] on certificated securities.

The system of securities holding contemplated by the 1978 amendments differed from the traditional system only in that ownership of securities would not be evidenced by physical certificates. It was contemplated that changes in ownership would continue to be reflected by changes in the records of the issuer. The main difference would be that instead of surrendering an indorsed certificate for registration of transfer, an instruction would be sent to the issuer directing it to register the transfer. Although a system of the sort contemplated by the 1978 amendments may well develop in the coming decades, this has not yet happened for most categories of securities. Mutual funds shares have long been issued in uncertificated form, but virtually all other forms of publicly traded corporate securities are still issued in certificated form. Individual investors who wish to be recorded as registered owners on the issuers' books still obtain and hold physical certificates. The certificates representing the largest portion of the shares of publicly traded companies, however, are not held by the beneficial owners, but by clearing corporations. Settlement of securities trading occurs not by delivery of certificates or by registration of transfer on the records of the issuers or their transfer agents, but by computer entries in the records of clearing corporations and securities intermediaries. That is quite different from the system envisioned by the 1978 amendments.

C. Evolution of the Indirect Holding System

At the time of the "paperwork crunch" in the late 1960s, the trading volume on the New York Stock Exchange that so seriously strained the capacities of the clearance and settlement system was in the range of 10 million shares per day. Today, the system can easily handle trading volume on routine days of hundreds of millions of shares. This processing capacity could have been achieved only by the application of modern electronic information processing systems. Yet the legal rules under which the system operates are not the uncertificated securities provisions of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. To understand why this is so, one must delve at least a bit deeper into the operations of the current system.

If one examines the shareholder records of large corporations whose shares are publicly traded on the exchanges or in the over the counter market, one would find that one entity—Cede & Co.—is listed as the shareholder of record of somewhere in the range of sixty to eighty per cent of the outstanding shares of all publicly traded companies. Cede & Co. is the nominee name used by The Depository Trust Company ("DTC"), a limited purpose trust company organized under New York law for the purpose of acting as a depository to hold securities for the benefit of its participants, some 600 or so broker-dealers and banks. Essentially all of the trading in publicly held companies is executed through the broker-dealers who are participants in DTC, and the great bulk of public securities—the sixty to eighty per cent figure noted above—are held by these broker-dealers and banks on behalf of their customers. If all of these broker-dealers and banks held physical certificates, then as trades were executed each day it would be necessary to deliver the certificates back and forth among these broker-dealers and banks. By handing all of their securities over to a common depository all of these deliveries can be eliminated. Transfers can be accomplished by adjustments to the participants' DTC accounts.

Although the use of a common depository eliminates the needs for physical deliveries, an enormous number of entries would still have to be made on DTC's books if each transaction between its participants were recorded one by one on DTC's books. Any two major broker-dealers may have executed numerous trades with each other in a given security on a single day. Significant processing efficiency has been achieved by netting all of the transactions among the participants that occur each day, so that entries need be made on the depository's books only for the net changes in the positions of each participant at the end of each day. This clearance and netting function might well be performed by the securities exchanges or by the same institution that acts as the depository, as is the case in many other securities markets around the world. In the United States, however, this clearance and netting function is carried out by a separate corporation, National Securities Clearing Corporation ("NSCC"). All that needs to be done to settle each day's trading is for NSCC to compute the net receive and deliver obligations and to instruct DTC to make the corresponding adjustments in the participants' accounts.

The broker-dealers and banks who are participants in the DTCNSCC system in turn provide analogous clearance and settlement functions to their own customers. If Customer A buys 100 shares of XYZ Co. through Broker, and Customer B sells 100 shares of XYZ Co. through the same Broker, the trade can be settled by entries on Broker's books. Neither DTC's books showing Broker's total position in XYZ Co., nor XYZ Co.'s books showing DTC's total position in XYZ Co., need be changed to reflect the settlement of this trade. One can readily appreciate the significance of the settlement function performed at this level if one considers that a single major bank may be acting as securities custodian for hundreds or thousands of mutual funds, pension funds, and other institutional investors. On any given day, the customers of that bank may have entered into an enormous number of trades, yet it is possible that relatively little of this trading activity will result in any net change in the custodian bank's positions on the books of DTC.

Settlement of market trading in most of the major U.S. securities markets is now effected primarily through some form of netted clearance and depository system. Virtually all publicly traded corporate equity securities, corporate debt securities, and municipal debt securities are now eligible for deposit in the DTC system. Recently, DTC has implemented a similar depository settlement system for the commercial paper market, and could, but for limitations in present Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], handle other forms of short-term money market securities such as bankers' acceptances. For trading in mortgage-backed securities, such as Ginnie Mae's, a similar depository settlement system has been developed by Participants Trust Company. For trading in U.S. Treasury securities, a somewhat analogous book-entry system is operated under Treasury rules by the Federal Reserve System.

D. Need for Different Legal Rules for the Direct and Indirect Holding Systems

Both the traditional paper-based system, and the uncertificated system contemplated by the 1978 amendments, can be described as "direct" securities holding systems; that is, the beneficial owners of securities have a direct relationship with the issuer of the securities. For securities in bearer form, whoever has possession of the certificate thereby has a direct claim against the issuer. For registered securities, the registered owner, whether of certificated or uncertificated securities, has a direct relationship with the issuer by virtue of being recorded as the owner on the records maintained by the issuer or its transfer agent.

By contrast, the DTC depository system for corporate equity and debt securities can be described as an "indirect holding" system, that is, the issuer's records do not show the identity of all of the beneficial owners. Instead, a large portion of the outstanding securities of any given issue are recorded on the issuer's records as belonging to a depository. The depository's records in turn show the identity of the banks or brokers who are its members, and the records of those securities intermediaries show the identity of their customers.

Even after the 1978 amendments, the rules of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] did not deal effectively with the indirect holding system. The rules of the 1978 version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] were based on the assumption that changes in ownership of securities would still be effected either by delivery of physical certificates or by registration of transfer on the books of the issuer. Yet in the indirect holding system, settlement of the vast majority of securities trades does not involve either of these events. For most, if not all, of the securities held through DTC, physical certificates representing DTC's total position do exist. These "jumbo certificates," however, are never delivered from person to person. Just as nothing ever happens to these certificates, virtually nothing happens to the official registry of stockholders maintained by the issuers or their transfer agents to reflect the great bulk of the changes in ownership of shares that occur each day.

The principal mechanism through which securities trades are settled today is not delivery of certificates or registration of transfers on the issuer's books, but netted settlement arrangements and accounting entries on the books of a multi-tiered pyramid of securities intermediaries. Herein is the basic problem. Virtually all of the rules of the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] specifying how changes in ownership of securities are effected, and what happens if something goes awry in the process, were keyed to the concepts of a transfer of physical certificates or registration of transfers on the books of the issuers, yet that is not how changes in ownership are actually reflected in the modern securities holding system.

II. BRIEF OVERVIEW OF REVISED ARTICLE 8 [TITLE 30, CHAPTER 8]

A. Drafting Approach—Neutrality Principle

One of the objectives of the revision of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is to devise a structure of commercial law rules for investment securities that will be sufficiently flexible to respond to changes in practice over the next few decades. If it were possible to predict with confidence how the securities holding and trading system would develop, one could produce a statute designed specifically for the system envisioned. Recent experience, however, shows the danger of that approach. The 1978 amendments to Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] were based on the assumption that the solution to the problems that plagued the paper-based securities trading system of the 1960s would be the development of uncertificated securities. Instead, the solution thus far has been the development of the indirect holding system.

If one thought that the indirect holding system would come to dominate securities holding, one might draft Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules designed primarily for the indirect holding system, giving limited attention to the traditional direct holding system of security certificates or any uncertificated version of a direct holding system that might develop in the future. It is, however, by no means clear whether the long-term evolution will be toward decreased or increased use of direct holdings. At present, investors in most equity securities can either hold their securities through brokers or request that certificates be issued in their own name. For the immediate future it seems likely that that situation will continue. One can imagine many plausible scenarios for future evolution. Direct holding might become less and less common as investors become more familiar and comfortable with book-entry systems and/or as market or regulatory pressures develop that discourage direct holding. One might note, for example, that major brokerage firms are beginning to impose fees for having certificates issued and that some observers have suggested that acceleration of the cycle for settlement of securities trades might be facilitated by discouraging customers from obtaining certificates. On the other hand, other observers feel that it is important for investors to retain the option of holding securities in certificated form, or at least in some form that gives them a direct relationship with the issuer and does not require them to hold through brokers or other securities intermediaries. Some groups within the securities industry are beginning to work on development of uncertificated systems that would preserve this option.

Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] takes a neutral position on the evolution of securities holding practices. The revision was based on the assumption that the path of development will be determined by market and regulatory forces and that the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules should not seek to influence that development in any specific direction. Although various drafting approaches were considered, it became apparent early in the revision process that the differences between the direct holding system and the indirect holding system are sufficiently significant that it is best to treat them as separate systems requiring different legal concepts. Accordingly, while the rules of the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] have, in large measure, been retained for the direct holding system, a new Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] has been added, setting out the commercial law rules for the indirect securities holding system. The principle of neutrality does carry some implications for the design of specific Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules. At the very least, the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules for all securities holding systems should be sufficiently clear and predictable that uncertainty about the governing law does not itself operate as a constraint on market developments. In addition, an effort has been made to identify and eliminate any Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules that might act as impediments to any of the foreseeable paths of development.

B. Direct Holding System

With respect to securities held directly, Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] retains the basic conceptual structure and rules of present law. Part 2 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 2], which is largely unchanged from former law, deals with certain aspects of the obligations of issuers. The primary purpose of the rules of Part 2 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 2] is to apply to investment securities the principles of negotiable instruments law that preclude the issuers of negotiable instruments from asserting defenses against subsequent purchasers. Part 3 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 3] deals with transfer for securities held directly. One of its principal purposes is to apply to investment securities the principles of negotiable instruments law that protect purchasers of negotiable instruments against adverse claims. Part 4 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 4] deals with the process of registration of transfer by the issuer or transfer agent.

Although the basic concepts of the direct holding system rules have been retained, there are significant changes in terminology, organization, and statement of the rules. Some of the major changes are as follows:

Simplification of Part 3 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 3]. The addition of the new Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] on the indirect holding system makes unnecessary the rather elaborate provisions of former law, such as those in Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313], that sought to fit the indirect holding system into the conceptual structure of the direct holding system. Thus, Part 3 of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 3] is, in many respects, more similar to the original version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] than to the 1978 version.

Protected purchaser. The prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] used the term "bona fide purchaser" to refer to those purchasers who took free from adverse claims, and it used the phrase "good faith" in stating the requirements for such status. In order to promote clarity, Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] states the rules that protect purchasers against adverse claims without using the phrase "good faith" and uses the new term "protected purchaser" to refer to purchasers in the direct holding system who are protected against adverse claims. See Sections 8-105 and 8-303 [30-8-115 and 30-8-333].

Certificated versus uncertificated securities. The rules of the 1978 version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] concerning uncertificated securities have been simplified considerably. The 1978 version added provisions on uncertificated securities parallel to the provisions of the original version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] dealing with securities represented by certificates. Thus, virtually every section had one set of rules on "certificated securities" and another on "uncertificated securities." The constant juxtaposition of "certificated securities" and "uncertificated securities" has probably led readers to overemphasize the differences. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] has a unitary definition of "security" in Section 8-102(a)(15) [30-8-112(1)(o)] which refers to the underlying intangible interest or obligation. In Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], the difference between certificated and uncertificated is treated not as an inherent attribute of the security but as a difference in the means by which ownership is evidenced. The terms "certificated" and "uncertificated" security are used in those sections where it is important to distinguish between these two means of evidencing ownership. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] also deletes the provisions of the 1978 version concerning "transaction statements" and "registered pledges." These changes are explained in the Revision Notes 3, 4, and 5, below.

Scope of Parts 2, 3, and 4 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4]. The rules of Parts 2, 3, and 4 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4] deal only with the rights of persons who hold securities directly. In typical securities holding arrangements in the modern depository system, only the clearing corporation would be a direct holder of the securities. Thus, while the rules of Parts 2, 3, and 4 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4] would apply to the relationship between the issuer and the clearing corporation, they have no application to relationships below the clearing corporation level. Under Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], a person who holds a security through a broker or securities custodian has a security entitlement governed by the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules but is not the direct holder of the security. Thus, the rules of Revised Section 8-303 [30-8-333] on the rights of "protected purchasers," which are the analog of the bona fide purchaser rules of former Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], do not apply to persons who hold securities through brokers or securities custodians. Instead, Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] contains its own rules to protect investors in the indirect holding system against adverse claims. See Revised Section 8-502 [30-8-502].

C. Indirect Holding System

Although the Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] provisions for the indirect holding system are somewhat complex, the basic approach taken can be summarized rather briefly. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] abandons the attempt to describe all of the complex relationships in the indirect holding system using the simple concepts of the traditional direct holding system. Instead, new rules specifically designed for the indirect holding system are added as Part 5 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. In a nutshell, the approach is to describe the core of the package of rights of a person who holds a security through a securities intermediary and then give that package of rights a name.

The starting point of Revised Article 8's [Title 30, chapter 8] treatment of the indirect holding system is the concept of "security entitlement." The term is defined in Section 8-102(a)(17) [30-8-112(1)(q)] as "the rights and property interest of an entitlement holder with respect to a financial asset specified in Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]." Like many legal concepts, however, the meaning of "security entitlement" is to be found less in any specific definition than in the matrix of rules that use the term. In a sense, then, the entirety of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] is the definition of "security entitlement" because the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules specify the rights and property interest that comprise a security entitlement.

Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] begins by specifying, in Section 8-501 [30-8-501], when an entitlement holder acquires a security entitlement. The basic rule is very simple. A person acquires a security entitlement when the securities intermediary credits the financial asset to the person's account. The remaining sections of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] specify the content of the security entitlement concept. Section 8-504 [30-8-504] provides that a securities intermediary must maintain a sufficient quantity of financial assets to satisfy the claims of all of its entitlement holders. Section 8-503 [30-8-503] provides that these financial assets are held by the intermediary for the entitlement holders, are not the property of the securities intermediary, and are not subject to claims of the intermediary's general creditors. Thus, a security entitlement is itself a form of property interest not merely an in personam claim against the intermediary. The concept of a security entitlement does, however, include a package of in personam rights against the intermediary. Other Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules identify the core of this package of rights, subject to specification by agreement and regulatory law. See Sections 8-505 through 8-509 [30-8-505 through 30-8-509].

To illustrate the basic features of the new rules, consider a simple example of two investors, John and Mary, each of whom owns 1000 shares of Acme, Inc., a publicly traded company. John has a certificate representing his 1000 shares and is registered on the books maintained by Acme's transfer agent as the holder of record of those 1000 shares. Accordingly, he has a direct claim against the issuer, he receives dividends and distributions directly from the issuer, and he receives proxies directly from the issuer for purposes of voting his shares. Mary has chosen to hold her securities through her broker. She does not have a certificate and is not registered on Acme's stock books as a holder of record. She enjoys the economic and corporate benefits of ownership but does so through her broker and any other intermediaries in the chain back to the issuer. John's interest in Acme common stock would be described under Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] as a direct interest in a "security." Thus, if John grants a security interest in his investment position, the collateral would be described as a "security." Mary's interest in Acme common stock would be described under Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] as a "security entitlement." Thus, if Mary grants a security interest in her investment position, the collateral would be described as a "security entitlement."

For many purposes, there is no need to differentiate among the various ways that an investor might hold securities. For example, for purposes of financial accounting, John and Mary would each be described as the owner of 1000 shares of Acme common stock. For those purposes it is irrelevant that John is the registered owner and has physical possession of a certificate, while Mary holds her position through an intermediary. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] recognizes this point in Section 8-104 [30-8-114] which provides that acquiring a security entitlement and acquiring a security certificate are different ways of acquiring an interest in the underlying security.

D. Security Interests

Along with the revision of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], significant changes have been made in the rules concerning security interests in securities. The revision returns to the pre1978 structure in which the rules on security interests in investment securities are set out in Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A], rather than in Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. The changes in Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] are, in part, conforming changes to adapt Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] to the new concept of a security entitlement. The Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] changes, however, go beyond that to establish a simplified structure for the creation and perfection of security interests in investment securities, whether held directly or indirectly. In order to avoid disruption of the current numbering sequence of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A], the new rules on security interests in investment securities are primarily set out in a new Section 9-115 [30-9-115, now repealed, see 30-9A-106, 30-9A-203, 30-9A-308, 30-9A-309, 30-9A-313, 30-9A-314, and 30-9A-328].

The Revised Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] rules continue the long-established principle that a security interest in a security represented by a certificate can be perfected by a possessory pledge. The revised rules, however, do not require that all security interests in investment securities be implemented by procedures based on the conceptual structure of the common law pledge. Under the revised Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] rules, a security interest in securities can be created pursuant to Section 9-203 [30-9-203, now repealed, see 30-9A-203] in the same fashion as a security interest in any other form of property, that is, by agreement between the debtor and secured party. There is no requirement of a "transfer," "delivery," or any similar action, physical or metaphysical, for the creation of an effective security interest. A security interest in securities is, of course, a form of property interest, but the only requirements for creation of this form of property interest are those set out in Section 9-203 [30-9-203, now repealed, see 30-9A-203].

The perfection methods for security interests in investment securities are set out in Revised Section 9-115(4) [30-9-115(4), now repealed, see 30-9A-309 and 30-9A-314]. The basic rule is that a security interest may be perfected by "control." The concept of control, defined in Section 8-106 [30-8-116], plays an important role in both Article 8 and Article 9 [Title 30, chapters 8 and 9A]. In general, obtaining control means taking the steps necessary to place the lender in a position where it can have the collateral sold off without the further cooperation of the debtor. Thus, for certificated securities, a lender obtains control by taking possession of the certificate with any necessary indorsement. For securities held through a securities intermediary, the lender can obtain control in two ways. First, the lender obtains control if it becomes the entitlement holder; that is, has the securities positions transferred to an account in its own name. Second, the lender obtains control if the securities intermediary agrees to act on instructions from the secured party to dispose of the positions, even though the debtor remains the entitlement holder. Such an arrangement suffices to give the lender control even though the debtor retains the right to trade and exercise other ordinary rights of an entitlement holder.

Except where the debtor is itself a securities firm, filing of an ordinary Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] financing statement is also a permissible alternative method of perfection. However, filing with respect to investment property does not assure the lender the same protections as for other forms of collateral, since the priority rules provide that a secured party who obtains control has priority over a secured party who does not obtain control.

The details of the new rules on security interests, as applied both to the retail level and to arrangements for secured financing of securities dealers, are explained in the Official Comments to Section 9-115 [30-9-115, now repealed, see 30-9A-106, 30-9A-108, 30-9A-203, 30-9A-308, 30-9A-309, 30-9A-313, 30-9A-314, and 30-9A-327 through 30-9A-329].

III. SCOPE AND APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 8 [TITLE 30, CHAPTER 8]

A. Terminology

To understand the scope and application of the rules of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], and the related security interest rules of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A], it is necessary to understand some of the key defined terms:

Security, defined in Section 8-102(a)(15) [30-8-112(1)(o)], has essentially the same meaning as under the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. The difference in Revised Article 8

[Title 30, chapter 8] is that the definition of security does not determine the coverage of all of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Although the direct holding system rules in Parts 2, 3, and 4 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4] apply only to securities, the indirect holding system rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] apply to the broader category of "financial assets."

Financial asset, defined in Section 8-103(a)(9) [30-8-113(1)(i)], is the term used to describe the forms of property to which the indirect holding system rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] apply. The term includes not only "securities," but also other interests, obligations, or property that are held through securities accounts. The best illustration of the broader scope of the term financial asset is the treatment of money market instruments, discussed below.

Security entitlement, defined in Section 8-103(a)(17) [sic] [30-8-112(1)(q)], is the term used to describe the property interest of a person who holds a security or other financial asset through a securities intermediary.

Securities intermediary, defined in Section 8-103(a)(14) [sic] [30-8-112(1)(n)], is the term used for those who hold securities for others in the indirect holding system. It covers clearing corporations, banks acting as securities custodians, and brokers holding securities for their customers.

Entitlement holder, defined in Section 8-103(a)(7) [sic] [30-8-112(1)(g)], is the term used for those who hold securities through intermediaries.

Securities account, defined in Section 8-501(a) [30-8-501(1)], describes the form of arrangement between a securities intermediary and an entitlement holder that gives rise to a security entitlement. As explained below, the definition of securities account plays a key role in setting the scope of the indirect holding system rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5].

Investment property, defined in Section 9-115(1)(f) [30-9-115(1)(f), now repealed, see 30-9A-106, 30-9A-108, 30-9A-203, 30-9A-308, 30-9A-309, 30-9A-313, 30-9A-314, and 30-9A-327 through 30-9A-329]. determines the application of the new Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] rules for secured transactions. In addition to securities and security entitlements, the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] term "investment property" is defined to include "securities account" in order to simplify the drafting of the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] rules that permit debtors to grant security interests either in specific security entitlements or in an entire securities account. The other difference between the coverage of the Article 8 and Article 9 [Title 30, chapters 8 and 9A] terms is that commodity futures contracts are excluded from Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], but are included within the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] definition of "investment property." Thus, the new Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] rules apply to security interests in commodity futures positions as well as security interests in securities positions.

B. Notes on Scope of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]

Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is in no sense a comprehensive codification of the law governing securities or transactions in securities. Although Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deals with some aspects of the rights of securities holders against issuers, most of that relationship is governed not by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] but by corporation, securities, and contract law. Although Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deals with some aspects of the rights and duties of parties who transfer securities, it is not a codification of the law of contracts for the purchase or sale of securities. (The prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] did include a few miscellaneous rules on contracts for the sale of securities, but these have not been included in Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]). Although the new indirect holding system rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] deal with some aspects of the relationship between brokers or other securities professionals and their customers, Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is still not in any sense a comprehensive code of the law governing the relationship between broker-dealers or other securities intermediaries and their customers. Most of the law governing that relationship is the common law of contract and agency, supplemented or supplanted by regulatory law.

The distinction between the aspects of the broker-customer relationship that are and are not dealt with in this Article [chapter] may be illuminated by considering the differing roles of the broker in a typical securities transaction, in which the broker acts as agent for the customer. When a customer directs a broker to buy or sell securities for the customer, and the broker executes that trade on a securities exchange or in the over the counter market, the broker is entering into a contract for the purchase or sale of the securities as agent of the customer. The rules of the exchange, practices of the market, or regulatory law will specify when and how that contract is to be performed. For example, today the terms of the standard contract for trades in most corporate securities require the seller to deliver the securities, and the buyer to pay for them, five business days after the date that the contract was made, although the SEC has recently promulgated a rule that will accelerate the cycle to require settlement in three business days. In the common speech of the industry, the transaction in which the broker enters into a contract for the purchase or sale of the securities is referred to as executing the trade, and the transaction in which the securities are delivered and paid for is referred to as settlement. Thus, the current settlement cycle is known as T[plus]5, that is, settlement is required on the fifth business day after the date of the trade, and the new SEC rule will change it to T[plus]3. One must be careful in moving from the jargon of the securities industry to the jargon of the legal profession. For most practical economic purposes, the trade date is the date that counts, because that is the time at which the price is set, the risk of price changes shifts, and the parties become bound to perform. For purposes of precise legal analysis, however, the securities phrase "trade" or "execute a trade" means enter into a contract for the purchase or sale of the securities. The transfer of property interests occurs not at the time the contract is made but at the time it is performed, that is, at settlement.

The distinction between trade and settlement is important in understanding the scope of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deals with the settlement phase of securities transactions. It deals with the mechanisms by which interests in securities are transferred, and the rights and duties of those who are involved in the transfer process. It does not deal with the process of entering into contracts for the transfer of securities or regulate the rights and duties of those involved in the contracting process. To use securities parlance, Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deals not with the trade, but with settlement of the trade. Indeed, Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] does not even deal with all aspects of settlement. In a netted clearance and settlement system such as the NSCCDTC system, individual trades are not settled one-by-one by corresponding entries on the books of any depository. Rather, settlement of the individual trades occurs through the clearing arrangements, in accordance with the rules and agreements that govern those arrangements.

In the rules dealing with the indirect holding system, one must be particularly careful to bear in mind the distinction between trade and settlement. Under Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], the property interest of a person who holds securities through an intermediary is described as a "security entitlement," which is defined in Revised Section 8-102(a)(17) [30-8-112(1)(q)] as the package of rights and property interest of an entitlement holder specified in Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. Saying that the security entitlement is a package of rights against the broker does not mean that all of the customer's rights against the broker are part of the security entitlement and hence part of the subject matter of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. The distinction between trade and settlement remains fundamental. The rules of this Article [chapter] on the indirect holding system deal with brokers and other intermediaries as media through which investors hold their financial assets. Brokers are also media through which investors buy and sell their financial assets, but that aspect of their role is not the subject of this Article [chapter].

The principal goal of the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] revision project is to provide a satisfactory framework for analysis of the indirect holding system. The technique used in Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is to acknowledge explicitly that the relationship between a securities intermediary and its entitlement holders is sui generis, and to state the applicable commercial law rules directly, rather than by inference from a categorization of the relationship based on legal concepts of a different era. One of the consequences of this drafting technique is that in order to provide content to the concept of security entitlement it becomes necessary to identify the core of the package of rights that make up a security entitlement. Sections 8-504 through 8-508 [30-8-504 through 30-8-508] cover such basic matters as the duty of the securities intermediary to maintain a sufficient quantity of securities to satisfy all of its entitlement holders, the duty of the securities intermediary to pass through to entitlement holder the economic and corporate law rights of ownership of the security, and the duty of the securities intermediary to comply with authorized entitlement orders originated by the entitlement holder. These sections are best thought of as definitional; that is, a relationship which does not include these rights is not the kind of relationship that Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deals with. Because these sections take the form of statements of the duties of an intermediary toward its entitlement holders, one must be careful to avoid a distorted perspective on what Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is and is not designed to do. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is not, and should not be, a comprehensive body of private law governing the relationship between brokers and their customers, nor a body of regulatory law to police against improper conduct by brokers or other intermediaries. Many, if not most, aspects of the relationship between brokers and customers are governed by the common law of contract and agency, supplemented or supplanted by federal and state regulatory law. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] does not take the place of this body of private and regulatory law. If there are gaps in the regulatory law, they should be dealt with as such; Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is not the place to address them.

Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deals with how interests in securities are evidenced and how they are transferred. By way of a rough analogy, one might think of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] as playing the role for the securities markets that real estate recording acts play for the real estate markets. Real estate recording acts do not regulate the conduct of parties to real estate transactions; Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] does not regulate the conduct of parties to securities transactions.

C. Application of Revised Articles 8 and 9 [Title 30, chapters 8 and 9A] to Common Investments and Investment Arrangements

It may aid understanding to sketch briefly the treatment under Revised Articles 8 and 9 [Title 30, chapters 8 and 9A] of a variety of relatively common products and arrangements.

1. Publicly traded stocks and bonds.

"Security" is defined in Revised Section 8-102(a)(15) [30-8-112(1)(o)] in substantially the same terms as in the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. It covers the ordinary publicly traded investment securities, such as corporate stocks and bonds. Parts 2, 3, and 4 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4] govern the interests of persons who hold securities directly, and Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] governs the interest of those who hold securities indirectly.

Ordinary publicly traded securities provide a good illustration of the relationship between the direct and indirect holding system rules. The distinction between the direct and indirect holding systems is not an attribute of the securities themselves but of the way in which a particular person holds the securities. Thus, whether one looks to the direct holding system rules of Parts 2, 3, and 4 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4] or the indirect holding system rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] will depend on the level in the securities holding system being analyzed.

Consider, for example, corporate stock which is held through a depository, such as DTC. The clearing corporation, or its nominee, is the registered owner of all of the securities it holds on behalf of all of its participants. Thus the rules of Parts 2, 3, and 4 of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4] apply to the relationship between the issuer and the clearing corporation. If, as is typically the case today, the securities are still represented by certificates, the clearing corporation will be the holder of the security certificate or certificates representing its total holdings. So far as Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is concerned, the relationship between the issuer and the clearing corporation is no different from the relationship between the issuer and any other registered owner.

The relationship between the clearing corporation and its participants is governed by the indirect holding system rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. At that level, the clearing corporation is the securities intermediary and the participant is the entitlement holder. If the participant is itself a securities intermediary, such as a broker holding for its customers or a bank acting as a securities custodian, the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules apply to its relationship to its own customers. At that level the broker or bank custodian is the securities intermediary and the customer is the entitlement holder. Note that the broker or bank custodian is both an entitlement holder and a securities intermediary—but is so with respect to different security entitlements. For purposes of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] analysis, the customer's security entitlement against the broker or bank custodian is a different item of property from the security entitlement of the broker or bank custodian against the clearing corporation.

For investors who hold their securities directly, it makes no difference that some other investors hold their interests indirectly. Many investors today choose to hold their securities directly, becoming the registered owners on the books of the issuer and obtaining certificates registered in their names. For such investors, the addition of the new indirect holding system rules to Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is entirely irrelevant. They will continue to deal directly with the issuers, or their transfer agents, under essentially the same rules as in the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8].

The securities holding options available to investors in a particular form of security may depend on the terms of the security. For example, direct holding is frequently not available for new issues of state and local government bonds. At one time, state and local government bonds were commonly issued in bearer form. Today, however, new issues of state and local government bonds must be in registered form and most are issued in what is known as "book-entry only" form; that is, the issuer specifies that the only person it will directly register as the registered owner is a clearing corporation. Thus, one of the inherent terms of the security is that investors can hold only in the indirect holding system.

2. Treasury securities.

U.S. government securities fall within the definition of security in Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] and therefore are governed by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] in the same fashion as any other publicly held debt security, except insofar as Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is preempted by applicable federal law or regulation.

New Treasury securities are no longer issued in certificated form; they can be held only through the book-entry systems established by the Treasury and Federal Reserve Banks. The Treasury offers a book-entry system, known as "Treasury Direct" which enables individual investors to have their positions recorded directly on the books of a Federal Reserve Bank, in a fashion somewhat similar to the uncertificated direct holding system contemplated by the 1978 version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. The governing law for the Treasury Direct system, however, is set out in the applicable Treasury regulations. The Treasury Direct system is not designed for active trading.

The great bulk of Treasury securities are held not through the Treasury Direct system but through a multi-tiered indirect holding system. The Federal Reserve Banks, acting as fiscal agent for the Treasury, maintain records of the holdings of member banks of the Federal Reserve System, and those banks in turn maintain records showing the extent to which they are holding for themselves or their own customers, including government securities dealers, institutional investors, or smaller banks who in turn may act as custodians for investors. The indirect holding system for Treasury securities was established under federal regulations promulgated in the 1970s. In the 1980s, Treasury released the proposed TRADES regulations that would have established a more comprehensive body of federal commercial law for the Treasury holding system. During the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] revision process, Treasury withdrew these regulations, anticipating that once Revised Article 8 is enacted, it will be possible to base the law for the Treasury system on the new Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules.

3. Broker-customer relationships.

Whether the relationship between a broker and its customer is governed by the Article 8 Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules depends on the nature of the services that the broker performs for the customer.

Some investors use brokers only to purchase and sell securities. These customers take delivery of certificates representing the securities they purchase and hold them in their own names. When they wish to sell, they deliver the certificates to the brokers. The Article 8 Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules would not affect such customers, because the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules deal with arrangements in which investors hold securities through securities intermediaries. The transaction between the customer and broker might be the traditional agency arrangement in which the broker buys or sells on behalf of the customer as agent for an undisclosed principal, or it might be a dealer transaction in which the "broker" as principal buys from or sells to the customer. In either case, if the customer takes delivery and holds the securities directly, she will become the "purchaser" of a "security" whose interest therein is governed by the rules of Parts 2, 3, and 4 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4]. If the customer meets the other requirements of Section 8-303(a) [30-8-333(1)], the customer who takes delivery can qualify as a "protected purchaser" who takes free from any adverse claims under Section 8-303(b) [30-8-333(2)]. The broker's role in such transactions is primarily governed by non-Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] law. There are only a few provisions of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] that affect the relationship between the customer and broker in such cases. See Section 8-108 [30-8-118] (broker makes to the customer the warranties of a transferor) and 8115 [30-8-125] (broker not liable in conversion if customer was acting wrongfully against a third party in selling securities).

Many investors use brokers not only to purchase and sell securities, but also as the custodians through whom they hold their securities. The indirect holding system rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] apply to the custodial aspect of this relationship. If a customer purchases a security through a broker and directs the broker to hold the security in an account for the customer, the customer will never become a "purchaser" of a "security" whose interest therein is governed by the rules of Parts 2, 3, and 4 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4]. Accordingly, the customer does not become a "protected purchaser" under Section 8-303 [30-8-333]. Rather, the customer becomes an "entitlement holder" who has a "security entitlement" to the security against the broker as "securities intermediary." See Section 8-501 [30-8-501]. It would make no sense to say that the customer in such a case takes an interest in the security free from all other claims, since the nature of the relationship is that the customer has an interest in common with other customers who hold positions in the same security through the same broker. Section 8-502 [30-8-502], however, does protect an entitlement holder against adverse claims, in the sense that once the entitlement holder has acquired the package of rights that comprise a security entitlement no one else can take that package of rights away by arguing that the transaction that resulted in the customer's acquisition of the security entitlement was the traceable product of a transfer or transaction that was wrongful as against the claimant.

4. Bank deposit accounts; brokerage asset management accounts.

An ordinary bank deposit account would not fall within the definition of "security" in Section 8-102(a)(15) [30-8-112(1)(o)], so the rules of Parts 2, 3, and 4 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4] do not apply to deposit accounts. Nor would the relationship between a bank and its depositors be governed by the rules of Part 5 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. The Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules apply to "security entitlements." Section 8-501(b) [30-8-501(2)] provides that a person has a security entitlement when a securities intermediary credits a financial asset to the person's "securities account." "Securities account" is defined in Section 8-501(a) [30-8-501(1)] as "an account to which a financial asset is or may be credited in accordance with an agreement under which the person maintaining the account undertakes to treat the person for whom the account is maintained as entitled to exercise the rights that comprise the financial asset." The definition of securities account plays a key role in setting the scope of Part 5 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. A person has a security entitlement governed by Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] only if the relationship in question falls within the definition of "securities account." The definition of securities account in Section 8-501(a) [30-8-501(1)] excludes deposit accounts from the Part 5 rules of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. One of the basic elements of the relationship between a securities intermediary and an entitlement holder is that the securities intermediary has the duty to hold exactly the quantity of securities that it carries for the account of its customers. See Section 8-504 [30-8-504]. The assets that a securities intermediary holds for its entitlement holder are not assets that the securities intermediary can use in its own proprietary business. See Section 8-503 [30-8-503]. A deposit account is an entirely different arrangement. A bank is not required to hold in its vaults or in deposit accounts with other banks a sum of money equal to the claims of all of its depositors. Banks are permitted to use depositors' funds in their ordinary lending business; indeed, that is a primary function of banks. A deposit account, unlike a securities account, is simply a debtor-creditor relationship. Thus a bank or other financial institution maintaining deposit accounts is not covered by Part 5 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5].

Today, it is common for brokers to maintain securities accounts for their customers which include arrangements for the customers to hold liquid "cash" assets in the form of money market mutual fund shares. Insofar as the broker is holding money market mutual fund shares for its customer, the customer has a security entitlement to the money market mutual fund shares. It is also common for brokers to offer their customers an arrangement in which the customer has access to those liquid assets via a deposit account with a bank, whereby shares of the money market fund are redeemed to cover checks drawn on the account. Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] applies only to the securities account; the linked bank account remains an account covered by other law. Thus the rights and duties of the customer and the bank are governed not by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], but by the relevant payment system law, such as Article 4 or Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4 or 4A].

5. Trusts.

The indirect holding system rules of Part 5 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] are not intended to govern all relationships in which one person holds securities "on behalf of" another. Rather, the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules come into play only if the relationship in question falls within the definition of securities account in Section 8-501(a) [30-8-501(1)]. The definition of securities account serves the important function of ensuring that ordinary trust arrangements are not inadvertently swept into Part 5 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. Suppose that Bank serves as trustee of a trust for the benefit of Beneficiary. The corpus of the trust is invested in securities and other financial assets. Although Bank is, in some senses, holding securities for Beneficiary, the arrangement would not fall within the definition of securities account. Bank, as trustee, has not undertaken to treat Beneficiary as entitled to exercise all of the rights that comprise the portfolio securities. For instance, although Beneficiary receives the economic benefit of the portfolio securities, Beneficiary does not have the right to direct dispositions of individual trust assets or to exercise voting or other corporate law rights with respect to the individual securities. Thus Bank's obligations to Beneficiary as trustee are governed by ordinary trust law, not by Part 5 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. Of course, if Bank, as trustee, holds the securities through an intermediary, Part 5 of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] would govern the relationship between Bank, as entitlement holder, and the intermediary through which Bank holds the securities. It is also possible that a different department of Bank acts as the intermediary through which Bank, as trustee, holds the securities. Bank, qua securities custodian, might be holding securities for a large number of customers, including Bank's own trust department. Insofar as Bank may be regarded as acting in different capacities, Part 5 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] may be relevant to the relationship between the two sides of Bank's business. However, the relationship between Bank as trustee and the beneficiaries of the trust would remain governed by trust law, not Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8].

6. Mutual fund shares.

Shares of mutual funds are Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] securities, whether the fund is organized as a corporation, business trust, or other form of entity. See Sections 8-102(a)(15) and 8-103(b) [30-8-112(1)(o) and 30-8-113(2)]. Mutual funds commonly do not issue certificates. Thus, mutual fund shares are typically uncertificated securities under Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8].

Although a mutual fund is, in a colloquial sense, holding the portfolio securities on behalf of the fund's shareholders, the indirect holding system rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] do not apply to the relationship between the fund and its shareholders. The Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules apply to "security entitlements." Section 8-501(e) [30-8-501(5)] provides that issuance of a security is not establishment of a security entitlement. Thus, because mutual funds shares do fit within the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] definition of security, the relationship between the fund and its shareholders is automatically excluded from the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules.

Of course, a person might hold shares in a mutual fund through a brokerage account. Because mutual fund shares are securities, they automatically fall within the broader term "financial asset," so the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] indirect holding system rules apply to mutual fund shares that are held through securities accounts. That is, a person who holds mutual fund shares through a brokerage account could have a security entitlement to the mutual fund shares, just as the person would have a security entitlement to any other security carried in the brokerage account.

7. Stock of closely held corporations.

Ordinary corporate stock falls within the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] definition of security, whether or not it is publicly traded. See Sections 8-102(a)(15) and 8-103(a) [30-8-112(1)(o) and 30-8-113(1)]. There is nothing in the new indirect holding system rules of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] that would preclude their application to shares of companies that are not publicly traded. The indirect holding system rules, however, would come into play only if the shares were in fact held through a securities account with a securities intermediary. Since that is typically not the case with respect to shares of closely held corporations, transactions involving those shares will continue to be governed by the traditional rules, as amended, that are set out in Parts 2, 3, and 4 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4], and the corresponding provisions of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. The simplification of the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules on uncertificated securities may, however, make the alternative of dispensing with certificates more attractive for closely held corporations.

8. Partnership interests and limited liability company shares.

Interests in partnerships or shares of limited liability companies are not Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] securities unless they are in fact dealt in or traded on securities exchanges or in securities markets. See Section 8-103(c) [30-8-113(3)]. The issuers, however, may if they wish explicitly "opt-in" by specifying that the interests or shares are securities governed by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Even though interests in partnerships or shares of limited liability companies do not generally fall within the category of "security" in Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], they would fall within the broader term "financial asset." Accordingly, if such interests are held through a securities account with a securities intermediary, the indirect holding system rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] apply, and the interest of a person who holds them through such an account is a security entitlement.

9. Bankers' acceptances, commercial paper, and other money market instruments.

Money market instruments, such as commercial paper, bankers' acceptances, and certificates of deposit, are good examples of a form of property that may fall within the definition of "financial asset," even though they may not fall within the definition of "security." Section 8-103(d) [30-8-113(4)] provides that a writing that meets the definition of security certificate under Section 8-102(a)(15) [30-8-112(1)(o)] is governed by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], even though it also fits within the definition of "negotiable instrument" in Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3].

Some forms of short term money market instruments may meet the requirements of an Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] security, while others may not. For example, the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] definition of security requires that the obligation be in registered or bearer form.

Bankers' acceptances are typically payable "to order," and thus do not qualify as Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] securities. Thus, the obligations of the immediate parties to a bankers' acceptance are governed by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3], rather than Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. That is an entirely appropriate classification, even for those bankers' acceptance that are handled as investment media in the securities markets, because Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], unlike Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3], does not contain rules specifying the standardized obligations of parties to instruments. For example, the Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] rules on the obligations of acceptors and drawers of drafts are necessary to specify the obligations represented by bankers' acceptances, but Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] contains no provisions dealing with these issues.

Immobilization through a depository system is, however, just as important for money market instruments as for traditional securities. Under the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], the rules on the depository system, set out in Section 8-320 [former 30-8-320], applied only to Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] securities. Although some forms of money market instruments could be fitted within the language of the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] definition of "security," this is not true for bankers' acceptances. Accordingly, it was not thought feasible to make bankers' acceptances eligible for deposit in clearing corporations under the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] solves this problem by separating the coverage of the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules from the definition of security. Even though a bankers' acceptance or other money market instrument is an Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] negotiable instrument rather than an Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] security, it would still fall within the definition of financial asset in Section 8-102(a)(9) [30-8-112(1)(i)]. Accordingly, if the instrument is held through a clearing corporation or other securities intermediary, the rules of Part 5 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] apply.

10. Repurchase agreement transactions.

Repurchase agreements are an important form of transaction in the securities business, particularly in connection with government securities. Repos and reverse repos can be used for a variety of purposes. The one that is of particular concern for purposes of commercial law rules is the use of repurchase agreements as a form of financing transaction for government securities dealers. Government securities dealers typically obtain intra-day financing from their clearing banks, and then at the end of the trading day seek overnight financing from other sources to repay that day's advances from the clearing bank. Repos are the principal source of this financing. The dealer ("repo seller") sells securities to the financing source ("repo buyer") for cash, and at the same time agrees to repurchase the same or like securities the following day, or at some other brief interval. The sources of the financing include a variety of entities seeking short term investments for surplus cash, such as pension funds, business corporations, money market funds, and banks. The pricing may be computed in various ways, but in essence the price at which the dealer agrees to repurchase the securities exceeds the price paid to the dealer by an amount equivalent to interest on the funds.

The transfer of the securities from a securities dealer as repo seller to a provider of funds as repo buyer can be effected in a variety of ways. The repo buyer might be willing to allow the repo seller to keep the securities "in its hands," relying on the dealer's representation that it will hold them on behalf of the repo buyer. In the jargon of the trade, these are known as "hold-in-custody repos" or "HIC repos." At the other extreme, the repo buyer might insist that the dealer "hand over" the securities so that in the event that the dealer fails and is unable to perform its obligation to repurchase them, the repo buyer will have the securities "in its hands." The jargon for these is "delivered-out repos." A wide variety of arrangements between these two extremes might be devised, in which the securities are "handed over" to a third party with powers concerning their disposition allocated between the repo seller and repo buyer in a variety of ways.

Specification of the rights of repo buyers is complicated by the fact that the transfer of the interest in securities from the repo seller to the repo buyer might be characterized as an outright sale or as the creation of a security interest. Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] does not attempt to specify any categorical rules on that issue.

Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] sets out rules on the rights of parties who have implemented securities transactions in certain ways. It does not, however, deal with the legal characterization of the transactions that are implemented through the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] mechanisms. Rather, the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules apply without regard to the characterization of transactions for other purposes. For example, the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules for the direct holding system provide that a person who takes delivery of a duly indorsed security certificate for value and without notice of adverse claims takes free from any adverse claims. That rule applies without regard to the character of the transaction in which the security certificate was delivered. It applies both to delivery upon original issue and to delivery upon transfer. It applies to transfers in settlement of sales and to transfers in pledge. Similarly, the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] indirect holding system rules, such as the adverse claim cut-off rules in Sections 8-502 and 8-510 [30-8-502 and 30-8-510], apply to the transactions that fall within their terms, whether those transactions were sales, secured transactions, or something else.

Repos involve transfers of interests in securities. The Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules apply to transfers of securities in repos, just as they apply to transfers of securities in any other form of transaction. The transfer of the interest in securities from the repo seller to the repo buyer might be characterized as an outright sale or as the creation of a security interest. Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] does not determine that question. The rules of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] have, however, been drafted to minimize the possibility that disputes over the characterization of the transfer in a repo would affect substantive questions that are governed by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. See, e.g., Section 8-510 [30-8-510] and Comment 4 thereto.

11. Securities lending transactions.

In a typical securities lending transaction, the owner of securities lends them to another person who needs the securities to satisfy a delivery obligation. For example, when a customer of a broker sells a security short, the broker executes an ordinary trade as seller and so must deliver the securities at settlement. The customer is "short" against the broker because the customer has an open obligation to deliver the securities to the broker, which the customer hopes to be able to satisfy by buying in the securities at a lower price. If the short seller's broker does not have the securities in its own inventory, the broker will borrow them from someone else. The securities lender delivers the securities to the borrowing broker, and the borrowing broker becomes contractually obligated to redeliver a like quantity of the same security. Securities borrowers are required to provide collateral, usually government securities, to assure performance of their redelivery obligation.

The securities lender does not retain any property interest in the securities that are delivered to the borrower. The transaction is an outright transfer in which the borrower obtains full title. The whole point of securities lending is that the borrower needs the securities to transfer them to someone else. It would make no sense to say that the lender retains any property interest in the securities it has lent. Accordingly, even if the securities borrower defaults on its redelivery obligation, the securities lender has no property interest in the original securities that could be asserted against any person to whom the securities borrower may have transferred them. One need not look to adverse claim cut-off rules to reach that result; the securities lender never had an adverse claim. The securities borrower's default is no different from any other breach of contract. The securities lender's protection is its right to foreclose on the collateral given to secure the borrower's redelivery obligation. Perhaps the best way to understand securities lending is to note that the word "loan" in securities lending transactions is used in the sense it carries in loans of money, as distinguished from loans of specific identifiable chattels. Someone who lends money does not retain any property interest in the money that is handed over to the borrower. To use civil law terminology, securities lending is mutuum, rather than commodatum. See Story on Bailments, §§6 and 47.

12. Traded stock options.

Stock options issued and cleared through the Options Clearing Corporation ("OCC") are a good example of a form of investment vehicle that is treated as a financial asset to which the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules apply, but not as an Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] security to which Parts 2, 3, and 4 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4] apply. OCC carries on its books the options positions of the brokerage firms which are clearing members of OCC. The clearing members in turn carry on their books the options positions of their customers. The arrangements are structurally similar to the securities depository system. In the options structure, however, there is no issuer separate from the clearing corporation. The financial assets held through the system are standardized contracts entitling the holder to purchase or sell a certain security at a set price. Rather than being an interest in or obligation of a separate issuer, an option is a contractual right against the counter-party. In order to assure performance of the options, OCC interposes itself as counter-party to each options trade. The rules of Parts 2, 3, and 4 of this Article [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4], however, do not well describe the obligations and rights of OCC. On the other hand, the rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5], and the related Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] rules on security interests and priorities, do provide a workable legal framework for the commercial law analysis of the rights of the participants in the options market. Accordingly, publicly traded securities options are included within the definition of "financial asset," but not "security." See Section 8-103(e) [30-8-113(5)]. Thus, although OCC would not be an issuer of a security for purposes of this Article [chapter], it would be a clearing corporation, against whom its clearing members have security entitlements to the options positions. Similarly, the clearing members' customers have security entitlements against the clearing members. Traded stock options are also a good illustration of the point that the classification issues under Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] are very different from classification under other law, such as the federal securities laws. See Section 8-102(d) [30-8-112(4)]. Stock options are treated as securities for purposes of federal securities laws, but not for purposes of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8].

13. Commodity futures.

Section 8-103(f) [30-8-113(6)] provides that a "commodity contract" is not a security or a financial asset. Section 9-115 [30-9-115, now repealed, see 30-9A-102] defines commodity contract to include commodity futures contracts, commodity options, and options on commodity futures contracts that are traded on or subject to the rules of a board of trade that has been designated as a contract market for that contract pursuant to the federal commodities laws. Thus, commodity contracts themselves are not Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] securities to which the rules of Parts 2, 3, and 4 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4] apply, nor is the relationship between a customer and a commodity futures commission merchant governed by the Part 5 rules of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. Commodity contracts, however, are included within the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] definition of "investment property." Thus security interests in commodity positions are governed by essentially the same set of rules as security interests in security entitlements.

14. "Whatever else they have or may devise."

The classification question posed by the above-captioned category of investment products and arrangements is among the most difficult—and important—issue raised by the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] revision process. Rapid innovation is perhaps the only constant characteristic of the securities and financial markets. The rules of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] are intended to be sufficiently flexible to accommodate new developments.

A common mechanism by which new financial instruments are devised is that a financial institution that holds some security, financial instrument, or pool thereof, creates interests in that asset or pool which are sold to others. It is not possible to answer in the abstract the question of how such interests are treated under Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], because the variety of such products is limited only by human imagination and current regulatory structures. At this general level, however, one can note that there are at least three possible treatments under Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] of the relationship between the institution which creates the interests and the persons who hold them. (Again, it must be borne in mind that the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] classification issue may be different from the classification question posed by federal securities law or other regulation.) First, creation of the new interests in the underlying assets may constitute issuance of a new Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] security. In that case the relationship between the institution that created the interest and the persons who hold them is not governed by the Part 5 rules [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5], but by the rules of Parts 2, 3, and 4 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4]. See Section 8-501(e) [30-8-501(5)]. That, for example, is the structure of issuance of mutual fund shares. Second, the relationship between the entity creating the interests and those holding them may fit within the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules, so that the persons are treating as having security entitlements against the institution with respect to the underlying assets. That, for example, is the structure used for stock options. Third, it may be that the creation of the new interests in the underlying assets does not constitute issuance of a new Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] security, nor does the relationship between the entity creating the interests and those holding them fit within the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules. In that case, the relationship is governed by other law, as in the case of ordinary trusts.

The first of these three possibilities—that the creation of the new interest is issuance of a new security for Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] purposes—is a fairly common pattern. For example, an American depositary receipt facility does not maintain securities accounts but issues securities called ADRs in respect of foreign securities deposited in such facility. Similarly, custodians of government securities which issue receipts, certificates, or the like representing direct interests in those securities (sometimes interests split between principal and income) do not maintain securities accounts but issue securities representing those interests. Trusts holding assets, in a variety of structured and securitized transactions, which issue certificates or the like representing "pass-through" or undivided beneficial interests in the trust assets, do not maintain securities accounts but issue securities representing those interests.

In analyzing these classification questions, courts should take care to avoid mechanical jurisprudence based solely upon exegesis of the wording of definitions in Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. The result of classification questions is that different sets of rules come into play. In order to decide the classification question it is necessary to understand fully the commercial setting and consider which set of rules best fits the transaction. Rather than letting the choice of rules turn on interpretation of the words of the definitions, the interpretation of the words of the definitions should turn on the suitability of the application of the substantive rules.

IV. CHANGES FROM PRIOR (1978) VERSION OF ARTICLE 8 [TITLE 30, CHAPTER 8]

Revision Notes

1. Provisions of former Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] on clearing corporations.

The keystone of the treatment of the indirect holding system in the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] was the special provision on clearing corporations in Section 8-320 [former 30-8-320]. Section 8-320 [former 30-8-320] was added to Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] in 1962, at the very end of the process that culminated in promulgation and enactment of the original version of the Code. The key concepts of the original version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] were "bona fide purchaser" and "delivery." Under Section 8-302 (1962) [former 30-8-302] one could qualify as a "bona fide purchaser" only if one had taken delivery of a security, and Section 8-313 (1962) [former 30-8-313] specified what counted as a delivery.

Section 8-320 [former 30-8-320] was added to take account of the development of the system in which trades can be settled by netted book-entry movements at a depository without physical deliveries of certificates. Rather than reworking the basic concepts, however, Section 8-320 [former 30-8-320] brought the depository system within Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] by definitional fiat. Subsection (a) of Section 8-320 (1962) [former 30-8-320(1)] stated that a transfer or pledge could be effected by entries on the books of a central depository, and subsection (b) [subsection (2)] stated that such an entry "has the effect of a delivery of a security in bearer form or duly indorsed in blank." In 1978, Section 8-320 [former 30-8-320] was revised to conform it to the general substitution of the concept of "transfer" for "delivery," but the basic structure remained the same. Under the 1978 version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], the only book-entry transfers that qualified the transferee for bona fide purchaser rights were those made on the books of a clearing corporation. See Sections 8-302(1)(c), 8-313(1)(g), and 8-320 [former 30-8-302(1)(c), 30-8-313(1)(g), and 30-8-320]. Thus, for practical purposes, the indirect holding system rules of the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] required that the securities be held by a clearing corporation in accordance with the central depository rules of Section 8-320 [former 30-8-320].

Some of the definitional provisions concerning clearing corporation in the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] seem to have conflated the commercial law rules on the effect of book-entry transactions with issues about the regulation of entities that are acting as clearing corporations. For example, the Section 8-320 [former 30-8-320] rules that gave effect to book-entry transfers applied only if the security was "in the custody of the clearing corporation, another clearing corporation, [or] a custodian bank." "Custodian bank" was defined in Section 8-102(4) [former 30-8-102(4)] as "a bank or trust company that is supervised and examined by state or federal authority having supervision over banks and is acting as custodian for a clearing corporation." Although this was probably inadvertent, these definitional provisions have operated as an obstacle to the development of clearing arrangements for global trading, since they effectively precluded clearing corporations from using foreign banks as custodians.

Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is based on the view that Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is not the proper place for regulatory decisions about whether certain sorts of financial institutions should or should not be permitted to engage in a particular aspect of the securities business, such as acting as a clearing corporation, or how they should be permitted to conduct that business. Rather, Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] should deal only with the commercial law questions of what duties and rights flow from doing business as a clearing corporation, leaving it to other regulatory law to decide which entities should be permitted to act as clearing corporations, and to regulate their activities. Federal securities laws now establish a detailed regulatory structure for clearing corporations; there is no need for Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] to duplicate parts of that structure. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deletes all provision of the prior version which had the effect of specifying how clearing corporations should conduct their operations. For example, Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deletes the definition of "custodian bank," which operated in the prior version only as a regulatory restriction on how clearing corporations could hold securities.

In general, the structure of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is such that there is relatively little need for special provisions on clearing corporations. Book-entry transactions effected through clearing corporations are treated under the same rules in Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] as book-entry transactions effected through any other securities intermediary. Accordingly, Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] has no direct analog of the special provisions in Section 8-320 [former 30-8-320] on transfers on the books of clearing corporations.

2. Former Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313]—"Transfer."

Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313] of the 1978 version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] was extremely complicated, because it attempted to cover many different issues. The following account of the evolution of Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313] may assist in understanding why a different approach is taken in Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. This explanation is, however, intended not as an actual account of historical events, but as a conceptual reconstruction, devised from the perspective of, and with the benefit of, hindsight.

The original objective of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] was to ensure that certificates representing investment securities would be "negotiable" in the sense that purchasers would be protected by the bona fide purchaser rules. The requirements for bona fide purchaser status were that the purchaser had to (i) take delivery of the security and (ii) give value in good faith and without notice of adverse claims. Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313] specified what counted as a "delivery," and Section 8-302 [former 30-8-302] specified the other requirements.

The 1978 amendments added provisions on uncertificated securities, but the basic organizational pattern was retained. Section 8-302 [former 30-8-302] continued to state the requirements of value, good faith, and lack of notice for good faith purchase, and Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313] stated the mechanism by which the purchase had to be implemented. Delivery as defined in the original version of Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313] had a meaning similar to the concept known in colloquial securities jargon as "good delivery"; that is, physical delivery with any necessary indorsement. Although the word "delivery" has now come to be used in securities parlance in a broader sense than physical delivery, when the provisions for uncertificated securities were added it was thought preferable to use another word. Thus, the word "transfer" was substituted for "delivery" in Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313].

The 1978 amendments also moved the rules governing security interests in securities from Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] to Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], though the basic conceptual structure of the common law of pledge was retained. Since a pledge required a delivery, and since the term transfer had been substituted for delivery, the 1978 amendments provided that in order to create a security interest there must be a "transfer," in the defined Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] sense, from the debtor to the secured party. Accordingly, provisions had to be added to Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313] so that any of the steps that should suffice to create a perfected security interest would be deemed to constitute a "transfer" within the meaning of Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313]. Thus, the Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313] rules on "transfer," which had in the previous version dealt only with what counted as a delivery that qualified one for bona fide purchaser status, became the statutory locus for all of the rules on creation and perfection of security interests in securities. Accordingly the rather elaborate rules of subsections (1)(h), (1)(i), and (1)(j) [former subsections (1)(h), (1)(i), and (1)(j)] were added.

Having expanded Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313] to the point that it served as the rule specifying the formal requirements for transfer of all significant forms of interests in securities, it must have seemed only logical to take the next step and make the Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313] rules the exclusive means of transferring interests in securities. Thus, while the prior version had stated that "Delivery to a purchaser occurs when ...", the 1978 version stated that "Transfer of a security or a limited interest (including a security interest) therein to a purchaser occurs only ...." Having taken that step, however, it then became necessary to ensure that anyone who should be regarded as having an interest in a security would be covered by some provision of Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313]. Thus, the provisions of subsection (1)(d)(ii) and (iii) [former subsections (1)(d)(ii) and (1)(d)(iii)] were added to make it possible to say that the customers of a securities intermediary who hold interests in securities held by the intermediary in fungible bulk received "transfers."

Section 8-313(1)(d) [former 30-8-313(1)(d)] was the key provision in the 1978 version dealing with the indirect holding system at the level below securities depositories. It operated in essentially the same fashion as Section 8-320 [former 30-8-320]; that is, it stated that when a broker or bank holding securities in fungible bulk makes entries on its books identifying a quantity of the fungible bulk as belonging to the customer, that action is treated as a "transfer"—in the special Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313] sense—of an interest in the security from the intermediary to the customer.

Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] has no direct analog of the 1978 version of Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313]. The rules on secured transactions have been returned to Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A], so subsections of Section 8-313 (1978) [former 30-8-313] dealing with security interests are deleted from Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Insofar as portions of Section 8-313 (1978) [former 30-8-313] were designed to specify the formal requirements for transferees to qualify for protection against adverse claims, their place is taken by Revised Section 8-301 [30-8-331], which defines "delivery," in a fashion somewhat akin to the pre1978 version of Section 8-313 [former 30-8-313]. The descendant of the provisions of Section 8-313 (1978) [former 30-8-313] dealing with the indirect holding system is Revised Section 8-501 [30-8-501] which specifies when a person acquires a security entitlement. Section 8-501 [30-8-501], however, is based on a different analysis of the transaction in which a customer acquires a position in the indirect holding system. The transaction is not described as a "transfer" of an interest in some portion of a fungible bulk of securities held by the securities intermediary but as the creation of a security entitlement. Accordingly, just as Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] has no direct analog of the Section 8-320 [former 30-8-320] rules on clearing corporation transfers, it has no direct analog of the Section 8-313(1) [former 30-8-313(1)] rules on "transfers" of interests in securities held in fungible bulk.

3. Uncertificated securities provisions.

Given the way that securities holding practices have evolved, the sharp distinction that the 1978 version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] drew between certificated securities and uncertificated securities has become somewhat misleading. Since many provisions of the 1978 version had separate subsections dealing first with certificated securities and then with uncertificated securities, and since people intuitively realize that the volume of trading in the modern securities markets could not possibly be handled by pushing around certificates, it was only natural for a reader of the statute to conclude that the uncertificated securities provisions of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] were the basis of the book-entry system. That, however, is not the case. Although physical delivery of certificates plays little role in the settlement system, most publicly traded securities are still, in legal theory, certificated securities. To use clearance and settlement jargon, the book-entry securities holding system has used "immobilization" rather than "dematerialization."

The important legal and practical difference is between the direct holding system, in which the beneficial owners have a direct relationship with the issuer, and the indirect holding system, in which securities are held through tiers of securities intermediaries. Accordingly, in Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] the contrast between certificated securities and uncertificated securities has been minimized or eliminated as much as possible in stating the substantive provisions.

4. Transaction statements.

Although the 1978 provisions on uncertificated securities contemplated a system in which there would be no definitive certificates as reifications of the underlying interests or obligations, the 1978 amendments did not really dispense with all requirements of paper evidence of securities holding. The 1978 amendments required issuers of uncertificated securities to send paper "transaction statements" upon registration of transfer. Section 8-408 [former 30-8-408] regulated the content and format of these transaction statements in considerable detail. The statements had to be in writing, include specific information, and contain a conspicuous legend stating that "This statement is merely a record of the rights of the addressee as of the time of its issuance. Delivery of this statement, of itself, confers no rights on the recipient. This statement is neither a negotiable instrument nor a security." Issuers were required to send statements when any transfer was registered (known as "initial transaction statements") and also were required to send periodic statements at least annually and also upon any security holder's reasonable request. Fees were regulated to some extent, in that Section 8-408(8) [former 30-8-408(8)] specified that if periodic statements were sent at least quarterly, the issuer could charge for statements requested by security holders at other times.

The detailed specification of reporting requirements for issuers of uncertificated securities was quite different from the treatment of securities intermediaries. Though the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] did require non-clearing corporation securities intermediaries to send confirmations of transfers—a requirement deleted in Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]—it did not regulate their content or format. Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] has never imposed periodic reporting requirements on securities intermediaries. Thus, reporting requirements for the indirect holding system were left to agreements and regulatory authorities, while reporting requirements for a book-entry direct holding system were imposed by statute.

Securities holding systems based on transaction statements of the sort contemplated by the 1978 amendments have not yet evolved to any major extent—indeed, the statutory specification of the details of the information system may itself have acted as an impediment to the evolution of a book-entry direct system. Accordingly, Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] drops the statutory requirements concerning transaction statements. The record keeping and reporting obligations of issuers of uncertificated securities would be left to agreement and other law, as is the case today for securities intermediaries.

In the 1978 version, the Part 2 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 2] rules concerning transfer restrictions, issuers' defenses, and the like were based on the assumption that transaction statements would be used in a fashion analogous to traditional security certificates. For example, Sections 8-202 and 8-204 [former 30-8-202 and 30-8-204] specified that the terms of a security, or any restrictions on transfer imposed by the issuer, had to be noted on the transaction statement. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deletes all such references to transaction statements. The terms of securities, or of restrictions of transfer, would be governed by whatever law or agreement specifies these matters, just as is the case for various other forms of business entities, such as partnerships, that have never issued certificates representing interests. Other Part 2 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 2] rules, such as Sections 8-205, 8-206, and 8-208 [former 30-8-205, 30-8-206, and 30-8-208], attempted to state rules on forgery and related matters for transactions statements. Since Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] does not specify the format for information systems for uncertificated securities, there is no point in attempting to state rules on the consequences of wrongful information transmission in the particular format of written statements authenticated by signatures.

5. Deletion of provisions on registered pledges.

The 1978 version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] also added detailed provisions concerning "registered pledges" of uncertificated securities. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] adopts a new system of rules for security interests in securities, for both the direct and indirect holding systems that make it unnecessary to have special statutory provisions for registered pledges of uncertificated securities.

The reason that the 1978 version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] created this concept was that if the only means of creating security interests was the pledge, it seemed necessary to provide some substitute for the pledge in the absence of a certificate. The point of the registered pledge was, presumably, that it permitted a debtor to grant a perfected security interest in securities, yet still keep the securities in the debtor's own name for purposes of dividends, voting, and the like. The concept of registered pledge has, however, been thought troublesome by many legal commentators and securities industry participants. For example, in Massachusetts where many mutual funds have their headquarters, a non-uniform amendment was enacted to permit the issuer of an uncertificated security to refuse to register a pledge and instead issue a certificate to the owner that the owner could then pledge by ordinary means.

Under the 1978 version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], if an issuer chose to issue securities in uncertificated form, it was also required by statute to offer a registered pledge program. Revised Articles 8 and 9 [Title 30, chapters 8 and 9A] take a different approach. All of the provisions dealing with registered pledges have been deleted. This does not mean, however, that issuers cannot offer such a service. The control rules of Revised Section 8-106 [30-8-116] and the related priority provisions in Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] establish a structure that permits issuers to develop systems akin to the registered pledge device, without mandating that they do so, or legislating the details of the system. In essence, the registered pledge or control device amounts to a record keeping service. A debtor can always transfer securities to its lender. In a registered pledge or control agreement arrangement, the issuer keeps track of which securities the secured party holds for its own account outright, and which securities it holds in pledge from its debtors.

Under the rules of Revised Articles 8 and 9 [Title 30, chapters 8 and 9A], the registered pledge issue can easily be left to resolution by the market. The concept of control is defined in such fashion that if an issuer or securities intermediary wishes to offer a service akin to the registered pledge device it can do so. The issuer or securities intermediary would offer to enter into agreements with the debtor and secured party under which it would hold the securities for the account of the debtor, but subject to instructions from the secured party. The secured party would thereby obtain control assuring perfection and priority of its lien.

Even if such arrangements are not offered by issuers, persons who hold uncertificated securities will have several options for using them as collateral for secured loans. Under the new rules, filing is a permissible method of perfection, for debtors other than securities firms. A secured party who relies on filing is, of course, exposed to the risk that the debtor will double finance and grant a later secured lender a security interest under circumstances that give that lender control and hence priority. If the lender is unwilling to run that risk, the debtor can transfer the securities outright to the lender on the books of the issuer, though between the parties the debtor would be the owner and the lender only a secured party. That, of course, requires that the debtor trust the secured party not to dispose of the collateral wrongfully, and the debtor may also need to make arrangements with the secured party to exercise benefits of ownership such as voting and receiving distributions.

It may well be that both lenders and borrowers would prefer to have some arrangement, such as the registered pledge device of current law, that permits the debtor to remain as the registered owner entitled to vote and receive dividends but gives the lender exclusive power to order their disposition. The approach taken in this revision is that if there is a genuine demand for such arrangements, it can be met by the market. The difficulty with the approach of present Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is that it mandates that any issuer that wishes to issue securities in uncertificated form must also offer this record keeping service. That obligation may well have acted as a disincentive to the development of uncertificated securities. Thus, the deletion of the mandated registered pledge provisions is consistent with the principle of neutrality toward the evolution of securities holding practices.

6. Former Section 8-403 [former 30-8-403] Issuer's Duty as to Adverse Claims.

Section 8-403 [former 30-8-403] of the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] dealt with the obligations of issuers to adverse claimants. The starting point of American law on issuers' liability in such circumstances is the old case of Lowry v. Commercial & Farmers' Bank, 15 F.Cas. 1040 (C.C.D.Md.1848) (No. 8551), under which issuers could be held liable for registering a transfer at the direction of a registered owner who was acting wrongfully as against a third person in making the transfer. The Lowry principle imposed onerous liability on issuers, particularly in the case of transfers by fiduciaries, such as executors and trustees. To protect against risk of such liability, issuers developed the practice of requiring extensive documentation for fiduciary stock transfers to assure themselves that the fiduciaries were acting rightfully. As a result, fiduciary stock transfers were cumbersome and time consuming.

In the present century, American law has gradually moved away from the Lowry principle. Statutes such as the Uniform Fiduciaries Act, the Model Fiduciary Stock Transfer Act, and the Uniform Act for the Simplification of Fiduciary Security Transfers sought to avoid the delays in stock transfers that could result from issuers' demands for documentation by limiting the issuer's responsibility for transfers in breach of the registered owner's duty to others. Although these statutes provided that issuers had no duty of inquiry to determine whether a fiduciary was acting rightfully, they all provided that an issuer could be liable if the issuer acted with notice of third party claims.

The prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] followed the same approach as the various fiduciary transfer statutes. Issuers were not required to seek out information from which they could determine whether a fiduciary was acting properly, but they were liable if they registered a transfer with notice that the fiduciary was acting improperly. Former Section 8-308(11) [former 30-8-308(11)] said that the failure of a fiduciary to comply with a controlling instrument or failure to obtain a court approval required under local law did not render the indorsement or instruction unauthorized. However, if a fiduciary was in fact acting improperly, then the beneficiary would be treated as an adverse claimant. See Section 8-302(2) (1978) [former 30-8-302(2)] and Comment 4. Former Section 8-403 [former 30-8-403] specified that if written notice of an adverse claim had been sent to the issuer, the issuer "shall inquire into the adverse claim" before registering a transfer on the indorsement or instruction of the registered owner. The issuer could "discharge any duty of inquiry by any reasonable means," including by notifying the adverse claimant that the transfer would be registered unless the adverse claimant obtained a court order or gave an indemnity bond.

Revised Article 8 rejects the Lowry principle altogether. It provides that an issuer is not liable for wrongful registration if it acts on an effective indorsement or instruction, even though the issuer may have notice of adverse claims, so long as the issuer has not been served with legal process and is not acting in collusion with the wrongdoer in registering the transfer. See Revised Section 8-404 [30-8-414] and Comments thereto. The provisions of prior Section 8-403 [former 30-8-403] specifying that issuers had a duty to investigate adverse claims of which they had notice are deleted.

Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] also deletes the provisions set out in Section 8-403(3) [former 30-8-403(3)] of prior law specifying that issuers did not have a duty to inquire into the rightfulness of transfers by fiduciaries. The omission of the rules formerly in Section 8-403(3) [former 30-8-403(3)] does not, of course, mean that issuers would be liable for acting on the instruction of fiduciaries in the circumstances covered by former Section 8-403(3) [former 30-8-403(3)]. Former Section 8-403(3) [former 30-8-403(3)] assumed that issuers would be liable if they registered a transfer with notice of an adverse claim. Former Section 8-403(3) [former 30-8-403(3)] was necessary only to negate any inference that knowledge that a transfer was initiated by a fiduciary might give constructive notice of adverse claims. Under Section 8-404 [30-8-414] of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], mere notice of adverse claims does not impose duties on the issuer. Accordingly the provisions included in former Section 8-403(3) [former 30-8-403(3)] are unnecessary.

Although the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] included provisions similar or identical to those set out in the Uniform Act for the Simplification of Fiduciary Security Transfers and similar statutes, most states retained these statutes at the time the Uniform Commercial Code was adopted. These statutes are based on a premise different from Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. The fiduciary simplification acts are predicated on the assumption that an issuer would be liable to an adverse claimant if the issuer had notice. These statutes seek only to preclude any inference that issuers have such notice when they register transfers on the instructions of a fiduciary. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is based on the view that a third party should not be able to interfere with the relationship between an issuer and its registered shareholders unless the claimant obtains legal process. Since notice of an adverse claim does not impose duties on an issuer under Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], the Uniform Act for the Simplification of Fiduciary Security Transfers, or similar statutes, should be repealed upon enactment of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8].

7. Former Section 8-319 [former 30-8-319] Statute of Frauds.

Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deletes the special statute of frauds provision for securities contracts that was set out in former Section 8-319 [former 30-8-319]. See Revised Section 8-113 [30-8-123]. Most of the litigation involving the statute of frauds rule of the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] involved informal transactions, rather than transactions on the organized securities markets. Typical cases were those in which an employee or former employee of a small enterprise sued to enforce an alleged promise that he or she would receive an equity interest in the business. The usual commercial policies relating to writings in contracts for the sale of personal property are at most tangentially implicated in such cases. There was a rather large and complex body of case law dealing with the applicability of Section 8-319 [former 30-8-319] to cases of this sort. It seems doubtful that the cost of litigating these issues was warranted by whatever protections the statute of frauds offered against fraudulent claims.

Subsection (c) of former Section 8-319 [former 30-8-319(3)] provided that the statute of frauds bar did not apply if a written confirmation was sent and the recipient did not seasonably send an objection. That provision, however, presumably would not have had the effect of binding a broker's customer to the terms of a trade for which confirmation had been sent though the customer had not objected within 10 days. In the first place, the relationship between a broker and customer is ordinarily that of agent and principal; thus the broker is not seeking to enforce a contract for sale of a security, but to bind its principal for action taken by the broker as agent. Former Section 8-319 [former 30-8-319] did not by its terms apply to the agency relationship. Moreover, even if former Section 8-319(c) [former 30-8-319(3)] applied, it is doubtful that it, of its own force, had the effect of precluding the customer from disputing whether there was a contract or what the terms of the contract were. Former Section 8-319(c) [former 30-8-319(3)] only removed the statute of frauds as a bar to enforcement; it did not say that there was a contract or that the confirmation had the effect of excluding other evidence of its terms. Thus, deletion of former Section 8-319 [former 30-8-319] does not change the law one way or the other on whether a customer who fails to object to a written confirmation is precluded from denying the trade described in the confirmation, because that issue was never governed by former Section 8-319(c) [former 30-8-319(3)].

8. Miscellaneous.

Prior Section 8-105 [former 30-8-105]. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deletes the statement found in Section 8-105(1) [former 30-8-105(1)] of the prior version that certificated securities "are negotiable instruments." This provision was added very late in the drafting process of the original Uniform Commercial Code. Apparently the thought was that it might be useful in dealing with potential transition problems arising out of the fact that bonds were then treated as negotiable instruments under the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law. During that era, many other statutes, such as those specifying permissible categories of investments for regulated entities, might have used such phrases as "negotiable securities" or "negotiable instruments." Section 8-105 [former 30-8-105] seems to have been included in the original version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] to avoid unfortunate interpretations of those other statutes once securities were moved from the Uniform Negotiable Instruments Law to UCC Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Whether or not Section 8-105 [former 30-8-105] was necessary at that time, it has surely outlived its purpose. The statement that securities "are negotiable instruments" is very confusing. As used in the Uniform Commercial Code, the term "negotiable instrument" means an instrument that is governed by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]; yet Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] securities are not governed by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Courts have occasionally cited Section 8-105(1) [former 30-8-105(1)] of prior law for the proposition that the rules that are generally thought of as characteristic of negotiability, such as the rule that bona fide purchasers take free from adverse claims, apply to certificated securities. Section 8-105(1) [former 30-8-105(1)], however, is unnecessary for that purpose, since the relevant rules are set out in specific provisions of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8].

Prior Sections 8-107 and 8-314 [former 30-8-107 and 30-8-314]. Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] has never been, and should not be, a comprehensive codification of the law of contracts for the purchase and sale of securities. The prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] did contain, however, a number of provisions dealing with miscellaneous aspects of the law of contracts as applied to contracts for the sale of securities. Section 8-107 [former 30-8-107] dealt with one remedy for breach, and Section 8-314 [former 30-8-314] dealt with certain aspects of performance. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deletes these on the theory that inclusion of a few sections on issues of contract law is likely to cause more harm than good since inferences might be drawn from the failure to cover related issues. The deletion of these sections is not, however, intended as a rejection of the rules of contract law and interpretation that they expressed.

Prior Section 8-315 [former 30-8-315]. It is not entirely clear what the function of Section 8-315 [former 30-8-315] of prior law was. The section specified that the owner of a security could recover it from a person to whom it had been transferred, if the transferee did not qualify as a bona fide purchaser. It seems to have been intended only to recognize that securities, like any other form of personal property, are governed by the general principle of property law that an owner can recover property from a person to whom it has been transferred under circumstances that did not cut off the owner's claim. Although many other Articles of the UCC deal with cut-off rules, Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] was the only one that included an affirmative statement of the rights of an owner to recover her property. It seems wiser to adopt the same approach as in Articles 2, 3, 7, and 9 [Title 30, chapters 2, 3, 7, and 9A], and leave this point to other law. Accordingly, Section 8-315 [former 30-8-315] is deleted in Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], without, of course, implying rejection of the nearly self-evident rule that it sought to express.

Prior Section 8-407 [former 30-8-407]. This section, entitled "Exchangeability of Securities," seemed to say that holders of securities had the right to cause issuers to convert them back and forth from certificated to uncertificated form. The provision, however, applied only if the issuer "regularly maintains a system for issuing the class of securities involved under which both certificated and uncertificated securities are regularly issued to the category of owners, which includes the person in whose name the new security is to be registered." The provision seems unnecessary, since it applied only if the issuer decided that it should. The matter can be covered by agreement or corporate charter or by-laws.

Short Title and General Matters

Official Comment

Purposes: This chapter sets forth certain rights and duties of the issuers of and the parties that deal with investment securities, both certificated and uncertificated. Unlike a corporation code, it does not set forth general rules defining property rights that accrue to holders of securities. And unlike a Blue Sky statute it does not set forth specific requirements for disclosing to the public the nature of the property interest that is the security. Rather it sets forth rules relative to the transfer of the rights that constitute securities and to the establishment of those rights against the issuer and other parties.

As is true with respect to all other Chapters of the Code, parties may by agreement create rights and duties between themselves that vary from those set forth in this Chapter. Section 30-1-102(3). But prejudice to the rights of those not party to the agreement is limited by Code provisions (e.g., Sections 30-8-313 and 30-8-321, both repealed) as well as by general legal principles that supplement the Code. See Section 30-1-103 and Comment 2 to Section 30-1-102.

This Chapter does not purport to determine whether a particular issue of securities should be represented by certificates, in whole or in part. That determination is left to the parties involved, subject to federal and state law.

Reasons for 1977 Change: Although the title of the Chapter has not been changed, its coverage has been broadened, by amendment to Section 30-8-102 [substance now in 30-8-112], to include both securities which are reified, i.e., represented by certificates or other instruments, and those which are not. The former are defined as "certificated securities" and constitute the entire subject matter of present Chapter 8. The latter are defined as "uncertificated securities" and are not now expressly covered by the Uniform Commercial Code. The revised Chapter is intended to govern the relationships, rights and duties of the issuers of and the parties that deal with both certificated and uncertificated securities to the same extent that present Chapter 8 governs such relationships, rights and duties with respect to certificated securities alone.

This Chapter does not purport to determine whether a particular issue of securities should be represented by certificates, in whole or in part. It is contemplated that such determination will be made by the issuer under appropriate state or federal law. It is further contemplated that a particular issue of securities may be partly certificated and partly uncertificated, in which event the determination will be at the option of the owner to the extent that the issuer permits.

The form of the Chapter has been disturbed as little as possible and each numbered section deals with the subject matter of the similarly numbered section of the present Chapter. Only four new sections, 30-8-108, 30-8-321, 30-8-407 and 30-8-408 [all repealed], have been added.

Official Comment:

1. "Adverse claim." The definition of the term "adverse claim" has two components. First, the term refers only to property interests. Second, the term means not merely that a person has a property interest in a financial asset but that it is a violation of the claimant's property interest for the other person to hold or transfer the security or other financial asset.

The term adverse claim is not, of course, limited to ownership rights, but extends to other property interests established by other law. A security interest, for example, would be an adverse claim with respect to a transferee from the debtor since any effort by the secured party to enforce the security interest against the property would be an interference with the transferee's interest.

The definition of adverse claim in the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] might have been read to suggest that any wrongful action concerning a security, even a simple breach of contract, gave rise to an adverse claim. Insofar as such cases as Fallon v. Wall Street Clearing Corp., 586 N.Y.S.2d 953, 182 A.D.2d 245, (1992) and Pentech Intl. v. Wall St. Clearing Co., 983 F.2d 441 (2d Cir.1993), were based on that view, they are rejected by the new definition which explicitly limits the term adverse claim to property interests. Suppose, for example, that A contracts to sell or deliver securities to B, but fails to do so and instead sells or pledges the securities to C. B, the promisee, has an action against A for breach of contract, but absent unusual circumstances the action for breach would not give rise to a property interest in the securities. Accordingly, B does not have an adverse claim. An adverse claim might, however, be based upon principles of equitable remedies that give rise to property claims. It would, for example, cover a right established by other law to rescind a transaction in which securities were transferred. Suppose, for example, that A holds securities and is induced by B's fraud to transfer them to B. Under the law of contract or restitution, A may have a right to rescind the transfer, which gives A a property claim to the securities. If so, A has an adverse claim to the securities in B's hands. By contrast, if B had committed no fraud, but had merely committed a breach of contract in connection with the transfer from A to B, A may have only a right to damages for breach, not a right to rescind. In that case, A would not have an adverse claim to the securities in B's hands.

2. "Bearer form." The definition of "bearer form" has remained substantially unchanged since the early drafts of the original version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. The requirement that the certificate be payable to bearer by its terms rather than by an indorsement has the effect of preventing instruments governed by other law, such as chattel paper or Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] negotiable instruments, from being inadvertently swept into the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] definition of security merely by virtue of blank indorsements. Although the other elements of the definition of security in Section 8-102(a)(14) [30-8-112(1)(o)] probably suffice for that purpose in any event, the language used in the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] has been retained.

3. "Broker." Broker is defined by reference to the definitions of broker and dealer in the federal securities laws. The only difference is that banks, which are excluded from the federal securities law definition, are included in the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] definition when they perform functions that would bring them within the federal securities law definition if it did not have the clause excluding banks. The definition covers both those who act as agents ("brokers" in securities parlance) and those who act as principals ("dealers" in securities parlance). Since the definition refers to persons "defined" as brokers or dealers under the federal securities law, rather than to persons required to "register" as brokers or dealers under the federal securities law, it covers not only registered brokers and dealers but also those exempt from the registration requirement, such as purely intrastate brokers. The only substantive rules that turn on the defined term broker are one provision of the section on warranties, Section 8-108(i) [30-8-118(9)], and the special perfection rule in Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] for security interests granted by brokers, Section 9-115(4)(c) [30-9-115(4)(c), now repealed, see 30-9A-309].

4. "Certificated security." The term "certificated security" means a security that is represented by a security certificate.

5. "Clearing corporation." The definition of clearing corporation limits its application to entities that are subject to a rigorous regulatory framework. Accordingly, the definition includes only federal reserve banks, persons who are registered as "clearing agencies" under the federal securities laws (which impose a comprehensive system of regulation of the activities and rules of clearing agencies), and other entities subject to a comparable system of regulatory oversight.

6. "Communicate." The term "communicate" assures that the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules will be sufficiently flexible to adapt to changes in information technology. Sending a signed writing always suffices as a communication, but the parties can agree that a different means of transmitting information is to be used. Agreement is defined in Section 1-201(3) [30-1-201(3)] as "the bargain of the parties in fact as found in their language or by implication from other circumstances including course of dealing or usage of trade or course of performance." Thus, use of an information transmission method might be found to be authorized by agreement, even though the parties have not explicitly so specified in a formal agreement. The term communicate is used in Sections 8-102(a)(7) [30-8-112(1)(h)] (definition of entitlement order), 8-102(a)(11) [30-8-112(1)(l)] (definition of instruction), and 8-403 [30-8-413] (demand that issuer not register transfer).

7. "Entitlement holder." This term designates those who hold financial assets through intermediaries in the indirect holding system. Because many of the rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] impose duties on securities intermediaries in favor of entitlement holders, the definition of entitlement holder is, in most cases, limited to the person specifically designated as such on the records of the intermediary. The last sentence of the definition covers the relatively unusual cases where a person may acquire a security entitlement under Section 8-501 [30-8-501] even though the person may not be specifically designated as an entitlement holder on the records of the securities intermediary.

A person may have an interest in a security entitlement, and may even have the right to give entitlement orders to the securities intermediary with respect to it, even though the person is not the entitlement holder. For example, a person who holds securities through a securities account in its own name may have given discretionary trading authority to another person, such as an investment adviser. Similarly, the control provisions in Section 8-106 [30-8-116] and the related provisions in Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] are designed to facilitate transactions in which a person who holds securities through a securities account uses them as collateral in an arrangement where the securities intermediary has agreed that if the secured party so directs the intermediary will dispose of the positions. In such arrangements, the debtor remains the entitlement holder but has agreed that the secured party can initiate entitlement orders. Moreover, an entitlement holder may be acting for another person as a nominee, agent, trustee, or in another capacity. Unless the entitlement holder is itself acting as a securities intermediary for the other person, in which case the other person would be an entitlement holder with respect to the securities entitlement, the relationship between an entitlement holder and another person for whose benefit the entitlement holder holds a securities entitlement is governed by other law.

8. "Entitlement order." This term is defined as a notification communicated to a securities intermediary directing transfer or redemption of the financial asset to which an entitlement holder has a security entitlement. The term is used in the rules for the indirect holding system in a fashion analogous to the use of the terms "indorsement" and "instruction" in the rules for the direct holding system. If a person directly holds a certificated security in registered form and wishes to transfer it, the means of transfer is an indorsement. If a person directly holds an uncertificated security and wishes to transfer it, the means of transfer is an instruction. If a person holds a security entitlement, the means of disposition is an entitlement order. An entitlement order includes a direction under Section 8-508 [30-8-508] to the securities intermediary to transfer a financial asset to the account of the entitlement holder at another financial intermediary or to cause the financial asset to be transferred to the entitlement holder in the direct holding system (e.g., the delivery of a securities certificate registered in the name of the former entitlement holder). As noted in Comment 7, an entitlement order need not be initiated by the entitlement holder in order to be effective, so long as the entitlement holder has authorized the other party to initiate entitlement orders. See Section 8-107(b) [30-8-117(2)].

9. "Financial asset." The definition of "financial asset," in conjunction with the definition of "securities account" in Section 8-501 [30-8-501], sets the scope of the indirect holding system rules of Part 5 of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. The Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules apply not only to securities held through intermediaries, but also to other financial assets held through intermediaries. The term financial asset is defined to include not only securities but also a broader category of obligations, shares, participations, and interests.

Having separate definitions of security and financial asset makes it possible to separate the question of the proper scope of the traditional Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules from the question of the proper scope of the new indirect holding system rules. Some forms of financial assets should be covered by the indirect holding system rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5], but not by the rules of Parts 2, 3, and 4 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4]. The term financial asset is used to cover such property. Because the term security entitlement is defined in terms of financial assets rather than securities, the rules concerning security entitlements set out in Part 5 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] and in Revised Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] apply to the broader class of financial assets.

The fact that something does or could fall within the definition of financial asset does not, without more, trigger Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] coverage. The indirect holding system rules of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] apply only if the financial asset is in fact held in a securities account, so that the interest of the person who holds the financial asset through the securities account is a security entitlement. Thus, questions of the scope of the indirect holding system rules cannot be framed as "Is such-and-such a 'financial asset' under Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]?" Rather, one must analyze whether the relationship between an institution and a person on whose behalf the institution holds an asset falls within the scope of the term securities account as defined in Section 8-501 [30-8-501]. That question turns in large measure on whether it makes sense to apply the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules to the relationship.

The term financial asset is used to refer both to the underlying asset and the particular means by which ownership of that asset is evidenced. Thus, with respect to a certificated security, the term financial asset may, as context requires, refer either to the interest or obligation of the issuer or to the security certificate representing that interest or obligation. Similarly, if a person holds a security or other financial asset through a securities account, the term financial asset may, as context requires, refer either to the underlying asset or to the person's security entitlement.

10. "Good faith." Good faith is defined in Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] for purposes of the application to Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] of Section 1-203 [30-1-203], which provides that "Every contract or duty within this Act imposes an obligation of good faith in its performance or enforcement." The sole function of the good faith definition in Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is to give content to the Section 1-203 [30-1-203] obligation as it applies to contracts and duties that are governed by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. The standard is one of "reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing." The reference to commercial standards makes clear that assessments of conduct are to be made in light of the commercial setting. The substantive rules of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] have been drafted to take account of the commercial circumstances of the securities holding and processing system. For example, Section 8-115 [30-8-125] provides that a securities intermediary acting on an effective entitlement order, or a broker or other agent acting as a conduit in a securities transaction, is not liable to an adverse claimant, unless the claimant obtained legal process or the intermediary acted in collusion with the wrongdoer. This, and other similar provisions, see Sections 8-404 and 8-503(e) [30-8-414 and 30-8-503(5)], do not depend on notice of adverse claims, because it would impair rather than advance the interest of investors in having a sound and efficient securities clearance and settlement system to require intermediaries to investigate the propriety of the transactions they are processing. The good faith obligation does not supplant the standards of conduct established in provisions of this kind.

In Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], the definition of good faith is not germane to the question whether a purchaser takes free from adverse claims. The rules on such questions as whether a purchaser who takes in suspicious circumstances is disqualified from protected purchaser status are treated not as an aspect of good faith but directly in the rules of Section 8-105 [30-8-115] on notice of adverse claims.

11. "Indorsement" is defined as a signature made on a security certificate or separate document for purposes of transferring or redeeming the security. The definition is adapted from the language of Section 8-308(1) [former 30-8-308(1)] of the prior version and from the definition of indorsement in the Negotiable Instruments Article, see Section 3-204(a) [30-3-203(1)]. The definition of indorsement does not include the requirement that the signature be made by an appropriate person or be authorized. Those questions are treated in the separate substantive provision on whether the indorsement is effective, rather than in the definition of indorsement. See Section 8-107 [30-8-117].

12. "Instruction" is defined as a notification communicated to the issuer of an uncertificated security directing that transfer be registered or that the security be redeemed. Instructions are the analog for uncertificated securities of indorsements of certificated securities.

13. "Registered form." The definition of "registered form" is substantially the same as in the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Like the definition of bearer form, it serves primarily to distinguish Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] securities from instruments governed by other law, such as Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3].

14. "Securities intermediary." A "securities intermediary" is a person that in the ordinary course of its business maintains securities accounts for others and is acting in that capacity. The most common examples of securities intermediaries would be clearing corporations holding securities for their participants, banks acting as securities custodians, and brokers holding securities on behalf of their customers. Clearing corporations are listed separately as a category of securities intermediary in subparagraph (i) [subsection (1)(n)(i)] even though in most circumstances they would fall within the general definition in subparagraph (ii) [subsection (1)(n)(ii)]. The reason is to simplify the analysis of arrangements such as the NSCCDTC system in which NSCC performs the comparison, clearance, and netting function, while DTC acts as the depository. Because NSCC is a registered clearing agency under the federal securities laws, it is a clearing corporation and hence a securities intermediary under Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], regardless of whether it is at any particular time or in any particular aspect of its operations holding securities on behalf of its participants.

The terms securities intermediary and broker have different meanings. Broker means a person engaged in the business of buying and selling securities, as agent for others or as principal. Securities intermediary means a person maintaining securities accounts for others. A stockbroker, in the colloquial sense, may or may not be acting as a securities intermediary.

The definition of securities intermediary includes the requirement that the person in question is "acting in the capacity" of maintaining securities accounts for others. This is to take account of the fact that a particular entity, such as a bank, may act in many different capacities in securities transactions. A bank may act as a transfer agent for issuers, as a securities custodian for institutional investors and private investors, as a dealer in government securities, as a lender taking securities as collateral, and as a provider of general payment and collection services that might be used in connection with securities transactions. A bank that maintains securities accounts for its customers would be a securities intermediary with respect to those accounts; but if it takes a pledge of securities from a borrower to secure a loan, it is not thereby acting as a securities intermediary with respect to the pledged securities, since it holds them for its own account rather than for a customer. In other circumstances, those two functions might be combined. For example, if the bank is a government securities dealer it may maintain securities accounts for customers and also provide the customers with margin credit to purchase or carry the securities, in much the same way that brokers provide margin loans to their customers.

15. "Security." The definition of "security" has three components. First, there is the subparagraph (i) [subsection (1)(o)(i)] test that the interest or obligation be fully transferable, in the sense that the issuer either maintains transfer books or the obligation or interest is represented by a certificate in bearer or registered form. Second, there is the subparagraph (ii) [subsection (1)(o)(ii)] test that the interest or obligation be divisible, that is, one of a class or series, as distinguished from individual obligations of the sort governed by ordinary contract law or by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Third, there is the subparagraph (iii) [subsection (1)(o)(iii)] functional test, which generally turns on whether the interest or obligation is, or is of a type, dealt in or traded on securities markets or securities exchanges. There is, however, an "opt-in" provision in subparagraph (iii) [subsection (1)(o)(iii)] which permits the issuer of any interest or obligation that is "a medium of investment" to specify that it is a security governed by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8].

The divisibility test of subparagraph (ii) [subsection (1)(o)(ii)] applies to the security—that is, the underlying intangible interest—not the means by which that interest is evidenced. Thus, securities issued in book-entry only form meet the divisibility test because the underlying intangible interest is divisible via the mechanism of the indirect holding system. This is so even though the clearing corporation is the only eligible direct holder of the security.

The third component, the functional test in subparagraph (iii) [subsection (1)(o)(iii)], provides flexibility while ensuring that the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules do not apply to interests or obligations in circumstances so unconnected with the securities markets that parties are unlikely to have thought of the possibility that Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] might apply. Subparagraph (iii)(A) [subsection (1)(o)(iii)(A)] covers interests or obligations that either are dealt in or traded on securities exchanges or securities markets, or are of a type dealt in or traded on securities exchanges or securities markets. The "is dealt in or traded on" phrase eliminates problems in the characterization of new forms of securities which are to be traded in the markets, even though no similar type has previously been dealt in or traded in the markets. Subparagraph (iii)(B) [subsection (1)(o)(ii)(B)] covers the broader category of media for investment, but it applies only if the terms of the interest or obligation specify that it is an Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] security. This opt-in provision allows for deliberate expansion of the scope of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8].

Section 8-103 [30-8-113] contains additional rules on the treatment of particular interests as securities or financial assets.

16. "Security certificate." The term "security" refers to the underlying asset, e.g., 1000 shares of common stock of Acme, Inc. The term "security certificate" refers to the paper certificates that have traditionally been used to embody the underlying intangible interest.

17. "Security entitlement" means the rights and property interest of a person who holds securities or other financial assets through a securities intermediary. A security entitlement is both a package of personal rights against the securities intermediary and an interest in the property held by the securities intermediary. A security entitlement is not, however, a specific property interest in any financial asset held by the securities intermediary or by the clearing corporation through which the securities intermediary holds the financial asset. See Sections 8-104(c) and 8-503 [30-8-114(3) and 30-8-503]. The formal definition of security entitlement set out in subsection (a)(16)[(1)(q)] of this section is a cross-reference to the rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. In a sense, then, the entirety of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] is the definition of security entitlement. The Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules specify the rights and property interest that comprise a security entitlement.

18. "Uncertificated security." The term "uncertificated security" means a security that is not represented by a security certificate. For uncertificated securities, there is no need to draw any distinction between the underlying asset and the means by which a direct holder's interest in that asset is evidenced. Compare "certificated security" and "security certificate."

30-8-113. Rules for determining whether certain obligations and interests are securities or financial assets.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-103, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section contains rules that supplement the definitions of "financial asset" and "security" in Section 8-102 [30-8-112]. The Section 8-102 [30-8-112] definitions are worded in general terms, because they must be sufficiently comprehensive and flexible to cover the wide variety of investment products that now exist or may develop. The rules in this section are intended to foreclose interpretive issues concerning the application of the general definitions to several specific investment products. No implication is made about the application of the Section 8-102 [30-8-112] definitions to investment products not covered by this section.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] establishes an unconditional rule that ordinary corporate stock is a security. That is so whether or not the particular issue is dealt in or traded on securities exchanges or in securities markets. Thus, shares of closely held corporations are Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] securities.

3. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] establishes that the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] term "security" includes the various forms of the investment vehicles offered to the public by investment companies registered as such under the federal Investment Company Act of 1940, as amended. This clarification is prompted principally by the fact that the typical transaction in shares of open-end investment companies is an issuance or redemption, rather than a transfer of shares from one person to another as is the case with ordinary corporate stock. For similar reasons, the definitions of indorsement, instruction, and entitlement order in Section 8-102 [30-8-112] refer to "redemptions" as well as "transfers," to ensure that the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules on such matters as signature guaranties, Section 8-306 [30-8-336], assurances, Sections 8-402 and 8-507 [30-8-412 and 30-8-507], and effectiveness, Section 8-107 [30-8-117], apply to directions to redeem mutual fund shares. The exclusion of insurance products is needed because some insurance company separate accounts are registered under the Investment Company Act of 1940, but these are not traded under the usual Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] mechanics.

4. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] is designed to foreclose interpretive questions that might otherwise be raised by the application of the "of a type" language of Section 8-102(a)(15)(iii) [30-8-112(1)(o)(iii)] to partnership interests. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] establishes the general rule that partnership interests or shares of limited liability companies are not Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] securities unless they are in fact dealt in or traded on securities exchanges or in securities markets. The issuer, however, may explicitly "opt-in" by specifying that the interests or shares are securities governed by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Partnership interests or shares of limited liability companies are included in the broader term "financial asset." Thus, if they are held through a securities account, the indirect holding system rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] apply, and the interest of a person who holds them through such an account is a security entitlement.

5. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] deals with the line between Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] negotiable instruments and Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] investment securities. It continues the rule of the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] that a writing that meets the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] definition is covered by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rather than Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3], even though it also meets the definition of negotiable instrument. However, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides that an Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] negotiable instrument is a "financial asset" so that the indirect holding system rules apply if the instrument is held through a securities intermediary. This facilitates making items such as money market instruments eligible for deposit in clearing corporations.

6. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] is included to clarify the treatment of investment products such as traded stock options, which are treated as financial assets but not securities. Thus, the indirect holding system rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] apply, but the direct holding system rules of Parts 2, 3, and 4 [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4] do not.

7. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] excludes commodity contracts from all of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. However, the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] rules on security interests in investment property do apply to security interests in commodity positions. See Section 9-115 [30-9-115, now repealed, see 30-9A-102] and Comment 8 thereto. "Commodity contract" is defined in Section 9-115 [30-9-115, now repealed, see 30-9A-102].

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 305 in (6) substituted "30-9-122" (renumbered 30-9A-102) for "30-9-115". Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

Case Notes

Annuity Contract Considered Investment, Not Life Insurance: Miles invested $30,000 in a tax-deferred variable annuity contract. After Mile's death, the plaintiffs demanded one-half of the annuity investment on grounds that the annuity was life insurance that they were entitled to under Miles' will. The District Court denied their demand, holding that the annuity contract did not constitute insurance under Montana law. On appeal, the heirs cited In re Fligman's Estate, 113 M 505, 129 P2d 627 (1942), for the proposition that because annuity contracts were considered insurance for inheritance tax purposes in that case, it followed that annuity contracts have to be considered insurance for all purposes. The Supreme Court held that because the annuity contract in Miles' case did not involve indemnification, loss, damage, liability, or contingent events, it was an investment, not insurance, and the District Court did not err in so holding. In re Estate of Miles v. Miles, 2000 MT 41, 298 M 312, 994 P2d 1139, 57 St. Rep. 191 (2000).

30-8-114. Acquisition of security or financial asset or interest therein.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-104, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section lists the ways in which interests in securities and other financial assets are acquired under Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. In that sense, it describes the scope of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] describes the two ways that a person may acquire a security or interest therein under this Article [chapter]: (1) by delivery (Section 8-301 [30-8-331]), and (2) by acquiring a security entitlement. Each of these methods is described in detail in the relevant substantive provisions of this Article [chapter]. Part 3 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 3], beginning with the definition of "delivery" in Section 8-301 [30-8-331], describes how interests in securities are acquired in the direct holding system. Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5], beginning with the rules of Section 8-501 [30-8-501] on how security entitlements are acquired, describes how interests in securities are acquired in the indirect holding system.

Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] specifies how a person may acquire an interest under Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] in a financial asset other than a security. This Article [chapter] deals with financial assets other than securities only insofar as they are held in the indirect holding system. For example, a bankers' acceptance falls within the definition of "financial asset," so if it is held through a securities account the entitlement holder's right to it is a security entitlement governed by Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. The bankers' acceptance itself, however, is a negotiable instrument governed by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3], not by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Thus, the provisions of Parts 2, 3, and 4 of this Article [Title 30, chapter 8, parts 2, 3, and 4] that deal with the rights of direct holders of securities are not applicable. Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3], not Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], specifies how one acquires a direct interest in a bankers' acceptance. If a bankers' acceptance is delivered to a clearing corporation to be held for the account of the clearing corporation's participants, the clearing corporation becomes the holder of the bankers' acceptance under the Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] rules specifying how negotiable instruments are transferred. The rights of the clearing corporation's participants, however, are governed by Part 5 of this Article [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5].

2. The distinction in usage in Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] between the term "security" (and its correlatives "security certificate" and "uncertificated security") on the one hand, and "security entitlement" on the other, corresponds to the distinction between the direct and indirect holding systems. For example, with respect to certificated securities that can be held either directly or through intermediaries, obtaining possession of a security certificate and acquiring a security entitlement are both means of holding the underlying security. For many other purposes, there is no need to draw a distinction between the means of holding. For purposes of commercial law analysis, however, the form of holding may make a difference. Where an item of property can be held in different ways, the rules on how one deals with it, including how one transfers it or how one grants a security interest in it, differ depending on the form of holding.

Although a security entitlement is means of holding the underlying security or other financial asset, a person who has a security entitlement does not have any direct claim to a specific asset in the possession of the securities intermediary. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides explicitly that a person who acquires a security entitlement is a "purchaser" of any security, security entitlement, or other financial asset held by the securities intermediary only in the sense that under Section 8-503 [30-8-503] a security entitlement is treated as a sui generis form of property interest.

3. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] is designed to ensure that parties will retain their expected legal rights and duties under Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. One of the major changes made by the revision is that the rules for the indirect holding system are stated in terms of the "security entitlements" held by investors, rather than speaking of them as holding direct interests in securities. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] is designed as a translation rule to eliminate problems of co-ordination of terminology, and facilitate the continued use of systems for the efficient handling of securities and financial assets through securities intermediaries and clearing corporations. The efficiencies of a securities intermediary or clearing corporation are, in part, dependent on the ability to transfer securities credited to securities accounts in the intermediary or clearing corporation to the account of an issuer, its agent, or other person by book entry in a manner that permits exchanges, redemptions, conversions, and other transactions (which may be governed by pre-existing or new agreements, constitutional documents, or other instruments) to occur and to avoid the need to withdraw from immobilization in an intermediary or clearing corporation physical securities in order to deliver them for such purposes. Existing corporate charters, indentures and like documents may require the "presentation," "surrender," "delivery," or "transfer" of securities or security certificates for purposes of exchange, redemption, conversion or other reason. Likewise, documents may use a wide variety of terminology to describe, in the context for example of a tender or exchange offer, the means of putting the offeror or the issuer or its agent in possession of the security. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] takes the place of provisions of prior law which could be used to reach the legal conclusion that book-entry transfers are equivalent to physical delivery to the person to whose account the book entry is credited.

30-8-115. Notice of adverse claim.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-105, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. The rules specifying whether adverse claims can be asserted against persons who acquire securities or security entitlements, Sections 8-303, 8-502, and 8-510 [30-8-333, 30-8-502, and 30-8-510], provide that one is protected against an adverse claim only if one takes without notice of the claim. This section defines notice of an adverse claim.

The general Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] definition of "notice" in Section 1-201(25) [30-1-201(25)] which provides that a person has notice of a fact if "from all the facts and circumstances known to him at the time in question he has reason to know that it exists"does not apply to the interpretation of "notice of adverse claims." The Section 1-201(25) [30-1-201(25)] definition of "notice" does, however, apply to usages of that term and its cognates in Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] in contexts other than notice of adverse claims.

2. This section must be interpreted in light of the definition of "adverse claim" in Section 8-102(a)(1) [30-8-112(1)(a)]. "Adverse claim" does not include all circumstances in which a third party has a property interest in securities, but only those situations where a security is transferred in violation of the claimant's property interest. Therefore, awareness that someone other than the transferor has a property interest is not notice of an adverse claim. The transferee must be aware that the transfer violates the other party's property interest. If A holds securities in which B has some form of property interest, and A transfers the securities to C, C may know that B has an interest, but infer that A is acting in accordance with A's obligations to B. The mere fact that C knew that B had a property interest does not mean that C had notice of an adverse claim. Whether C had notice of an adverse claim depends on whether C had sufficient awareness that A was acting in violation of B's property rights. The rule in subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is a particularization of this general principle.

3. Paragraph (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] provides that a person has notice of an adverse claim if the person has knowledge of the adverse claim. Knowledge is defined in Section 1-201(25) [30-1-201(25)] as actual knowledge.

4. Paragraph (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] provides that a person has notice of an adverse claim if the person is aware of a significant probability that an adverse claim exists and deliberately avoids information that might establish the existence of the adverse claim. This is intended to codify the "willful blindness" test that has been applied in such cases. See May v. Chapman, 16 M. & W. 355, 153 Eng.Rep. 1225 (1847); Goodman v. Simonds, 61 U.S. 343 (1857).

The first prong of the willful blindness test of paragraph (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] turns on whether the person is aware facts sufficient to indicate that there is a significant probability that an adverse claim exists. The "awareness" aspect necessarily turns on the actor's state of mind. Whether facts known to a person make the person aware of a "significant probability" that an adverse claim exists turns on facts about the world and the conclusions that would be drawn from those facts, taking account of the experience and position of the person in question. A particular set of facts might indicate a significant probability of an adverse claim to a professional with considerable experience in the usual methods and procedures by which securities transactions are conducted, even though the same facts would not indicate a significant probability of an adverse claim to a non-professional.

The second prong of the willful blindness test of paragraph (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] turns on whether the person "deliberately avoids information" that would establish the existence of the adverse claim. The test is the character of the person's response to the information the person has. The question is whether the person deliberately failed to seek further information because of concern that suspicions would be confirmed.

Application of the "deliberate avoidance" test to a transaction by an organization focuses on the knowledge and the actions of the individual or individuals conducting the transaction on behalf of the organization. Thus, an organization that purchases a security is not willfully blind to an adverse claim unless the officers or agents who conducted that purchase transaction are willfully blind to the adverse claim. Under the two prongs of the willful blindness test, the individual or individuals conducting a transaction must know of facts indicating a substantial probability that the adverse claim exists and deliberately fail to seek further information that might confirm or refute the indication. For this purpose, information known to individuals within an organization who are not conducting or aware of a transaction, but not forwarded to the individuals conducting the transaction, is not pertinent in determining whether the individuals conducting the transaction had knowledge of a substantial probability of the existence of the adverse claim. Cf. Section 1-201(27) [30-1-201(27)]. An organization may also "deliberately avoid information" if it acts to preclude or inhibit transmission of pertinent information to those individuals responsible for the conduct of purchase transactions.

5. Paragraph (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)] provides that a person has notice of an adverse claim if the person would have learned of the adverse claim by conducting an investigation that is required by other statute or regulation. This rule applies only if there is some other statute or regulation that explicitly requires persons dealing with securities to conduct some investigation. The federal securities laws require that brokers and banks, in certain specified circumstances, check with a stolen securities registry to determine whether securities offered for sale or pledge have been reported as stolen. If securities that were listed as stolen in the registry are taken by an institution that failed to comply with requirement to check the registry, the institution would be held to have notice of the fact that they were stolen under paragraph (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)]. Accordingly, the institution could not qualify as a protected purchaser under Section 8-303 [30-8-333]. The same result has been reached under the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. See First Nat'l Bank of Cicero v. Lewco Securities, 860 F.2d 1407 (7th Cir.1988).

6. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides explicitly for some situations involving purchase from one described or identifiable as a representative. Knowledge of the existence of the representative relation is not enough in itself to constitute "notice of an adverse claim" that would disqualify the purchaser from protected purchaser status. A purchaser may take a security on the inference that the representative is acting properly. Knowledge that a security is being transferred to an individual account of the representative or that the proceeds of the transaction will be paid into that account is not sufficient to constitute "notice of an adverse claim," but knowledge that the proceeds will be applied to the personal indebtedness of the representative is. See State Bank of Binghamton v. Bache, 162 Misc. 128, 293 N.Y.S. 667 (1937).

7. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] specifies whether a purchaser of a "stale" security is charged with notice of adverse claims, and therefore disqualified from protected purchaser status under Section 8-303 [30-8-333]. The fact of "staleness" is viewed as notice of certain defects after the lapse of stated periods, but the maturity of the security does not operate automatically to affect holders' rights. The periods of time here stated are shorter than those appearing in the provisions of this Article [chapter] on staleness as notice of defects or defenses of an issuer (Section 8-203 [30-8-213]) since a purchaser who takes a security after funds or other securities are available for its redemption has more reason to suspect claims of ownership than issuer's defenses. An owner will normally turn in a security rather than transfer it at such a time. Of itself, a default never constitutes notice of a possible adverse claim. To provide otherwise would not tend to drive defaulted securities home and would serve only to disrupt current financial markets where many defaulted securities are actively traded. Unpaid or overdue coupons attached to a bond do not bring it within the operation of this subsection, though they may be relevant under the general test of notice of adverse claims in subsection (a) [subsection (1)].

8. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides the owner of a certificated security with a means of protection while a security certificate is being sent in for redemption or exchange. The owner may endorse it "for collection" or "for surrender," and this constitutes notice of the owner's claims, under subsection (d) [subsection (4)].

30-8-116. Control.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-106, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. The concept of "control" plays a key role in various provisions dealing with the rights of purchasers, including secured parties. See Sections 8-303 [30-8-333] (protected purchasers); 8-503(e) [30-8-503(5)] (purchasers from securities intermediaries); 8-510 [30-8-510] (purchasers of security entitlements from entitlement holders); 9-314 [30-9A-314] (perfection of security interests); 9-328 [30-9A-328] (priorities among conflicting security interests).

Obtaining "control" means that the purchaser has taken whatever steps are necessary, given the manner in which the securities are held, to place itself in a position where it can have the securities sold, without further action by the owner.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that a purchaser obtains "control" with respect to a certificated security in bearer form by taking "delivery," as defined in Section 8-301 [30-8-331]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that a purchaser obtains "control" with respect to a certificated security in registered form by taking "delivery," as defined in Section 8-301 [30-8-331], provided that the security certificate has been indorsed to the purchaser or in blank. Section 8-301 [30-8-331] provides that delivery of a certificated security occurs when the purchaser obtains possession of the security certificate, or when an agent for the purchaser (other than a securities intermediary) either acquires possession or acknowledges that the agent holds for the purchaser.

3. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] specifies the means by which a purchaser can obtain control over uncertificated securities which the transferor holds directly. Two mechanisms are possible.

Under subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a)], securities can be "delivered" to a purchaser. Section 8-301(b) [30-8-331(2)] provides that "delivery" of an uncertificated security occurs when the purchaser becomes the registered holder. So far as the issuer is concerned, the purchaser would then be entitled to exercise all rights of ownership. See Section 8-207 [30-8-217]. As between the parties to a purchase transaction, however, the rights of the purchaser are determined by their contract. Cf. Section 9-202 [30-9-202, now repealed, see 30-9A-202]. Arrangements covered by this paragraph are analogous to arrangements in which bearer certificates are delivered to a secured party—so far as the issuer or any other parties are concerned, the secured party appears to be the outright owner, although it is in fact holding as collateral property that belongs to the debtor.

Under subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)], a purchaser has control if the issuer has agreed to act on the instructions of the purchaser, even though the owner remains listed as the registered owner. The issuer, of course, would be acting wrongfully against the registered owner if it entered into such an agreement without the consent of the registered owner. Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] makes this point explicit. The subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)] provision makes it possible for issuers to offer a service akin to the registered pledge device of the 1978 version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], without mandating that all issuers offer that service.

4. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] specifies the means by which a purchaser can obtain control of a security entitlement. Three mechanisms are possible, analogous to those provided in subsection (c) [subsection (3)] for uncertificated securities. Under subsection (d)(1) [subsection (4)(a)], a purchaser has control if it is the entitlement holder. This subsection would apply whether the purchaser holds through the same intermediary that the debtor used, or has the securities position transferred to its own intermediary.

Subsection (d)(2) [subsection (4)(b)] provides that a purchaser has control if the securities intermediary has agreed to act on entitlement orders originated by the purchaser if no further consent by the entitlement holder is required. Under subsection (d)(2) [subsection (4)(b)], control may be achieved even though the original entitlement holder remains as the entitlement holder. Finally, a purchaser may obtain control under subsection (d)(3) [subsection (4)(c)] if another person has control and the person acknowledges that it has control on the purchaser's behalf. Control under subsection (d)(3) [subsection (4)(c)] parallels the delivery of certificated securities and uncertificated securities under Section 8-301 [30-8-331]. Of course, the acknowledging person cannot be the debtor.

This section specifies only the minimum requirements that such an arrangement must meet to confer "control"; the details of the arrangement can be specified by agreement. The arrangement might cover all of the positions in a particular account or subaccount, or only specified positions. There is no requirement that the control party's right to give entitlement orders be exclusive. The arrangement might provide that only the control party can give entitlement orders, or that either the entitlement holder or the control party can give entitlement orders. See subsection (f) [subsection (6)].

The following examples illustrate the application of subsection (d) [subsection (4)]:

Example 1. Debtor grants Alpha Bank a security interest in a security entitlement that includes 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock that Debtor holds through an account with Able & Co. Alpha also has an account with Able. Debtor instructs Able to transfer the shares to Alpha, and Able does so by crediting the shares to Alpha's account. Alpha has control of the 1000 shares under subsection (d)(1) [subsection (4)(a)]. Although Debtor may have become the beneficial owner of the new securities entitlement, as between Debtor and Alpha, Able has agreed to act on Alpha's entitlement orders because, as between Able and Alpha Alpha has become the entitlement holder. See Section 8-506 [30-8-506].

Example 2. Debtor grants Alpha Bank a security interest in a security entitlement that includes 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock that Debtor holds through an account with Able & Co. Alpha does not have an account with Able. Alpha uses Beta Bank as its securities custodian. Debtor instructs Able to transfer the shares to Beta Bank, for the account of Alpha, and Able does so. Alpha has control of the 1000 shares under subsection (d)(1) [subsection (4)(a)]. As in Example 1, although Debtor may have become the beneficial owner of the new securities entitlement, as between Debtor and Alpha, Beta has agree to act on Alpha's entitlement orders because, as between Beta and Alpha, Alpha has become the entitlement holder.

Example 3. Debtor grants Alpha Bank a security interest in a security entitlement that includes 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock that Debtor holds through an account with Able & Co. Debtor, Able, and Alpha enter into an agreement under which Debtor will continue to receive dividends and distributions, and will continue to have the right to direct dispositions, but Alpha also has the right to direct dispositions. Alpha has control of the 1000 shares under subsection (d)(2) [subsection (4)(b)].

Example 4. Able & Co., a securities dealer, grants Alpha Bank a security interest in a security entitlement that includes 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock that Able holds through an account with Clearing Corporation. Able causes Clearing Corporation to transfer the shares into Alpha's account at Clearing Corporation. As in Example 1, Alpha has control of the 1000 shares under subsection (d)(1) [subsection (4)(a)].

Example 5. Able & Co., a securities dealer, grants Alpha Bank a security interest in a security entitlement that includes 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock that Able holds through an account with Clearing Corporation. Alpha does not have an account with Clearing Corporation. It holds its securities through Beta Bank, which does have an account with Clearing Corporation. Able causes Clearing Corporation to transfer the shares into Beta's account at Clearing Corporation. Beta credits the position to Alpha account with Beta. As in Example 2, Alpha has control of the 1000 shares under subsection (d)(1) [subsection (4)(a)].

Example 6. Able & Co. a securities dealer, grants Alpha Bank a security interest in a security entitlement that includes 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock that Able holds through an account with Clearing Corporation. Able causes Clearing Corporation to transfer the shares into a pledge account, pursuant to an agreement under which Able will continue to receive dividends, distributions, and the like, but Alpha has the right to direct dispositions. As in Example 3, Alpha has control of the 1000 shares under subsection (d)(2) [subsection (4)(b)].

Example 7. Able & Co. a securities dealer, grants Alpha Bank a security interest in a security entitlement that includes 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock that Able holds through an account with Clearing Corporation. Able, Alpha, and Clearing Corporation enter into an agreement under which Clearing Corporation will act on instructions from Alpha with respect to the XYZ Co. stock carried in Able's account, but Able will continue to receive dividends, distributions, and the like, and will also have the right to direct dispositions. As in Example 3, Alpha has control of the 1000 shares under subsection (d)(2) [subsection (4)(b)].

Example 8. Able & Co. a securities dealer, holds a wide range of securities through its account at Clearing Corporation. Able enters into an arrangement with Alpha Bank pursuant to which Alpha provides financing to Able secured by securities identified as the collateral on lists provided by Able to Alpha on a daily or other periodic basis. Able, Alpha, and Clearing Corporation enter into an agreement under which Clearing Corporation agrees that if at any time Alpha directs Clearing Corporation to do so, Clearing Corporation will transfer any securities from Able's account at Alpha's instructions. Because Clearing Corporation has agreed to act on Alpha's instructions with respect to any securities carried in Able's account, at the moment that Alpha's security interest attaches to securities listed by Able, Alpha obtains control of those securities under subsection (d)(2) [subsection (4)(b)]. There is no requirement that Clearing Corporation be informed of which securities Able has pledged to Alpha.

Example 9. Debtor grants Alpha Bank a security interest in a security entitlement that includes 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock that Debtor holds through an account with Able & Co. Beta Bank agrees with Alpha to act as Alpha's collateral agent with respect to the security entitlement. Debtor, Able, and Beta enter into an agreement under which Debtor will continue to receive dividends and distributions, and will continue to have the right to direct dispositions, but Beta also has the right to direct dispositions. Because Able has agreed that it will comply with entitlement orders originated by Beta without further consent by Debtor, Beta has control of the security entitlement (see Example 3). Because Beta has control on behalf of Alpha, Alpha also has control under subsection (d)(3) [subsection (4)(c)]. It is not necessary for Able to enter into an agreement directly with Alpha or for Able to be aware of Beta's agency relationship with Alpha.

5. For a purchaser to have "control" under subsection (c)(2) or (d)(2) [subsection (3)(b) or (4)(b)] it is essential that the issuer or securities intermediary, as the case may be, actually be a party to the agreement. If a debtor gives a secured party a power of attorney authorizing the secured party to act in the name of the debtor, but the issuer or securities intermediary does not specifically agree to this arrangement, the secured party does not have "control" within the meaning of subsection (c)(2) or (d)(2) [subsection (3)(b) or (4)(b)] because the issuer or securities intermediary is not a party to the agreement. The secured party does not have control under subsection (c)(1) or (d)(1) [subsection (3)(a) or (4)(a)] because, although the power of attorney might give the secured party authority to act on the debtor's behalf as an agent, the secured party has not actually become the registered owner or entitlement holder.

6. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] provides that if an interest in a security entitlement is granted by an entitlement holder to the securities intermediary through which the security entitlement is maintained, the securities intermediary has control. A common transaction covered by this provision is a margin loan from a broker to its customer.

7. The term "control" is used in a particular defined sense. The requirements for obtaining control are set out in this section. The concept is not to be interpreted by reference to similar concepts in other bodies of law. In particular, the requirements for "possession" derived from the common law of pledge are not to be used as a basis for interpreting subsection (c)(2) or (d)(2) [subsection (3)(b) or (4)(b)]. Those provisions are designed to supplant the concepts of "constructive possession" and the like. A principal purpose of the "control" concept is to eliminate the uncertainty and confusion that results from attempting to apply common law possession concepts to modern securities holding practices.

The key to the control concept is that the purchaser has the ability to have the securities sold or transferred without further action by the transferor. There is no requirement that the powers held by the purchaser be exclusive. For example, in a secured lending arrangement, if the secured party wishes, it can allow the debtor to retain the right to make substitutions, to direct the disposition of the uncertificated security or security entitlement, or otherwise to give instructions or entitlement orders. (As explained in Section 8-102 [30-8-112], Comment 8, an entitlement order includes a direction under Section 8-508 [30-8-508] to the securities intermediary to transfer a financial asset to the account of the entitlement holder at another financial intermediary or to cause the financial asset to be transferred to the entitlement holder in the direct holding system (e.g., by delivery of a securities certificate registered in the name of the former entitlement holder).) Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] is included to make clear the general point stated in subsections (c) and (d) [subsections (3) and (4)] that the test of control is whether the purchaser has obtained the requisite power, not whether the debtor has retained other powers. There is no implication that retention by the debtor of powers other than those mentioned in subsection (f) [subsection (6)] is inconsistent with the purchaser having control. Nor is there a requirement that the purchaser's powers be unconditional, provided that further consent of the entitlement holder is not a condition.

Example 10. Debtor grants to Alpha Bank and to Beta Bank a security interest in a security entitlement that includes 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock that Debtor holds through an account with Able & Co. By agreement among the parties, Alpha's security interest is senior and Beta's is junior. Able agrees to act on the entitlement orders of either Alpha or Beta. Alpha and Beta each has control under subsection (d)(2) [subsection (4)(b)]. Moreover, Beta has control notwithstanding a term of Able's agreement to the effect that Able's obligation to act on Beta's entitlement orders is conditioned on Alpha's consent. The crucial distinction is that Able's agreement to act on Beta's entitlement orders is not conditioned on Debtor's further consent.

Example 11. Debtor grants to Alpha Bank a security interest in a security entitlement that includes 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock that Debtor holds through an account with Able & Co. Able agrees to act on the entitlement orders of Alpha, but Alpha's right to give entitlement orders to the securities intermediary is conditioned on the Debtor's default. Alternatively, Alpha's right to give entitlement orders is conditioned upon Alpha's statement to Able that Debtor is in default. Because Able's agreement to act on Beta's entitlement orders is not conditioned on Debtor's further consent, Alpha has control of the securities entitlement under either alternative.

In many situations, it will be better practice for both the securities intermediary and the purchaser to insist that any conditions relating in any way to the entitlement holder be effective only as between the purchaser and the entitlement holder. That practice would avoid the risk that the securities intermediary could be caught between conflicting assertions of the entitlement holder and the purchaser as to whether the conditions in fact have been met. Nonetheless, the existence of unfulfilled conditions effective against the intermediary would not preclude the purchaser from having control.

30-8-117. Whether indorsement, instruction, or entitlement order is effective.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-107, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section defines two concepts, "appropriate person" and "effective." Effectiveness is a broader concept than appropriate person. For example, if a security or securities account is registered in the name of Mary Roe, Mary Roe is the "appropriate person," but an indorsement, instruction, or entitlement order made by John Doe is "effective" if, under agency or other law, Mary Roe is precluded from denying Doe's authority. Treating these two concepts separately facilitates statement of the rules of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] that state the legal effect of an indorsement, instruction, or entitlement order. For example, a securities intermediary is protected against liability if it acts on an effective entitlement order, but has a duty to comply with an entitlement order only if it is originated by an appropriate person. See Sections 8-115 and 8-507 [30-8-125 and 30-8-507].

One important application of the "effectiveness" concept is in the direct holding system rules on the rights of purchasers. A purchaser of a certificated security in registered form can qualify as a protected purchaser who takes free from adverse claims under Section 8-303 [30-8-333] only if the purchaser obtains "control." Section 8-106 [30-8-116] provides that a purchaser of a certificated security in registered form obtains control if there has been an "effective" indorsement.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that the term "appropriate person" covers two categories: (1) the person who is actually designated as the person entitled to the security or security entitlement, and (2) the successor or legal representative of that person if that person has died or otherwise lacks capacity. Other law determines who has power to transfer a security on behalf of a person who lacks capacity. For example, if securities are registered in the name of more than one person and one of the designated persons dies, whether the survivor is the appropriate person depends on the form of tenancy. If the two were registered joint tenants with right of survivorship, the survivor would have that power under other law and thus would be the "appropriate person." If securities are registered in the name of an individual and the individual dies, the law of decedents' estates determines who has power to transfer the decedent's securities. That would ordinarily be the executor or administrator, but if a "small estate statute" permits a widow to transfer a decedent's securities without administration proceedings, she would be the appropriate person. If the registration of a security or a securities account contains a designation of a death beneficiary under the Uniform Transfer on Death Security Registration Act or comparable legislation, the designated beneficiary would, under that law, have power to transfer upon the person's death and so would be the appropriate person. Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] does not contain a list of such representatives, because any list is likely to become outdated by developments in other law.

3. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] sets out the general rule that an indorsement, instruction, or entitlement order is effective if it is made by the appropriate person or by a person who has power to transfer under agency law or if the appropriate person is precluded from denying its effectiveness. The control rules in Section 8-106 [30-8-116] provide for arrangements where a person who holds securities through a securities intermediary, or holds uncertificated securities directly, enters into a control agreement giving the secured party the right to initiate entitlement orders of instructions. Paragraph 2 of subsection (b) [subsection (2)(b)] states explicitly that an entitlement order or instruction initiated by a person who has obtained such a control agreement is "effective."

Subsections (c), (d), and (e) [subsections (3), (4), and (5)] supplement the general rule of subsection (b) [subsection (2)] on effectiveness. The term "representative," used in subsections (c) and (d) [subsections (3) and (4)], is defined in Section 1-201(35) [30-1-201(35)].

4. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that an indorsement, instruction, or entitlement order made by a representative is effective even though the representative's action is a violation of duties. The following example illustrates this subsection:

Example 1. Certificated securities are registered in the name of John Doe. Doe dies and Mary Roe is appointed executor. Roe indorses the security certificate and transfers it to a purchaser in a transaction that is a violation of her duties as executor.

Roe's indorsement is effective, because Roe is the appropriate person under subsection (a)(4) [subsection (1)(d)]. This is so even though Roe's transfer violated her obligations as executor. The policies of free transferability of securities that underlie Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] dictate that neither a purchaser to whom Roe transfers the securities nor the issuer who registers transfer should be required to investigate the terms of the will to determine whether Roe is acting properly. Although Roe's indorsement is effective under this section, her breach of duty may be such that her beneficiary has an adverse claim to the securities that Roe transferred. The question whether that adverse claim can be asserted against purchasers is governed not by this section but by Section 8-303 [30-8-333]. Under Section 8-404 [30-8-414], the issuer has no duties to an adverse claimant unless the claimant obtains legal process enjoining the issuer from registering transfer.

5. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] deals with cases where a security or a securities account is registered in the name of a person specifically designated as a representative. The following example illustrates this subsection:

Example 2. Certificated securities are registered in the name of "John Jones, trustee of the Smith Family Trust." John Jones is removed as trustee and Martha Moe is appointed successor trustee. The securities, however, are not reregistered, but remain registered in the name of "John Jones, trustee of the Smith Family Trust." Jones indorses the security certificate and transfers it to a purchaser.

Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides that an indorsement by John Jones as trustee is effective even though Jones is no longer serving in that capacity. Since the securities were registered in the name of "John Jones, trustee of the Smith Family Trust," a purchaser, or the issuer when called upon to register transfer, should be entitled to assume without further inquiry that Jones has the power to act as trustee for the Smith Family Trust.

Note that subsection (d) [subsection (4)] does not apply to a case where the security or securities account is registered in the name of principal rather than the representative as such. The following example illustrates this point:

Example 3. Certificated securities are registered in the name of John Doe. John Doe dies and Mary Roe is appointed executor. The securities are not reregistered in the name of Mary Roe as executor. Later, Mary Roe is removed as executor and Martha Moe is appointed as her successor. After being removed, Mary Roe indorses the security certificate that is registered in the name of John Doe and transfers it to a purchaser.

Mary Roe's indorsement is not made effective by subsection (d) [subsection (4)], because the securities were not registered in the name of Mary Roe as representative. A purchaser or the issuer registering transfer should be required to determine whether Roe has power to act for John Doe. Purchasers and issuers can protect themselves in such cases by requiring signature guaranties. See Section 8-306 [30-8-336].

6. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] provides that the effectiveness of an indorsement, instruction, or entitlement order is determined as of the date it is made. The following example illustrates this subsection:

Example 4. Certificated securities are registered in the name of John Doe. John Doe dies and Mary Roe is appointed executor. Mary Roe indorses the security certificate that is registered in the name of John Doe and transfers it to a purchaser. After the indorsement and transfer, but before the security certificate is presented to the issuer for registration of transfer, Mary Roe is removed as executor and Martha Moe is appointed as her successor.

Mary Roe's indorsement is effective, because at the time Roe indorsed she was the appropriate person under subsection (a)(4) [subsection (1)(d)]. Her later removal as executor does not render the indorsement ineffective. Accordingly, the issuer would not be liable for registering the transfer. See Section 8-404 [30-8-414].

Official Comment:

1. Subsections (a), (b), and (c) [subsections (1), (2), and (3)] deal with warranties by security transferors to purchasers. Subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)] deal with warranties by security transferors to issuers. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] deals with presentment warranties.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] specifies the warranties made by a person who transfers a certificated security to a purchaser for value. Paragraphs (3), (4), and (5) [subsections (1)(c), (1)(d), and (1)(e)] make explicit several key points that are implicit in the general warranty of paragraph (6) [subsection (1)(f)] that the transfer is effective and rightful. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] sets forth the warranties made to a purchaser for value by one who originates an instruction. These warranties are quite similar to those made by one transferring a certificated security, subsection (a) [subsection (1)], the principal difference being the absolute warranty of validity. If upon receipt of the instruction the issuer should dispute the validity of the security, the burden of proving validity is upon the transferor. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides for the limited circumstances in which an uncertificated security could be transferred without an instruction, see Section 8-301(b)(2) [30-8-331(2)(b)]. Subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)] give the issuer the benefit of the warranties of an indorser or originator on those matters not within the issuer's knowledge.

3. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] limits the warranties made by a purchaser for value without notice whose presentation of a security certificate is defective in some way but to whom the issuer does register transfer. The effect is to deny the issuer a remedy against such a person unless at the time of presentment the person had knowledge of an unauthorized signature in a necessary indorsement. The issuer can protect itself by refusing to make the transfer or, if it registers the transfer before it discovers the defect, by pursuing its remedy against a signature guarantor.

4. Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] eliminates all substantive warranties in the relatively unusual case of a delivery of certificated security by an agent of a disclosed principal where the agent delivers the exact certificate that it received from or for the principal. Subsection (h) [subsection (8)] limits the warranties given by a secured party who redelivers a certificate. Subsection (i) [subsection (9)] specifies the warranties of brokers in the more common scenarios.

5. Under Section 1-102(3) [30-1-102(3)] the warranty provisions apply "unless otherwise agreed" and the parties may enter into express agreements to allocate the risks of possible defects. Usual estoppel principles apply with respect to transfers of both certificated and uncertificated securities whenever the purchaser has knowledge of the defect, and these warranties will not be breached in such a case.

Official Comment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that a person who originates an entitlement order warrants to the securities intermediary that the order is authorized, and warrants the absence of adverse claims. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] specifies the warranties that are given when a person who holds securities directly has the holding converted into indirect form. A person who delivers a certificate to a securities intermediary or originates an instruction for an uncertificated security gives to the securities intermediary the transfer warranties under Section 8-108 [30-8-118]. If the securities intermediary in turn delivers the certificate to a higher level securities intermediary, it gives the same warranties.

2. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] states the warranties that a securities intermediary gives when a customer who has been holding securities in an account with the securities intermediary requests that certificates be delivered or that uncertificated securities be registered in the customer's name. The warranties are the same as those that brokers make with respect to securities that the brokers sell to or buy on behalf of the customers. See Section 8-108(i) [30-8-118(9)].

3. As with the Section 8-108 [30-8-118] warranties, the warranties specified in this section may be modified by agreement under Section 1-102(3) [30-1-102(3)].

30-8-120. Applicability — choice of law.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-110, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section deals with applicability and choice of law issues concerning Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. The distinction between the direct and indirect holding systems plays a significant role in determining the governing law. An investor in the direct holding system is registered on the books of the issuer and/or has possession of a security certificate. Accordingly, the jurisdiction of incorporation of the issuer or location of the certificate determine the applicable law. By contrast, an investor in the indirect holding system has a security entitlement, which is a bundle of rights against the securities intermediary with respect to a security, rather than a direct interest in the underlying security. Accordingly, in the rules for the indirect holding system, the jurisdiction of incorporation of the issuer of the underlying security or the location of any certificates that might be held by the intermediary or a higher tier intermediary, do not determine the applicable law.

The phrase "local law" refers to the law of a jurisdiction other than its conflict of laws rules. See Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws §4.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that the law of an issuer's jurisdiction governs certain issues where the substantive rules of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] determine the issuer's rights and duties. Paragraph (1) of subsection (a) [subsection (1)(a)] provides that the law of the issuer's jurisdiction governs the validity of the security. This ensures that a single body of law will govern the questions addressed in Part 2 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 2], concerning the circumstances in which an issuer can and cannot assert invalidity as a defense against purchasers. Similarly, paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of subsection (a) [subsections (1)(b), (1)(c), and (1)(d)] ensure that the issuer will be able to look to a single body of law on the questions addressed in Part 4 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 4], concerning the issuer's duties and liabilities with respect to registration of transfer.

Paragraph (5) of subsection (a) [subsection (1)(e)] applies the law of an issuer's jurisdiction to the question whether an adverse claim can be asserted against a purchaser to whom transfer has been registered, or who has obtained control over an uncertificated security. Although this issue deals with the rights of persons other than the issuer, the law of the issuer's jurisdiction applies because the purchasers to whom the provision applies are those whose protection against adverse claims depends on the fact that their interests have been recorded on the books of the issuer.

The principal policy reflected in the choice of law rules in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is that an issuer and others should be able to look to a single body of law on the matters specified in subsection (a) [subsection (1)], rather than having to look to the law of all of the different jurisdictions in which security holders may reside. The choice of law policies reflected in this subsection do not require that the body of law governing all of the matters specified in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] be that of the jurisdiction in which the issuer is incorporated. Thus, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides that the term "issuer's jurisdiction" means the jurisdiction in which the issuer is organized, or, if permitted by that law, the law of another jurisdiction selected by the issuer. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] also provides that issuers organized under the law of a State which adopts this Article [Title 30 ,chapter 8] may make such a selection, except as to the validity issue specified in paragraph (1) [subsection (1)(a)]. The question whether an issuer can assert the defense of invalidity may implicate significant policies of the issuer's jurisdiction of incorporation. See, e.g., Section 8-202 [30-8-212] and Comments thereto.

Although subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that the issuer's rights and duties concerning registration of transfer are governed by the law of the issuer's jurisdiction, other matters related to registration of transfer, such as appointment of a guardian for a registered owner or the existence of agency relationships, might be governed by another jurisdiction's law. Neither this section nor Section 1-105 [30-1-105] deals with what law governs the appointment of the administrator or executor; that question is determined under generally applicable choice of law rules.

3. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that the law of the securities intermediary's jurisdiction governs the issues concerning the indirect holding system that are dealt with in Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Paragraphs (1) and (2) [subsections (2)(a) and (2)(b)] cover the matters dealt with in the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules defining the concept of security entitlement and specifying the duties of securities intermediaries. Paragraph (3) [subsection (2)(c)] provides that the law of the security intermediary's jurisdiction determines whether the intermediary owes any duties to an adverse claimant. Paragraph (4) [subsection (2)(d)] provides that the law of the security intermediary's jurisdiction determines whether adverse claims can be asserted against entitlement holders and others.

Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] determines what is a "securities intermediary's jurisdiction." The policy of subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is to ensure that a securities intermediary and all of its entitlement holders can look to a single, readily-identifiable body of law to determine their rights and duties. Accordingly, subsection (e) [subsection (5)] sets out a sequential series of tests to facilitate identification of that body of law. Paragraph (1) of subsection (e) [subsection (5)(a)] permits specification of the securities intermediary's jurisdiction by agreement. In the absence of such a specification, the law chosen by the parties to govern the securities account determines the securitites intermediary's jurisdiction. See paragraph (2) [subsection (2)(b)]. Because the policy of this section is to enable parties to determine, in advance and with certainty, what law will apply to transactions governed by this Article [chapter], the validation of the parties' selection of governing law by agreement is not conditioned upon a determination that the jurisdiction whose law is chosen bear a "reasonable relation" to the transaction. See Section 4A-507 [30-4A-507]; compare Section 1-105(1) [30-1-105(1)]. That is also true with respect to the similar provisions in subsection (d) [subsection (4)] of this section and in Section 9-305 [30-9A-305]. The remaining paragraphs in subsection (e) [subsection (5)] contain additional default rules for determining the securities intermediary's jurisdiction.

Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] makes explicit a point that is implicit in the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] description of a security entitlement as a bundle of rights against the intermediary with respect to a security or other financial asset, rather than as a direct interest in the underlying security or other financial asset. The governing law for relationships in the indirect holding system is not determined by such matters as the jurisdiction of incorporation of the issuer of the securities held through the intermediary, or the location of any physical certificates held by the intermediary or a higher tier intermediary.

4. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides a choice of law rule for adverse claim issues that may arise in connection with delivery of security certificates in the direct holding system. It applies the law of the place of delivery. If a certificated security issued by an Idaho corporation is sold, and the sale is settled by physical delivery of the certificate from Seller to Buyer in New York, under subsection (c) [subsection (3)], New York law determines whether Buyer takes free from adverse claims. The domicile of Seller, Buyer, and any adverse claimant is irrelevant.

5. The following examples illustrate how a court in a jurisdiction which has enacted this section would determine the governing law:

Example 1. John Doe, a resident of Kansas, maintains a securities account with Able & Co. Able is incorporated in Delaware. Its chief executive offices are located in Illinois. The office where Doe transacts business with Able is located in Missouri. The agreement between Doe and Able specifies that Illinois is the securities intermediary's (Able's) jurisdiction. Through the account, Doe holds securities of a Colorado corporation, which Able holds through Clearing Corporation. The rules of Clearing Corporation provide that the rights and duties of Clearing Corporation and its participants are governed by New York law. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] specifies that a controversy concerning the rights and duties as between the issuer and Clearing Corporation is governed by Colorado law. Subsections (b) and (e) [subsections (2) and (5)] specify that a controversy concerning the rights and duties as between the Clearing Corporation and Able is governed by New York law, and that a controversy concerning the rights and duties as between Able and Doe is governed by Illinois law.

Example 2. Same facts as to Doe and Able as in Example 1. Through the account, Doe holds securities of a Senegalese corporation, which Able holds through Clearing Corporation. Clearing Corporation's operations are located in Belgium, and its rules and agreements with its participants provide that they are governed by Belgian law. Clearing Corporation holds the securities through a custodial account at the Paris branch office of Global Bank, which is organized under English law. The agreement between Clearing Corporation and Global Bank provides that it is governed by French law. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] specifies that a controversy concerning the rights and duties as between the issuer and Global Bank is governed by Senegalese law. Subsections (b) and (e) [subsections (2) and (5)] specify that a controversy concerning the rights and duties as between Global Bank and Clearing Corporation is governed by French law, that a controversy concerning the rights and duties as between Clearing Corporation and Able is governed by Belgian law, and that a controversy concerning the rights and duties as between Able and Doe is governed by Illinois law.

6. To the extent that this section does not specify the governing law, general choice of law rules apply. For example, suppose that in either of the examples in the preceding Comment, Doe enters into an agreement with Roe, also a resident of Kansas, in which Doe agrees to transfer all of his interests in the securities held through Able to Roe. Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] does not deal with whether such an agreement is enforceable or whether it gives Roe some interest in Doe's security entitlement. This section specifies what jurisdiction's law governs the issues that are dealt with in Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], however, does specify that securities intermediaries have only limited duties with respect to adverse claims. See Section 8-115 [30-8-125]. Subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)] of this section provides that Illinois law governs whether Able owes any duties to an adverse claimant. Thus, if Illinois has adopted Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], Section 8-115 [30-8-125] as enacted in Illinois determines whether Roe has any rights against Able.

7. The choice of law provisions concerning security interests in securities and security entitlements are set out in Section 9-305 [30-9A-305].

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 305 substituted (5) concerning rules for determining security intermediaries jurisdiction for former text that read: "(5) The following rules determine a "securities intermediary's jurisdiction" for purposes of this section:

(a) If an agreement between the securities intermediary and its entitlement holder specifies that it is governed by the law of a particular jurisdiction, that jurisdiction is the securities intermediary's jurisdiction.

(b) If an agreement between the securities intermediary and its entitlement holder does not specify the governing law as provided in subsection (5)(a), but expressly specifies that the securities account is maintained at an office in a particular jurisdiction, that jurisdiction is the securities intermediary's jurisdiction.

(c) If an agreement between the securities intermediary and its entitlement holder does not specify a jurisdiction as provided in subsection (5)(a) or (5)(b), the securities intermediary's jurisdiction is the jurisdiction in which is located the office identified in an account statement as the office serving the entitlement holder's account.

(d) If an agreement between the securities intermediary and its entitlement holder does not specify a jurisdiction as provided in subsection (5)(a) or (5)(b) and an account statement does not identify an office serving the entitlement holder's account as provided in subsection (5)(c), the securities intermediary's jurisdiction is the jurisdiction in which is located the chief executive office of the securities intermediary"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

30-8-121. Clearing corporation rules.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-111, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. The experience of the past few decades shows that securities holding and settlement practices may develop rapidly, and in unforeseeable directions. Accordingly, it is desirable that the rules of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] be adaptable both to ensure that commercial law can conform to changing practices and to ensure that commercial law does not operate as an obstacle to developments in securities practice. Even if practices were unchanging, it would not be possible in a general statute to specify in detail the rules needed to provide certainty in the operations of the clearance and settlement system.

The provisions of this Article [chapter] and Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1] on the effect of agreements provide considerable flexibility in the specification of the details of the rights and obligations of participants in the securities holding system by agreement. See Sections 8-504 through 8-509 [30-8-504 through 30-8-509], and Section 1-102(3) and (4) [30-8-102(3) and (4)]. Given the magnitude of the exposures involved in securities transactions, however, it may not be possible for the parties in developing practices to rely solely on private agreements, particularly with respect to matters that might affect others, such as creditors. For example, in order to be fully effective, rules of clearing corporations on the finality or reversibility of securities settlements must not only bind the participants in the clearing corporation but also be effective against their creditors. Section 8-111 [30-8-121] provides that clearing corporation rules are effective even if they indirectly affect third parties, such as creditors of a participant. This provision does not, however, permit rules to be adopted that would govern the rights and obligations of third parties other than as a consequence of rules that specify the rights and obligations of the clearing corporation and its participants.

2. The definition of clearing corporation in Section 8-102 [30-1-112] covers only federal reserve banks, entities registered as clearing agencies under the federal securities laws, and others subject to comparable regulation. The rules of registered clearing agencies are subject to regulatory oversight under the federal securities laws.

30-8-122. Creditor's legal process.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-112, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. In dealing with certificated securities the instrument itself is the vital thing, and therefore a valid levy cannot be made unless all possibility of the certificate's wrongfully finding its way into a transferee's hands has been removed. This can be accomplished only when the certificate is in the possession of a public officer, the issuer, or an independent third party. A debtor who has been enjoined can still transfer the security in contempt of court. See Overlock v. Jerome-Portland Copper Mining Co., 29 Ariz. 560, 243 P. 400 (1926). Therefore, although injunctive relief is provided in subsection (e) [subsection (5)] so that creditors may use this method to gain control of the certificated security, the security certificate itself must be reached to constitute a proper levy whenever the debtor has possession.

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that when the security is uncertificated and registered in the debtor's name, the debtor's interest can be reached only by legal process upon the issuer. The most logical place to serve the issuer would be the place where the transfer records are maintained, but that location might be difficult to identify, especially when the separate elements of a computer network might be situated in different places. The chief executive office is selected as the appropriate place by analogy to Section 9-103(3)(d) [30-9-103(3)(d), now repealed, see 30-9A-307]. See Comment 5(c) to that section. This section indicates only how attachment is to be made, not when it is legally justified. For that reason there is no conflict between this section and Shaffer v. Heitner, 433 U.S. 186 (1977).

3. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that a security entitlement can be reached only by legal process upon the debtor's security intermediary. Process is effective only if directed to the debtor's own security intermediary. If Debtor holds securities through Broker, and Broker in turn holds through Clearing Corporation, Debtor's property interest is a security entitlement against Broker. Accordingly, Debtor's creditor cannot reach Debtor's interest by legal process directed to the Clearing Corporation. See also Section 8-115 [30-8-125].

4. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides that when a certificated security, an uncertificated security, or a security entitlement is controlled by a secured party, the debtor's interest can be reached by legal process upon the secured party. This section does not attempt to provide for rights as between the creditor and the secured party, as, for example, whether or when the secured party must liquidate the security.

30-8-123. Statute of frauds inapplicable.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-113, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

This section provides that the statute of frauds does not apply to contracts for the sale of securities, reversing prior law which had a special statute of frauds in Section 8-319 (1978) [former 30-8-319]. With the increasing use of electronic means of communication, the statute of frauds is unsuited to the realities of the securities business. For securities transactions, whatever benefits a statute of frauds may play in filtering out fraudulent claims are outweighed by the obstacles it places in the development of modern commercial practices in the securities business.

Case Notes

Option Agreement: Evidence of payment of money pursuant to the purchase of real estate for the purpose of persuading seller to hold the deal open for a certain period of time, and the subsequent actions of the seller in holding the property off the market, were sufficient to establish a valid option agreement, as well as to show that the agreement had been fully performed. Official Comment:

This section adapts the rules of negotiable instruments law concerning procedure in actions on instruments, see Section 3-308 [30-3-308], to actions on certificated securities governed by this Article [chapter]. An "action on a security" includes any action or proceeding brought against the issuer to enforce a right or interest that is part of the security, such as an action to collect principal or interest or a dividend, or to establish a right to vote or to receive a new security under an exchange offer or plan of reorganization. This section applies only to certificated securities; actions on uncertificated securities are governed by general evidentiary principles.

30-8-125. Securities intermediary and others not liable to adverse claimant.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-115, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Other provisions of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] protect certain purchasers against adverse claims, both for the direct holding system and the indirect holding system. See Sections 8-303 and 8-502 [30-8-333 and 30-8-502]. This section deals with the related question of the possible liability of a person who acted as the "conduit" for a securities transaction. It covers both securities intermediaries—the "conduits" in the indirect holding system—and brokers or other agents or bailees—the "conduits" in the direct holding system. The following examples illustrate its operation:

Example 1. John Doe is a customer of the brokerage firm of Able & Co. Doe delivers to Able a certificate for 100 shares of XYZ Co. common stock, registered in Doe's name and properly indorsed, and asks the firm to sell it for him. Able does so. Later, John Doe's spouse Mary Doe brings an action against Able asserting that Able's action was wrongful against her because the XYZ Co. stock was marital property in which she had an interest, and John Doe was acting wrongfully against her in transferring the securities.

Example 2. Mary Roe is a customer of the brokerage firm of Baker & Co. and holds her securities through a securities account with Baker. Roe instructs Baker to sell 100 shares of XYZ Co. common stock that she carried in her account. Baker does so. Later, Mary Roe's spouse John Roe brings an action against Baker asserting that Baker's action was wrongful against him because the XYZ Co. stock was marital property in which he had an interest, and Mary Roe was acting wrongfully against him in transferring the securities.

Under common law conversion principles, Mary Doe might be able to assert that Able & Co. is liable to her in Example 1 for exercising dominion over property inconsistent with her rights in it. On that or some similar theory John Roe might assert that Baker is liable to him in Example 2. Section 8-115 [30-8-125] protects both Able and Baker from liability.

2. The policy of this section is similar to that of many other rules of law that protect agents and bailees from liability as innocent converters. If a thief steals property and ships it by mail, express service, or carrier, to another person, the recipient of the property does not obtain good title, even though the recipient may have given value to the thief and had no notice or knowledge that the property was stolen. Accordingly, the true owner can recover the property from the recipient or obtain damages in a conversion or similar action. An action against the postal service, express company, or carrier presents entirely different policy considerations. Accordingly, general tort law protects agents or bailees who act on the instructions of their principals or bailors. See Restatement (Second) of Torts §235. See also UCC Section 7-404 [30-7-404].

3. Except as provided in paragraph 3 [subsection (3)], this section applies even though the securities intermediary, or the broker or other agent or bailee, had notice or knowledge that another person asserts a claim to the securities. Consider the following examples:

Example 3. Same facts as in Example 1, except that before John Doe brought the XYZ Co. security certificate to Able for sale, Mary Doe telephoned or wrote to the firm asserting that she had an interest in all of John Doe's securities and demanding that they not trade for him.

Example 4. Same facts as in Example 2, except that before Mary Roe gave an entitlement order to Baker to sell the XYZ Co. securities from her account, John Doe telephoned or wrote to the firm asserting that he had an interest in all of Mary Roe's securities and demanding that they not trade for her.

Section 8-115 [30-8-125] protects Able and Baker from liability. The protections of Section 8-115 [30-8-125] do not depend on the presence or absence of notice of adverse claims. It is essential to the securities settlement system that brokers and securities intermediaries be able to act promptly on the directions of their customers. Even though a firm has notice that someone asserts a claim to a customer's securities or security entitlements, the firm should not be placed in the position of having to make a legal judgment about the validity of the claim at the risk of liability either to its customer or to the third party for guessing wrong. Under this section, the broker or securities intermediary is privileged to act on the instructions of its customer or entitlement holder, unless it has been served with a restraining order or other legal process enjoining it from doing so. This is already the law in many jurisdictions. For example a section of the New York Banking Law provides that banks need not recognize any adverse claim to funds or securities on deposit with them unless they have been served with legal process. N.Y. Banking Law §134. Other sections of the UCC embody a similar policy. See Sections 3-602 and 5-114(2)(b) [30-3-603 and 30-5-134(2)(b)].

Paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] of this section refers only to a court order enjoining the securities intermediary or the broker or other agent or bailee from acting at the instructions of the customer. It does not apply to cases where the adverse claimant tells the intermediary or broker that the customer has been enjoined, or shows the intermediary or broker a copy of a court order binding the customer.

Paragraph (3) [subsection (3)] takes a different approach in one limited class of cases, those where a customer sells stolen certificated securities through a securities firm. Here the policies that lead to protection of securities firms against assertions of other sorts of claims must be weighed against the desirability of having securities firms guard against the disposition of stolen securities. Accordingly, paragraph (3) [subsection (3)] denies protection to a broker, custodian, or other agent or bailee who receives a stolen security certificate from its customer, if the broker, custodian, or other agent or bailee had notice of adverse claims. The circumstances that give notice of adverse claims are specified in Section 8-105 [30-8-115]. The result is that brokers, custodians, and other agents and bailees face the same liability for selling stolen certificated securities that purchasers face for buying them.

4. As applied to securities intermediaries, this section embodies one of the fundamental principles of the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] indirect holding system rules—that a securities intermediary owes duties only to its own entitlement holders. The following examples illustrate the operation of this section in the multi-tiered indirect holding system:

Example 5. Able & Co., a broker-dealer, holds 50,000 shares of XYZ Co. stock in its account at Clearing Corporation. Able acquired the XYZ shares from another firm, Baker & Co., in a transaction that Baker contends was tainted by fraud, giving Baker a right to rescind the transaction and recover the XYZ shares from Able. Baker sends notice to Clearing Corporation stating that Baker has a claim to the 50,000 shares of XYZ Co. in Able's account. Able then initiates an entitlement order directing Clearing Corporation to transfer the 50,000 shares of XYZ Co. to another firm in settlement of a trade. Under Section 8-115 [30-8-125], Clearing Corporation is privileged to comply with Able's entitlement order, without fear of liability to Baker. This is so even though Clearing Corporation has notice of Baker's claim, unless Baker obtains a court order enjoining Clearing Corporation from acting on Able's entitlement order.

Example 6. Able & Co., a broker-dealer, holds 50,000 shares of XYZ Co. stock in its account at Clearing Corporation. Able initiates an entitlement order directing Clearing Corporation to transfer the 50,000 shares of XYZ Co. to another firm in settlement of a trade. That trade was made by Able for its own account, and the proceeds were devoted to its own use. Able becomes insolvent, and it is discovered that Able has a shortfall in the shares of XYZ Co. stock that it should have been carrying for its customers. Able's customers bring an action against Clearing Corporation asserting that Clearing Corporation acted wrongfully in transferring the XYZ shares on Able's order because those were shares that should have been held by Able for its customers. Under Section 8-115 [30-8-125], Clearing Corporation is not liable to Able's customers, because Clearing Corporation acted on an effective entitlement order of its own entitlement holder, Able. Clearing Corporation's protection against liability does not depend on the presence or absence of notice or knowledge of the claim by Clearing Corporation.

5. If the conduct of a securities intermediary or a broker or other agent or bailee rises to a level of complicity in the wrongdoing of its customer or principal, the policies that favor protection against liability do not apply. Accordingly, paragraph (2) [subsection (2)] provides that the protections of this section do not apply if the securities intermediary or broker or other agent or bailee acted in collusion with the customer or principal in violating the rights of another person. The collusion test is intended to adopt a standard akin to the tort rules that determine whether a person is liable as an aider or abettor for the tortious conduct of a third party. See Restatement (Second) of Torts §876.

Knowledge that the action of the customer is wrongful is a necessary but not sufficient condition of the collusion test. The aspect of the role of securities intermediaries and brokers that Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deals with is the clerical or ministerial role of implementing and recording the securities transactions that their customers conduct. Faithful performance of this role consists of following the instructions of the customer. It is not the role of the record-keeper to police whether the transactions recorded are appropriate, so mere awareness that the customer may be acting wrongfully does not itself constitute collusion. That, of course, does not insulate an intermediary or broker from responsibility in egregious cases where its action goes beyond the ordinary standards of the business of implementing and recording transactions, and reaches a level of affirmative misconduct in assisting the customer in the commission of a wrong.

Official Comment:

1. This section is intended to make explicit two points that, while implicit in other provisions, are of sufficient importance to the operation of the indirect holding system that they warrant explicit statement. First, it makes clear that a securities intermediary that receives a financial asset and establishes a security entitlement in respect thereof in favor of an entitlement holder is a "purchaser" of the financial asset that the securities intermediary received. Second, it makes clear that by establishing a security entitlement in favor of an entitlement holder a securities intermediary gives value for any corresponding financial asset that the securities intermediary receives or acquires from another party, whether the intermediary holds directly or indirectly.

In many cases a securities intermediary that receives a financial asset will also be transferring value to the person from whom the financial asset was received. That, however, is not always the case. Payment may occur through a different system than settlement of the securities side of the transaction, or the securities might be transferred without a corresponding payment, as when a person moves an account from one securities intermediary to another. Even though the securities intermediary does not give value to the transferor, it does give value by incurring obligations to its own entitlement holder. Although the general definition of value in Section 1-201(44)(d) [30-1-201(44)(d)] should be interpreted to cover the point, this section is included to make this point explicit.

2. The following examples illustrate the effect of this section:

Example 1. Buyer buys 1000 shares of XYZ Co. common stock through Buyer's broker Able & Co. to be held in Buyer's securities account. In settlement of the trade, the selling broker delivers to Able a security certificate in street name, indorsed in blank, for 1000 shares XYZ Co. stock, which Able holds in its vault. Able credits Buyer's account for securities in that amount. Section 8-116 [30-8-126] specifies that Able is a purchaser of the XYZ Co. stock certificate, and gave value for it. Thus, Able can obtain the benefit of Section 8-303 [30-8-333], which protects purchasers for value, if it satisfies the other requirements of that section.

Example 2. Buyer buys 1000 shares XYZ Co. common stock through Buyer's broker Able & Co. to be held in Buyer's securities account. The trade is settled by crediting 1000 shares XYZ Co. stock to Able's account at Clearing Corporation. Able credits Buyer's account for securities in that amount. When Clearing Corporation credits Able's account, Able acquires a security entitlement under Section 8-501 [30-8-501]. Section 8-116 [30-8-126] specifies that Able acquired this security entitlement for value. Thus, Able can obtain the benefit of Section 8-502 [30-8-502], which protects persons who acquire security entitlements for value, if it satisfies the other requirements of that section.

Example 3. Thief steals a certificated bearer bond from Owner. Thief sends the certificate to his broker Able & Co. to be held in his securities account, and Able credits Thief's account for the bond. Section 8-116 [30-8-126] specifies that Able is a purchaser of the bond and gave value for it. Thus, Able can obtain the benefit of Section 8-303 [30-8-333], which protects purchasers for value, if it satisfies the other requirements of that section.

Issue and Issuer

Official Comment:

1. The definition of "issuer" in this section functions primarily to describe the persons whose defenses may be cut off under the rules in Part 2 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 2]. In large measure it simply tracks the language of the definition of security in Section 8-102(a)(15) [30-8-112(1)(o)].

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] distinguishes the obligations of a guarantor as issuer from those of the principal obligor. However, it does not exempt the guarantor from the impact of subsection (d) of Section 8-202 [30-8-212(4)]. Whether or not the obligation of the guarantor is noted on the security is immaterial. Typically, guarantors are parent corporations, or stand in some similar relationship to the principal obligor. If that relationship existed at the time the security was originally issued the guaranty would probably have been noted on the security. However, if the relationship arose afterward, e.g., through a purchase of stock or properties, or through merger or consolidation, probably the notation would not have been made. Nonetheless, the holder of the security is entitled to the benefit of the obligation of the guarantor.

3. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] narrows the definition of "issuer" for purposes of Part 4 of this Article [Title 30, chapter 8, part 4] (registration of transfer). It is supplemented by Section 8-407 [30-8-417].

Official Comment

Official Comment:

1. In this Article [chapter] the rights of the purchaser for value without notice are divided into two aspects, those against the issuer, and those against other claimants to the security. Part

2 of this Article [Title 30, chapter 8, part 2], and especially this section, deal with rights against the issuer.

Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] states, in accordance with the prevailing case law, the right of the issuer (who prepares the text of the security) to include terms incorporated by adequate reference to an extrinsic source, so long as the terms so incorporated do not conflict with the stated terms. Thus, the standard practice of referring in a bond or debenture to the trust indenture under which it is issued without spelling out its necessarily complex and lengthy provisions is approved. Every stock certificate refers in some manner to the charter or articles of incorporation of the issuer. At least where there is more than one class of stock authorized applicable corporation codes specifically require a statement or summary as to preferences, voting powers and the like. References to constitutions, statutes, ordinances, rules, regulations or orders are not so common, except in the obligations of governments or governmental agencies or units; but where appropriate they fit into the rule here stated.

Courts have generally held that an issuer is estopped from denying representations made in the text of a security. Delaware-New Jersey Ferry Co. v. Leeds, 21 Del.Ch. 279, 186 A. 913 (1936). Nor is a defect in form or the invalidity of a security normally available to the issuer as a defense. Bonini v. Family Theatre Corporation, 327 Pa. 273, 194 A. 498 (1937); First National Bank of Fairbanks v. Alaska Airmotive, 119 F.2d 267 (C.C.A.Alaska 1941).

2. The rule in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] requiring that the terms of a security be noted or referred to on the certificate is based on practices and expectations in the direct holding system for certificated securities. This rule does not express a general rule or policy that the terms of a security are effective only if they are communicated to beneficial owners in some particular fashion. Rather, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is based on the principle that a purchaser who does obtain a certificate is entitled to assume that the terms of the security have been noted or referred to on the certificate. That policy does not come into play in a securities holding system in which purchasers do not take delivery of certificates.

The provisions of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] concerning notation of terms on security certificates are necessary only because paper certificates play such an important role for certificated securities that a purchaser should be protected against assertion of any defenses or rights that are not noted on the certificate. No similar problem exists with respect to uncertificated securities. The last sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is, strictly speaking, unnecessary, since it only recognizes the fact that the terms of an uncertificated security are determined by whatever other law or agreement governs the security. It is included only to preclude any inference that uncertificated securities are subject to any requirement analogous to the requirement of notation of terms on security certificates.

The rule of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] applies to the indirect holding system only in the sense that if a certificated security has been delivered to the clearing corporation or other securities intermediary, the terms of the security should be noted or referred to on the certificate. If the security is uncertificated, that principle does not apply even at the issuer-clearing corporation level. The beneficial owners who hold securities through the clearing corporation are bound by the terms of the security, even though they do not actually see the certificate. Since entitlement holders in an indirect holding system have not taken delivery of certificates, the policy of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] does not apply.

3. The penultimate sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] and all of subsection (b) [subsection (2)] embody the concept that it is the duty of the issuer, not of the purchaser, to make sure that the security complies with the law governing its issue. The penultimate sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] makes clear that the issuer cannot, by incorporating a reference to a statute or other document, charge the purchaser with notice of the security's invalidity. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] gives to a purchaser for value without notice of the defect the right to enforce the security against the issuer despite the presence of a defect that otherwise would render the security invalid. There are three circumstances in which a purchaser does not gain such rights: first, if the defect involves a violation of constitutional provisions, these rights accrue only to a subsequent purchaser, that is, one who takes other than by original issue. This Article [chapter] leaves to the law of each particular State the rights of a purchaser on original issue of a security with a constitutional defect. No negative implication is intended by the explicit grant of rights to a subsequent purchaser.

Second, governmental issuers are distinguished in subsection (b) [subsection (2)] from other issuers as a matter of public policy, and additional safeguards are imposed before governmental issues are validated. Governmental issuers are estopped from asserting defenses only if there has been substantial compliance with the legal requirements governing the issue or if substantial consideration has been received and a stated purpose of the issue is one for which the issuer has power to borrow money or issue the security. The purpose of the substantial compliance requirement is to make certain that a mere technicality as, e.g., in the manner of publishing election notices, shall not be a ground for depriving an innocent purchaser of rights in the security. The policy is here adopted of such cases as Tommie v. City of Gadsden, 229 Ala. 521, 158 So. 763 (1935), in which minor discrepancies in the form of the election ballot used were overlooked and the bonds were declared valid since there had been substantial compliance with the statute.

A long and well established line of federal cases recognizes the principle of estoppel in favor of purchasers for value without notices where municipalities issue bonds containing recitals of compliance with governing constitutional and statutory provisions, made by the municipal authorities entrusted with determining such compliance. Chaffee County v. Potter, 142 U.S. 355 (1892); Oregon v. Jennings, 119 U.S. 74 (1886); Gunnison County Commissioners v. Rollins, 173 U.S. 255 (1898). This rule has been qualified, however, by requiring that the municipality have power to issue the security. Anthony v. County of Jasper, 101 U.S. 693 (1879); Town of South Ottawa v. Perkins, 94 U.S. 260 (1876). This section follows the case law trend, simplifying the rule by setting up two conditions for an estoppel against a governmental issuer: (1) substantial consideration given, and (2) power in the issuer to borrow money or issue the security for the stated purpose. As a practical matter the problem of policing governmental issuers has been alleviated by the present practice of requiring legal opinions as to the validity of the issue. The bulk of the case law on this point is nearly 100 years old and it may be assumed that the question now seldom arises.

Section 8-210 [30-8-220], regarding overissue, provides the third exception to the rule that an innocent purchase for value takes a valid security despite the presence of a defect that would otherwise give rise to invalidity. See that section and its Comment for further explanation.

4. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] is included to make clear that this section does not affect the presently recognized right of either party to a "when, as and if" or "when distributed" contract to cancel the contract on substantial change.

5. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] has been added because the introduction of the security entitlement concept requires some adaptation of the Part 2 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 2] rules, particularly those that distinguish between purchasers who take by original issue and subsequent purchasers. The basic concept of Part 2 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 2] is to apply to investment securities the principle of negotiable instruments law that an obligor is precluded from asserting most defenses against purchasers for value without notice. Section 8-202 [30-8-212] describes in some detail which defenses issuers can raise against purchasers for value and subsequent purchasers for value. Because these rules were drafted with the direct holding system in mind, some interpretive problems might be presented in applying them to the indirect holding. For example, if a municipality issues a bond in book-entry only form, the only direct "purchaser" of that bond would be the clearing corporation. The policy of precluding the issuer from asserting defenses is, however, equally applicable. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] is designed to ensure that the defense preclusion rules developed for the direct holding system will also apply to the indirect holding system.

30-8-213. Staleness as notice of defect or defense.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-203, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. The problem of matured or called securities is here dealt with in terms of the effect of such events in giving notice of the issuer's defenses and not in terms of "negotiability". The substance of this section applies only to certificated securities because certificates may be transferred to a purchaser by delivery after the security has matured, been called, or become redeemable or exchangeable. It is contemplated that uncertificated securities which have matured or been called will merely be canceled on the books of the issuer and the proceeds sent to the registered owner. Uncertificated securities which have become redeemable or exchangeable, at the option of the owner, may be transferred to a purchaser, but the transfer is effectuated only by registration of transfer, thus necessitating communication with the issuer. If defects or defenses in such securities exist, the issuer will necessarily have the opportunity to bring them to the attention of the purchaser.

2. The fact that a security certificate is in circulation long after it has been called for redemption or exchange must give rise to the question in a purchaser's mind as to why it has not been surrendered. After the lapse of a reasonable period of time a purchaser can no longer claim "no reason to know" of any defects or irregularities in its issue. Where funds are available for the redemption the security certificate is normally turned in more promptly and a shorter time is set as the "reasonable period" than is set where funds are not available.

Defaulted certificated securities may be traded on financial markets in the same manner as unmatured and undefaulted instruments and a purchaser might not be placed upon notice of irregularity by the mere fact of default. An issuer, however, should at some point be placed in a position to determine definitely its liability on an invalid or improper issue, and for this purpose a security under this section becomes "stale" two years after the default. A different rule applies when the question is notice not of issuer's defenses but of claims of ownership. Section 8-105 [30-8-115] and Comment.

3. Nothing in this section is designed to extend the life of preferred stocks called for redemption as "shares of stock" beyond the redemption date. After such a call, the security represents only a right to the funds set aside for redemption.

30-8-214. Effect of issuer's restriction on transfer.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-204, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Restrictions on transfer of securities are imposed by issuers in a variety of circumstances and for a variety of purposes, such as to retain control of a close corporation or to ensure compliance with federal securities laws. Other law determines whether such restrictions are permissible. This section deals only with the consequences of failure to note the restriction on a security certificate.

This section imposes no bar to enforcement of a restriction on transfer against a person who has actual knowledge of it.

2. A restriction on transfer of a certificated security is ineffective against a person without knowledge of the restriction unless the restriction is noted conspicuously on the certificate. The word "noted" is used to make clear that the restriction need not be set forth in full text. Refusal by an issuer to register a transfer on the basis of an unnoted restriction would be a violation of the issuer's duty to register under Section 8-401 [30-8-411].

3. The policy of this section is the same as in Section 8-202 [30-8-212]. A purchaser who takes delivery of a certificated security is entitled to rely on the terms stated on the certificate. That policy obviously does not apply to uncertificated securities. For uncertificated securities, this section requires only that the registered owner has been notified of the restriction. Suppose, for example, that A is the registered owner of an uncertificated security, and that the issuer has notified A of a restriction on transfer. A agrees to sell the security to B, in violation of the restriction. A completes a written instruction directing the issuer to register transfer to B, and B pays A for the security at the time A delivers the instruction to B. A does not inform B of the restriction, and B does not otherwise have notice or knowledge of it at the time B pays and receives the instruction. B presents the instruction to the issuer, but the issuer refuses to register the transfer on the grounds that it would violate the restriction. The issuer has complied with this section, because it did notify the registered owner A of the restriction. The issuer's refusal to register transfer is not wrongful. B has an action against A for breach of transfer warranty, see Section 8-108(b)(4)(iii) [30-8-118(2)(d)(iii)]. B's mistake was treating an uncertificated security transaction in the fashion appropriate only for a certificated security. The mechanism for transfer of uncertificated securities is registration of transfer on the books of the issuer; handing over an instruction only initiates the process. The purchaser should make arrangements to ensure that the price is not paid until it knows that the issuer has or will register transfer.

4. In the indirect holding system, investors neither take physical delivery of security certificates nor have uncertificated securities registered in their names. So long as the requirements of this section have been satisfied at the level of the relationship between the issuer and the securities intermediary that is a direct holder, this section does not preclude the issuer from enforcing a restriction on transfer. See Section 8-202(a) [30-8-212(1)] and Comment 2 thereto.

5. This section deals only with restrictions imposed by the issuer. Restrictions imposed by statute are not affected. See Quiner v. Marblehead Social Co., 10 Mass. 476 (1813); Madison Bank v. Price, 79 Kan. 289, 100 P. 280 (1909); Healey v. Steele Center Creamery Ass'n, 115 Minn. 451, 133 N.W. 69 (1911). Nor does it deal with private agreements between stockholders containing restrictive covenants as to the sale of the security.

30-8-215. Effect of unauthorized signature on security certificate.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-205, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. The problem of forged or unauthorized signatures may arise where an employee of the issuer, transfer agent, or registrar has access to securities which the employee is required to prepare for issue by affixing the corporate seal or by adding a signature necessary for issue. This section is based upon the issuer's duty to avoid the negligent entrusting of securities to such persons. Issuers have long been held responsible for signatures placed upon securities by parties whom they have held out to the public as authorized to prepare such securities. See Fifth Avenue Bank of New York v. The Forty-Second & Grand Street Ferry Railroad Co., 137 N.Y. 231, 33 N.E. 378, 19 L.R.A. 331, 33 Am.St.Rep. 712 (1893); Jarvis v. Manhattan Beach Co., 148 N.Y. 652, 43 N.E. 68, 31 L.R.A. 776, 51 Am.St.Rep. 727 (1896). The "apparent authority" concept of some of the case-law, however, is here extended and this section expressly rejects the technical distinction, made by courts reluctant to recognize forged signatures, between cases where forgers sign signatures they are authorized to sign under proper circumstances and those in which they sign signatures they are never authorized to sign. Citizens' & Southern National Bank v. Trust Co. of Georgia, 50 Ga.App. 681, 179 S.E. 278 (1935). Normally the purchaser is not in a position to determine which signature a forger, entrusted with the preparation of securities, has "apparent authority" to sign. The issuer, on the other hand, can protect itself against such fraud by the careful selection and bonding of agents and employees, or by action over against transfer agents and registrars who in turn may bond their personnel.

2. The issuer cannot be held liable for the honesty of employees not entrusted, directly or indirectly, with the signing, preparation, or responsible handling of similar securities and whose possible commission of forgery it has no reason to anticipate. The result in such cases as Hudson Trust Co. v. American Linseed Co., 232 N.Y. 350, 134 N.E. 178 (1922), and Dollar Savings Fund & Trust Co. v. Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co., 213 Pa. 307, 62 A. 916, 5 Ann.Cas. 248 (1906) is here adopted.

3. This section is not concerned with forged or unauthorized indorsements, but only with unauthorized signatures of issuers, transfer agents, etc., placed upon security certificates during the course of their issue. The protection here stated is available to all purchasers for value without notice and not merely to subsequent purchasers.

30-8-216. Completion of alteration of security certificate.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-206, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. The problem of forged or unauthorized signatures necessary for the issue or transfer of a security is not involved here, and a person in possession of a blank certificate is not, by this section, given authority to fill in blanks with such signatures. Completion of blanks left in a transfer instruction is dealt with elsewhere (Section 8-305(a) [30-8-335(1)]).

2. Blanks left upon issue of a security certificate are the only ones dealt with here, and a purchaser for value without notice is protected. A purchaser is not in a good position to determine whether blanks were completed by the issuer or by some person not authorized to complete them. On the other hand the issuer can protect itself by not placing its signature on the writing until the blanks are completed or, if it does sign before all blanks are completed, by carefully selecting the agents and employees to whom it entrusts the writing after authentication. With respect to a security certificate that is completed by the issuer but later is altered, the issuer has done everything it can to protect the purchaser and thus is not charged with the terms as altered. However, it is charged according to the original terms, since it is not thereby prejudiced. If the completion or alteration is obviously irregular, the purchaser may not qualify as a purchaser who took without notice under this section.

3. Only the purchaser who physically takes the certificate is directly protected. However, a transferee may receive protection indirectly through Section 8-302(a) [30-8-332(1)].

4. The protection granted a purchaser for value without notice under this section is modified to the extent that an overissue may result where an incorrect amount is inserted into a blank (Section 8-210 [30-8-220]).

30-8-217. Rights and duties of issuer with respect to registered owners.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-207, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] states the issuer's right to treat the registered owner of a security as the person entitled to exercise all the rights of an owner. This right of the issuer is limited by the provisions of Part 4 of this article [Title 30, chapter 8, part 4]. Once there has been due presentation for registration of transfer, the issuer has a duty to register ownership in the name of the transferee. Section 8-401 [30-8-411]. Thus its right to treat the old registered owner as exclusively entitled to the rights of ownership must cease.

The issuer may under this section make distributions of money or securities to the registered owners of securities without requiring further proof of ownership, provided that such distributions are distributable to the owners of all securities of the same issue and the terms of the security do not require surrender of a security certificate as a condition of payment or exchange. Any such distribution shall constitute a defense against a claim for the same distribution by a person, even if that person is in possession of the security certificate and is a protected purchaser of the security. See PEB Commentary No. 4, dated March 10, 1990.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is permissive and does not require that the issuer deal exclusively with the registered owner. It is free to require proof of ownership before paying out dividends or the like if it chooses to. Barbato v. Breeze Corporation, 128 N.J.L. 309, 26 A.2d 53 (1942).

3. This section does not operate to determine who is finally entitled to exercise voting and other rights or to receive payments and distributions. The parties are still free to incorporate their own arrangements as to these matters in seller-purchaser agreements which may be definitive as between them.

4. No change in existing state laws as to the liability of registered owners for calls and assessments is here intended; nor is anything in this section designed to estop record holders from denying ownership when assessments are levied if they are otherwise entitled to do so under state law. See State ex rel. Squire v. Murfey, Blosson & Co., 131 Ohio St. 289, 2 N.E.2d 866 (1936); Willing v. Delaplaine, 23 F.Supp. 579 (1937).

5. No interference is intended with the common practice of closing the transfer books or taking a record date for dividend, voting, and other purposes, as provided for in by-laws, charters, and statutes.

30-8-218. Effect of signature of authenticating trustee, registrar, or transfer agent.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-208, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. The warranties here stated express the current understanding and prevailing case law as to the effect of the signatures of authenticating trustees, transfer agents, and registrars. See Jarvis v. Manhattan Beach Co., 148 N.Y. 652, 43 N.E. 68, 31 L.R.A. 776, 51 Am.St.Rep. 727 (1896). Although it has generally been regarded as the particular obligation of the transfer agent to determine whether securities are in proper form as provided by the by-laws and Articles of Incorporation, neither a registrar nor an authenticating trustee should properly place a signature upon a certificate without determining whether it is at least regular on its face. The obligations of these parties in this respect have therefore been made explicit in terms of due care. See Feldmeier v. Mortgage Securities, Inc., 34 Cal.App.2d 201, 93 P.2d 593 (1939).

2. Those cases which hold that an authenticating trustee is not liable for any defect in the mortgage or property which secures the bond or for any fraudulent misrepresentations made by the issuer are not here affected since these matters do not involve the genuineness or proper form of the security. Ainsa v. Mercantile Trust Co., 174 Cal. 504, 163 P. 898 (1917); Tschetinian v. City Trust Co., 186 N.Y. 432, 79 N.E. 401 (1906); Davidge v. Guardian Trust Co. of New York, 203 N.Y. 331, 96 N.E. 751 (1911).

3. The charter or an applicable statute may affect the capacity of a bank or other corporation undertaking to act as an authenticating trustee, registrar, or transfer agent. See, for example, the Federal Reserve Act (U.S.C.A., Title 12, Banks and Banking, Section 248) under which the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve Bank is authorized to grant special permits to National Banks permitting them to act as trustees. Such corporations are therefore held to certify as to their legal capacity to act as well as to their authority.

4. Authenticating trustees, registrars, and transfer agents have normally been held liable for an issue in excess of the authorized amount. Jarvis v. Manhattan Beach Co., supra; Mullen v. Eastern Trust & Banking Co., 108 Me. 498, 81 A. 948 (1911). In imposing upon these parties a duty of due care with respect to the amount they are authorized to help issue, this section does not necessarily validate the security, but merely holds persons responsible for the excess issue liable in damages for any loss suffered by the purchaser.

5. Aside from questions of genuineness and excess issue, these parties are not held to certify as to the validity of the security unless they specifically undertake to do so. The case law which has recognized a unique responsibility on the transfer agent's part to testify as to the validity of any security which it countersigns is rejected.

6. This provision does not prevent a transfer agent or issuer from agreeing with a registrar of stock to protect the registrar in respect of the genuineness and proper form of a security certificate signed by the issuer or the transfer agent or both. Nor does it interfere with proper indemnity arrangements between the issuer and trustees, transfer agents, registrars, and the like.

7. An unauthorized signature is a signature for purposes of this section if and only if it is made effective by Section 8-205 [30-8-215].

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-209, U.C.C.
Official Comment:

This section is similar to Sections 8-202 and 8-204 [30-8-212 and 30-8-214] which require that the terms of a certificated security and any restriction on transfer imposed by the issuer be noted on the security certificate. This section differs from those two sections in that the purchaser's knowledge of the issuer's claim is irrelevant. "Noted" makes clear that the text of the lien provisions need not be set forth in full. However, this would not override a provision of an applicable corporation code requiring statement in haec verba. This section does not apply to uncertificated securities. It applies to the indirect holding system in the same fashion as Sections 8-202 and 8-204 [30-8-212 and 30-8-214], see Comment 2 to Section 8-202 [30-8-212].

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-210, U.C.C.
Official Comment:

1. Deeply embedded in corporation law is the conception that "corporate power" to issue securities stems from the statute, either general or special, under which the corporation is organized. Corporation codes universally require that the charter or articles of incorporation state, at least as to capital shares, maximum limits in terms of number of shares or total dollar capital. Historically, special incorporation statutes are similarly drawn and sometimes similarly limit the face amount of authorized debt securities. The theory is that issue of securities in excess of the authorized amounts is prohibited. See, for example, McWilliams v. Geddes & Moss Undertaking Co., 169 So. 894 (1936, La.); Crawford v. Twin City Oil Co., 216 Ala. 216, 113 So. 61 (1927); New York and New Haven R.R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N.Y. 30 (1865). This conception persists despite modern corporation codes under which, by action of directors and stockholders, additional shares can be authorized by charter amendment and thereafter issued. This section does not give a person entitled to validation, issue, or reissue of a security, the right to compel amendment of the charter to authorize additional shares. Therefore, in a case where issue of an additional security would require charter amendment, the plaintiff is limited to the two alternate remedies set forth in subsections (c) and (d) [subsections (3) and (4)]. The last clause of subsection (a) [subsection (1)], which is added in Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], does, however, recognize that under modern conditions, overissue may be a relatively minor technical problem that can be cured by appropriate action under governing corporate law.

2. Where an identical security is reasonably available for purchase, whether because traded on an organized market, or because one or more security owners may be willing to sell at a not unreasonable price, the issuer, although unable to issue additional shares, will be able to purchase them and may be compelled to follow that procedure. West v. Tintic Standard Mining Co., 71 Utah 158, 263 P. 490 (1928).

3. The right to recover damages from an issuer who has permitted an overissue to occur is well settled. New York and New Haven R.R. Co. v. Schuyler, 34 N.Y. 30 (1865). The measure of such damages, however, has been open to question, some courts basing them upon the value of stock at the time registration is refused; some upon the value at the time of trial; and some upon the highest value between the time of refusal and the time of trial. Allen v. South Boston Railroad, 150 Mass. 200, 22 N.E. 917, 5 L.R.A. 716, 15 Am.St.Rep. 185 (1889); Commercial Bank v. Kortright, 22 Wend. (N.Y.) 348 (1839). The purchase price of the security to the last purchaser who gave value for it is here adopted as being the fairest means of reducing the possibility of speculation by the purchaser. Interest may be recovered by the best available measure of compensation for delay.

Part 3
Transfer of Certificated and Uncertificated Securities

30-8-331. Delivery.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-301, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section specifies the requirements for "delivery" of securities. Delivery is used in Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] to describe the formal steps necessary for a purchaser to acquire a direct interest in a security under this Article [chapter]. The concept of delivery refers to the implementation of a transaction, not the legal categorization of the transaction which is consummated by delivery. Issuance and transfer are different kinds of transaction, though both may be implemented by delivery. Sale and pledge are different kinds of transfers, but both may be implemented by delivery.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] defines delivery with respect to certificated securities. Paragraph (1) [subsection (1)(a)] deals with simple cases where purchasers themselves acquire physical possession of certificates. Paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (a) [subsections (1)(b) and (1)(c)] specify the circumstances in which delivery to a purchaser can occur although the certificate is in the possession of a person other than the purchaser. Paragraph (2) [subsection

(1)(b)] contains the general rule that a purchaser can take delivery through another person, so long as the other person is actually acting on behalf of the purchaser or acknowledges that it is holding on behalf of the purchaser. Paragraph (2) [subsection (1)(b)] does not apply to acquisition of possession by a securities intermediary, because a person who holds securities through a securities account acquires a security entitlement, rather than having a direct interest. See Section 8-501 [30-8-501]. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)] specifies the limited circumstances in which delivery of security certificates to a securities intermediary is treated as a delivery to the customer. Note that delivery is a method of perfecting a security interest in a certificated security. See Section 9-313(a), (e) [30-9A-313(1) and (5)].

3. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] defines delivery with respect to uncertificated securities. Use of the term "delivery" with respect to uncertificated securities, does, at least on first hearing, seem a bit solecistic. The word "delivery" is, however, routinely used in the securities business in a broader sense than manual tradition. For example, settlement by entries on the books of a clearing corporation is commonly called "delivery," as in the expression "delivery versus payment." The diction of this section has the advantage of using the same term for uncertificated securities as for certificated securities, for which delivery is conventional usage. Paragraph (1) of subsection (b) [subsection (2)(a)] provides that delivery occurs when the purchaser becomes the registered owner of an uncertificated security, either upon original issue or registration of transfer. Paragraph (2) [subsection (2)(b)] provides for delivery of an uncertificated security through a third person, in a fashion analogous to subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)].

Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

30-8-332. Rights of purchaser.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-302, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that a purchaser of a certificated or uncertificated security acquires all rights that the transferor had or had power to transfer. This statement of the familiar "shelter" principle is qualified by the exceptions that a purchaser of a limited interest acquires only that interest, subsection (b) [subsection (2)], and that a person who does not qualify as a protected purchaser cannot improve its position by taking from a subsequent protected purchaser, subsection (c) [subsection (3)].

2. Although this section provides that a purchaser acquires a property interest in a certificated or uncertificated security, it does not state that a person can acquire an interest in a security only by purchase. Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] also is not a comprehensive codification of all of the law governing the creation or transfer of interests in securities by purchase. For example, the grant of a security interest is a transfer of a property interest, but the formal steps necessary to effectuate such a transfer are governed by Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] not by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Under the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] rules, a security interest in a certificated or uncertificated security can be created by execution of a security agreement under Section 9-203 [30-9-203, now repealed, see 30-9A-203] and can be perfected by filing. A transfer of an Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] security interest can be implemented by an Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] delivery, but need not be.

Similarly, Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] does not determine whether a property interest in certificated or uncertificated security is acquired under other law, such as the law of gifts, trusts, or equitable remedies. Nor does Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deal with transfers by operation of law. For example, transfers from decedent to administrator, from ward to guardian, and from bankrupt to trustee in bankruptcy are governed by other law as to both the time they occur and the substance of the transfer. The Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules do, however, determine whether the issuer is obligated to recognize the rights that a third party, such as a transferee, may acquire under other law. See Sections 8-207, 8-401, and 8-404 [30-8-217, 30-8-411, 30-8-414].

30-8-333. Protected purchaser.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-303, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] lists the requirements that a purchaser must meet to qualify as a "protected purchaser." Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that a protected purchaser takes its interest free from adverse claims. "Purchaser" is defined broadly in Section 1-201 [30-1-201]. A secured party as well as an outright buyer can qualify as a protected purchaser. Also, "purchase" includes taking by issue, so a person to whom a security is originally issued can qualify as a protected purchaser.

2. To qualify as a protected purchaser, a purchaser must give value, take without notice of any adverse claim, and obtain control. Value is used in the broad sense defined in Section 1-201(44) [30-1-201(44)]. See also Section 8-116 [30-8-126] (securities intermediary as purchaser for value). Adverse claim is defined in Section 8-102(a)(1) [30-8-112(1)(a)]. Section 8-105 [30-8-115] specifies whether a purchaser has notice of an adverse claim. Control is defined in Section 8-106 [30-8-116]. To qualify as a protected purchaser there must be a time at which all of the requirements are satisfied. Thus if a purchaser obtains notice of an adverse claim before giving value or satisfying the requirements for control, the purchaser cannot be a protected purchaser. See also Section 8-304(d) [30-8-334(4)].

The requirement that a protected purchaser obtain control expresses the point that to qualify for the adverse claim cut-off rule a purchaser must take through a transaction that is implemented by the appropriate mechanism. By contrast, the rules in Part 2 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 2] provide that any purchaser for value of a security without notice of a defense may take free of the issuer's defense based on that defense. See Section 8-202 [30-8-212].

3. The requirements for control differ depending on the form of the security. For securities represented by bearer certificates, a purchaser obtains control by delivery. See Sections 8-106(a) and 8-301(a) [30-8-116(1) and 30-8-331(1)]. For securities represented by certificates in registered form, the requirements for control are: (1) delivery as defined in Section 8-301(b) [30-8-331(2)], plus (2) either an effective indorsement or registration of transfer by the issuer. See Section 8-106(b) [30-8-116(2)]. Thus, a person who takes through a forged indorsement does not qualify as a protected purchaser by virtue of the delivery alone. If, however, the purchaser presents the certificate to the issuer for registration of transfer, and the issuer registers transfer over the forged indorsement, the purchaser can qualify as a protected purchaser of the new certificate. If the issuer registers transfer on a forged indorsement, the true owner will be able to recover from the issuer for wrongful registration, see Section 8-404 [30-8-414], unless the owner's delay in notifying the issuer of a loss or theft of the certificate results in preclusion under Section 8-406 [30-8-416].

For uncertificated securities, a purchaser can obtain control either by delivery, see Sections 8-106(c)(1) and 8-301(b) [30-8-116(3)(a) and 30-8-331(2)], or by obtaining an agreement pursuant to which the issuer agrees to act on instructions from the purchaser without further consent from the registered owner, see Section 8-106(c)(2) [30-8-116(3)(b)]. The control agreement device of Section 8-106(c)(2) [30-8-116(3)(b)] takes the place of the "registered pledge" concept of the 1978 version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. A secured lender who obtains a control agreement under Section 8-106(c)(2) [30-8-116(3)(b)] can qualify as a protected purchaser of an uncertificated security.

4. This section states directly the rules determining whether one takes free from adverse claims without using the phrase "good faith." Whether a person who takes under suspicious circumstances is disqualified is determined by the rules of Section 8-105 [30-8-115] on notice of adverse claims. The term "protected purchaser," which replaces the term "bona fide purchaser" used in the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], is derived from the term "protected holder" used in the Convention on International Bills and Notes prepared by the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law ("UNCITRAL").

Official Comment:

1. By virtue of the definition of indorsement in Section 8-102 [30-8-112] and the rules of this section, the simplified method of indorsing certificated securities previously set forth in the Uniform Stock Transfer Act is continued. Although more than one special indorsement on a given security certificate is possible, the desire for dividends or interest, as the case may be, should operate to bring the certificate home for registration of transfer within a reasonable period of time. The usual form of assignment which appears on the back of a stock certificate or in a separate "power" may be filled up either in the form of an assignment, a power of attorney to transfer, or both. If it is not filled up at all but merely signed, the indorsement is in blank. If filled up either as an assignment or as a power of attorney to transfer, the indorsement is special.

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] recognizes the validity of a "partial" indorsement, e.g., as to fifty shares of the one hundred represented by a single certificate. The rights of a transferee under a partial indorsement to the status of a protected purchaser are left to the case law.

3. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] deals with the effect of an indorsement without delivery. There must be a voluntary parting with control in order to effect a valid transfer of a certificated security as between the parties. Levey v. Nason, 279 Mass. 268, 181 N.E. 193 (1932), and National Surety Co. v. Indemnity Insurance Co. of North America, 237 App.Div. 485, 261 N.Y.S. 605 (1933). The provision in Section 10 of the Uniform Stock Transfer Act that an attempted transfer without delivery amounts to a promise to transfer is omitted. Even under that Act the effect of such a promise was left to the applicable law of contracts, and this Article by making no reference to such situations intends to achieve a similar result. With respect to delivery there is no counterpart to subsection (d) [subsection (4)] on right to compel indorsement, such as is envisaged in Johnson v. Johnson, 300 Mass. 24, 13 N.E.2d 788 (1938), where the transferee under a written assignment was given the right to compel a transfer of the certificate.

4. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] deals with the effect of delivery without indorsement. As between the parties the transfer is made complete upon delivery, but the transferee cannot become a protected purchaser until indorsement is made. The indorsement does not operate retroactively, and notice may intervene between delivery and indorsement so as to prevent the transferee from becoming a protected purchaser. Although a purchaser taking without a necessary indorsement may be subject to claims of ownership, any issuer's defense of which the purchaser had no notice at the time of delivery will be cut off, since the provisions of this Article protect all purchasers for value without notice (Section 8-202 [30-8-212]).

The transferee's right to compel an indorsement where a security certificate has been delivered with intent to transfer is recognized in the case law. See Coats v. Guaranty Bank & Trust Co., 170 La. 871, 129 So. 513 (1930). A proper indorsement is one of the requisites of transfer which a purchaser of a certificated security has a right to obtain (Section 8-307 [30-8-337]). A purchaser may not only compel an indorsement under that section but may also recover for any reasonable expense incurred by the transferor's failure to respond to the demand for an indorsement.

5. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] deals with the significance of an indorsement on a security certificate in bearer form. The concept of indorsement applies only to registered securities. A purported indorsement of bearer paper is normally of no effect. An indorsement "for collection,"

"for surrender" or the like, charges a purchaser with notice of adverse claims (Section 8-105(d) [30-8-115(4)]) but does not operate beyond this to interfere with any right the holder may otherwise possess to have the security registered.

6. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] makes clear that the indorser of a security certificate does not warrant that the issuer will honor the underlying obligation. In view of the nature of investment securities and the circumstances under which they are normally transferred, a transferor cannot be held to warrant as to the issuer's actions. As a transferor the indorser, of course, remains liable for breach of the warranties set forth in this Article (Section 8-108 [30-8-118]).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM STOCK TRANSFER ACT

Gift of Stock Certificate: Although endorsement may not be absolutely necessary to valid gift of stock certificates, fact that alleged donor had not endorsed certificates as required under former law was evidence that no delivery occurred and hence there was no valid gift. Bodine v. Bodine, 149 M 29, 422 P2d 650 (1967).

Assignment of Stock Certificate: In suit to determine rights of respective administrators of estates of husband and wife, who had been killed in automobile accident, to unendorsed stock certificate in maiden name of wife, evidence of the finding of such unendorsed stock certificate in the joint safety-deposit box of both husband and wife together with a separate assignment of the stock certificate to the husband signed by the wife, did not show a delivery to the husband so as to pass title. Lyons v. Freshman, 124 M 485, 226 P2d 775, 23 ALR 2d 1165 (1951).

Official Comment

Official Comment:

1. The term instruction is defined in Section 8-102(a)(12) [30-8-112(1)(l)] as a notification communicated to the issuer of an uncertificated security directing that transfer be registered. Section 8-107 [30-8-117] specifies who may initiate an effective instruction.

Functionally, presentation of an instruction is quite similar to the presentation of an indorsed certificate for registration. Note that instruction is defined in terms of "communicate," see Section 8-102(a)(6) [30-8-112(1)(f)]. Thus, the instruction may be in the form of a writing signed by the registered owner or in any other form agreed upon by the issuer and the registered owner. Allowing nonwritten forms of instructions will permit the development and employment of means of transmitting instructions electronically.

When a person who originates an instruction leaves a blank and the blank later is completed, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] gives the issuer the same rights it would have had against the originating person had that person completed the blank. This is true regardless of whether the person completing the instruction had authority to complete it. Compare Section 8-206 [30-8-216] and its Comment, dealing with blanks left upon issue.

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] makes clear that the originator of an instruction, like the indorser of a security certificate, does not warrant that the issuer will honor the underlying obligation, but does make warranties as a transferor under Section 8-108 [30-8-118].

30-8-336. Effect of guaranteeing signature, indorsement, or instruction.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-306, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that a guarantor of the signature of the indorser of a security certificate warrants that the signature is genuine, that the signer is an appropriate person or has actual authority to indorse on behalf of the appropriate person, and that the signer has legal capacity. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides similar, though not identical, warranties for the guarantor of a signature of the originator of an instruction for transfer of an uncertificated security.

Appropriate person is defined in Section 8-107(a) [30-8-117(1)] to include a successor or person who has power under other law to act for a person who is deceased or lacks capacity. Thus if a certificate registered in the name of Mary Roe is indorsed by Jane Doe as executor of Mary Roe, a guarantor of the signature of Jane Doe warrants that she has power to act as executor.

Although the definition of appropriate person in Section 8-107(a) [30-8-117(1)] does not itself include an agent, an indorsement by an agent is effective under Section 8-107(b) [30-8-117(2)] if the agent has authority to act for the appropriate person. Accordingly, this section provides an explicit warranty of authority for agents.

2. The rationale of the principle that a signature guarantor warrants the authority of the signer, rather than simply the genuineness of the signature, was explained in the leading case of Jennie Clarkson Home for Children v. Missouri, K. & T.R. Co., 182 N.Y. 47, 74 N.E. 571, 70 A.L.R. 787 (1905), which dealt with a guaranty of the signature of a person indorsing on behalf of a corporation. "If stock is held by an individual who is executing a power of attorney for its transfer, the member of the exchange who signs as a witness thereto guaranties not only the genuineness of the signature affixed to the power of attorney, but that the person signing is the individual in whose name the stock stands. With reference to stock standing in the name of a corporation, which can only sign a power of attorney through its authorized officers or agents, a different situation is presented. If the witnessing of the signature of the corporation is only that of the signature of a person who signs for the corporation, then the guaranty is of no value, and there is nothing to protect purchasers or the companies who are called upon to issue new stock in the place of that transferred from the frauds of persons who have signed the names of corporations without authority. If such is the only effect of the guaranty, purchasers and transfer agents must first go to the corporation in whose name the stock stands and ascertain whether the individual who signed the power of attorney had authority to do so. This will require time, and in many cases will necessitate the postponement of the completion of the purchase by the payment of the money until the facts can be ascertained. The broker who is acting for the owner has an opportunity to become acquainted with his customer, and may readily before sale ascertain, in case of a corporation, the name of the officer who is authorized to execute the power of attorney. It was therefore, we think, the purpose of the rule to cast upon the broker who witnesses the signature the duty of ascertaining whether the person signing the name of the corporation had authority to do so, and making the witness a guarantor that it is the signature of the corporation in whose name the stock stands."

3. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] sets forth the warranties that can reasonably be expected from the guarantor of the signature of the originator of an instruction, who, though familiar with the signer, does not have any evidence that the purported owner is in fact the owner of the subject uncertificated security. This is in contrast to the position of the person guaranteeing a signature on a certificate who can see a certificate in the signer's possession in the name of or indorsed to the signer or in blank. Thus, the warranty in paragraph (2) of subsection (b) [subsection (2)(b)] is expressly conditioned on the actual registration's conforming to that represented by the originator. If the signer purports to be the owner, the guarantor under paragraph (2) [subsection (2)(b)], warrants only the identity of the signer. If, however, the signer is acting in a representative capacity, the guarantor warrants both the signer's identity and authority to act for the purported owner. The issuer needs no warranty as to the facts of registration because those facts can be ascertained from the issuer's own records.

4. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] sets forth a "special guaranty of signature" under which the guarantor additionally warrants both registered ownership and freedom from undisclosed defects of record. The guarantor of the signature of an indorser of a security certificate effectively makes these warranties to a purchaser for value on the evidence of a clean certificate issued in the name of the indorser, indorsed to the indorser or indorsed in blank. By specially guaranteeing under subsection (c) [subsection (3)], the guarantor warrants that the instruction will, when presented to the issuer, result in the requested registration free from defects not specified.

5. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] makes clear that the warranties of a signature guarantor are limited to those specified in this section and do not include a general warranty of rightfulness. On the other hand subsections (e) and (f) [subsections (5) and (6)] provide that a person guaranteeing an indorsement or an instruction does warrant that the transfer is rightful in all respects.

6. Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] makes clear what can be inferred from the combination of Sections 8-401 and 8-402 [30-8-411 and 30-8-412], that the issuer may not require as a condition to transfer a guaranty of the indorsement or instruction nor may it require a special signature guaranty.

7. Subsection (h) [subsection (8)] specifies to whom the warranties in this section run, and also provides that a person who gives a guaranty under this section has an action against the indorser or originator for any loss suffered by the guarantor.

Transfer Books of Corporation: That equitable ownership of shares of stock might attach prior to evidence upon corporation's books of such ownership did not extinguish corporation's obligation to maintain its books and records in good faith so that records promptly reflected equitable ownership. Title of Transferee: Where seller's offer for sale of stock was accepted by buyer who made a $1,000 down payment thereon and seller delivered stock, duly certified and assigned, to his attorney for delivery to buyer upon payment of balance of purchase price and buyer as well as other stockholder took over corporation's assets and considered themselves at all times as sole owners of corporation, even though certificates of stock may not have actually been transferred on corporation's books, there was passage of title notwithstanding existence of attachment lien on stock unknown to seller who was willing to have that portion of purchase price applied on the above attachment as a cash bond to secure a buyer. Official Comment

Official Comment:

1. Because registration of the transfer of a security is a matter of vital importance, a purchaser is here provided with the means of obtaining such formal requirements for registration as signature guaranties, proof of authority, transfer tax stamps and the like. The transferor is the one in a position to supply most conveniently whatever documentation may be requisite for registration of transfer, and the duty to do so upon demand within a reasonable time is here stated affirmatively. If an essential item is peculiarly within the province of the transferor so that the transferor is the only one who can obtain it, the purchaser may specifically enforce the right to obtain it. Compare Section 8-304(d) [30-8-334(4)]. If a transfer is not for value the transferor need not pay expenses.

2. If the transferor's duty is not performed the transferee may reject or rescind the contract to transfer. The transferee is not bound to do so. An action for damages for breach of contract may be preferred.

Part 4
Registration

30-8-411. Duty of issuer to register transfer.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-401, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section states the duty of the issuer to register transfers. A duty exists only if certain preconditions exist. If any of the preconditions do not exist, there is no duty to register transfer. If an indorsement on a security certificate is a forgery, there is no duty. If an instruction to transfer an uncertificated security is not originated by an appropriate person, there is no duty. If there has not been compliance with applicable tax laws, there is no duty. If a security certificate is properly indorsed but nevertheless the transfer is in fact wrongful, there is no duty unless the transfer is to a protected purchaser (and the other preconditions exist).

This section does not constitute a mandate that the issuer must establish that all preconditions are met before the issuer registers a transfer. The issuer may waive the reasonable assurances specified in paragraph (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)]. If it has confidence in the responsibility of the persons requesting transfer, it may ignore questions of compliance with tax laws. Although an issuer has no duty if the transfer is wrongful, the issuer has no duty to inquire into adverse claims, see Section 8-404 [30-8-414].

2. By subsection (b) [subsection (2)] the person entitled to registration may not only compel it but may hold the issuer liable in damages for unreasonable delay.

3. Section 8-201(c) [30-8-211(3)] provides that with respect to registration of transfer, "issuer" means the person on whose behalf transfer books are maintained. Transfer agents, registrars or the like within the scope of their respective functions have rights and duties under this Part similar to those of the issuer. See Section 8-407 [30-8-417].

30-8-412. Assurance that indorsement or instruction is effective.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-402, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. An issuer is absolutely liable for wrongful registration of transfer if the indorsement or instruction is ineffective. See Section 8-404 [30-8-414]. Accordingly, an issuer is entitled to require such assurance as is reasonable under the circumstances that all necessary indorsements are effective, and thus to minimize its risk. This section establishes the requirements the issuer may make in terms of documentation which, except in the rarest of instances, should be easily furnished. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that an issuer may require additional assurances if that requirement is reasonable under the circumstances, but if the issuer demands more than reasonable assurance that the instruction or the necessary indorsements are genuine and authorized, the presenter may refuse the demand and sue for improper refusal to register. Section 8-401(b) [30-8-411(2)].

2. Under subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a), the issuer may require in all cases a guaranty of signature. See Section 8-306 [30-8-336]. When an instruction is presented the issuer always may require reasonable assurance as to the identity of the originator. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] allows the issuer to require that the person making these guaranties be one reasonably believed to be responsible, and the issuer may adopt standards of responsibility which are not manifestly unreasonable. Regulations under the federal securities laws, however, place limits on the requirements transfer agents may impose concerning the responsibility of eligible signature guarantors. See 17 CFR 240.17Ad15.

3. This section, by paragraphs (2) through (5) of subsection (a) [subsections (1)(b) through (1)(e)], permits the issuer to seek confirmation that the indorsement or instruction is genuine and authorized. The permitted methods act as a double check on matters which are within the warranties of the signature guarantor. See Section 8-306 [30-8-336]. Thus, an agent may be required to submit a power of attorney, a corporation to submit a certified resolution evidencing the authority of its signing officer to sign, an executor or administrator to submit the usual "shortform certificate," etc. But failure of a fiduciary to obtain court approval of the transfer or to comply with other requirements does not make the fiduciary's signature ineffective. Section 8-107(c) [30-8-117(3)]. Hence court orders and other controlling instruments are omitted from subsection (a) [subsection (1)].

Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)] authorizes the issuer to require "appropriate evidence" of appointment or incumbency, and subsection (c) [subsection (3)] indicates what evidence will be "appropriate". In the case of a fiduciary appointed or qualified by a court that evidence will be a court certificate dated within sixty days before the date of presentation, subsection (c)(2)(i) [subsection (3)(b)(i)]. Where the fiduciary is not appointed or qualified by a court, as in the case of a successor trustee, subsection (c)(2)(ii) [subsection (3)(b)(ii)] applies. In that case, the issuer may require a copy of a trust instrument or other document showing the appointment, or it may require the certificate of a responsible person. In the absence of such a document or certificate, it may require other appropriate evidence. If the security is registered in the name of the fiduciary as such, the person's signature is effective even though the person is no longer serving in that capacity, see Section 8-107(d) [30-8-117(4)], hence no evidence of incumbency is needed.

4. Circumstances may indicate that a necessary signature was unauthorized or was not that of an appropriate person. Such circumstances would be ignored at risk of absolute liability. To minimize that risk the issuer may properly exercise the option given by subsection (b) [subsection (2)] to require assurance beyond that specified in subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. On the other hand, the facts at hand may reflect only on the rightfulness of the transfer. Such facts do not create a duty of inquiry, because the issuer is not liable to an adverse claimant unless the claimant obtains legal process. See Section 8-404 [30-8-414].

30-8-413. Demand that issuer not register transfer.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-403, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. The general rule under this Article [chapter] is that if there has been an effective indorsement or instruction, a person who contends that registration of the transfer would be wrongful should not be able to interfere with the registration process merely by sending notice of the assertion to the issuer. Rather, the claimant must obtain legal process. See Section 8-404 [30-8-414]. Section 8-403 [30-8-413] is an exception to this general rule. It permits the registered owner—but not third parties—to demand that the issuer not register a transfer.

2. This section is intended to alleviate the problems faced by registered owners of certificated securities who lose or misplace their certificates. A registered owner who realizes that a certificate may have been lost or stolen should promptly report that fact to the issuer, lest the owner be precluded from asserting a claim for wrongful registration. See Section 8-406 [30-8-416]. The usual practice of issuers and transfer agents is that when a certificate is reported as lost, the owner is notified that a replacement can be obtained if the owner provides an indemnity bond. See Section 8-405 [30-8-415]. If the registered owner does not plan to transfer the securities, the owner might choose not to obtain a replacement, particularly if the owner suspects that the certificate has merely been misplaced.

Under this section, the owner's notification that the certificate has been lost would constitute a demand that the issuer not register transfer. No indemnity bond or legal process is necessary. If the original certificate is presented for registration of transfer, the issuer is required to notify the registered owner of that fact, and defer registration of transfer for a stated period. In order to prevent undue delay in the process of registration, the stated period may not exceed thirty days. This gives the registered owner an opportunity to either obtain legal process or post an indemnity bond and thereby prevent the issuer from registering transfer.

3. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] makes clear that this section does not relieve an issuer from liability for registering a transfer pursuant to an ineffective indorsement. An issuer's liability for wrongful registration in such cases does not depend on the presence or absence of notice that the indorsement was ineffective. Registered owners who are confident that they neither indorsed the certificates, nor did anything that would preclude them from denying the effectiveness of another's indorsement, see Sections 8-107(b) and 8-406 [30-8-117(2) and 30-8-416], might prefer to pursue their rights against the issuer for wrongful registration rather than take advantage of the opportunity to post a bond or seek a restraining order when notified by the issuer under this section that their lost certificates have been presented for registration in apparently good order.

30-8-414. Wrongful registration.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-404, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] provides that an issuer is liable if it registers transfer pursuant to an indorsement or instruction that was not effective. For example, an issuer that registers transfer on a forged indorsement is liable to the registered owner. The fact that the issuer had no reason to suspect that the indorsement was forged or that the issuer obtained the ordinary assurances under Section 8-402 [30-8-412] does not relieve the issuer from liability. The reason that issuers obtain signature guaranties and other assurances is that they are liable for wrongful registration.

Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] specifies the remedy for wrongful registration. PreCode cases established the registered owner's right to receive a new security where the issuer had wrongfully registered a transfer, but some cases also allowed the registered owner to elect between an equitable action to compel issue of a new security and an action for damages. Cf. Casper v. KaltZimmers Mfg. Co., 159 Wis. 517, 149 N.W. 754 (1914). Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] does not allow such election. The true owner of a certificated security is required to take a new security except where an overissue would result and a similar security is not reasonably available for purchase. See Section 8-210 [30-8-220]. The true owner of an uncertificated security is entitled and required to take restoration of the records to their proper state, with a similar exception for overissue.

2. Read together, subsections (c) and (a) [subsections (3) and (1)] have the effect of providing that an issuer has no duties to an adverse claimant unless the claimant serves legal process on the issuer to enjoin registration. Issuers, or their transfer agents, perform a record-keeping function for the direct holding system that is analogous to the functions performed by clearing corporations and securities intermediaries in the indirect holding system. This section applies to the record-keepers for the direct holding system the same standard that Section 8-115 [30-8-125] applies to the record-keepers for the indirect holding system. Thus, issuers are not liable to adverse claimants merely on the basis of notice. As in the case of the analogous rules for the indirect holding system, the policy of this section is to protect the right of investors to have their securities transfers processed without the disruption or delay that might result if the record-keepers risked liability to third parties. It would be undesirable to apply different standards to the direct and indirect holding systems, since doing so might operate as a disincentive to the development of a book-entry direct holding system.

3. This section changes prior law under which an issuer could be held liable, even though it registered transfer on an effective indorsement or instruction, if the issuer had in some fashion been notified that the transfer might be wrongful against a third party, and the issuer did not appropriately discharge its duty to inquire into the adverse claim. See Section 8-403 (1978) [former 30-8-403].

The rule of former Section 8-403 [former 30-8-403] was anomalous inasmuch as Section 8-207 [30-8-217] provides that the issuer is entitled to "treat the registered owner as the person exclusively entitled to vote, receive notifications, and otherwise exercise all the rights and powers of an owner." Under Section 8-207 [30-8-217], the fact that a third person notifies the issuer of a claim does not preclude the issuer from treating the registered owner as the person entitled to the security. See Kerrigan v. American Orthodontics Corp., 960 F.2d 43 (7th Cir.1992). The change made in the present version of Section 8-404 [30-8-414] ensures that the rights of registered owners and the duties of issuers with respect to registration of transfer will be protected against third-party interference in the same fashion as other rights of registered ownership.

1. This section enables the owner to obtain a replacement of a lost, destroyed or stolen certificate, provided that reasonable requirements are satisfied and a sufficient indemnity bond supplied.

2. Where an "original" security certificate has reached the hands of a protected purchaser, the registered owner—who was in the best position to prevent the loss, destruction or theft of the security certificate—is now deprived of the new security certificate issued as a replacement. This changes the pre-UCC law under which the original certificate was ineffective after the issue of a replacement except insofar as it might represent an action for damages in the hands of a purchaser for value without notice. Keller v. Eureka Brick Mach. Mfg. Co., 43 Mo.App. 84, 11 L.R.A. 472 (1890). Where both the original and the new certificate have reached protected purchasers the issuer is required to honor both certificates unless an overissue would result and the security is not reasonably available for purchase. See Section 8-210 [30-8-220]. In the latter case alone, the protected purchaser of the original certificate is relegated to an action for damages. In either case, the issuer itself may recover on the indemnity bond.

An owner who fails to notify the issuer within a reasonable time after the owner knows or has reason to know of the loss or theft of a security certificate is estopped from asserting the ineffectiveness of a forged or unauthorized indorsement and the wrongfulness of the registration of the transfer. If the lost certificate was indorsed by the owner, then the registration of the transfer was not wrongful under Section 8-404 [30-8-414], unless the owner made an effective demand that the issuer not register transfer under Section 8-403 [30-8-413].

1. Transfer agents, registrars, and the like are here expressly held liable both to the issuer and to the owner for wrongful refusal to register a transfer as well as for wrongful registration of a transfer in any case within the scope of their respective functions where the issuer would itself be liable. Those cases which have regarded these parties solely as agents of the issuer and have therefore refused to recognize their liability to the owner for mere nonfeasance, i.e., refusal to register a transfer, are rejected. Hulse v. Consolidated Quicksilver Mining Corp., 65 Idaho 768, 154 P.2d 149 (1944); Nicholson v. Morgan, 119 Misc. 309, 196 N.Y.Supp. 147 (1922); Lewis v. Hargadine-McKittrick Dry Goods Co., 305 Mo. 396, 274 S.W. 1041 (1924).

2. The practice frequently followed by authenticating trustees of issuing certificates of indebtedness rather than authenticating duplicate certificates where securities have been lost or stolen became obsolete in view of the provisions of Section 8-405 [30-8-415], which makes express provision for the issue of substitute securities. It is not a breach of trust or lack of due diligence for trustees to authenticate new securities. Cf. Switzerland General Ins. Co. v. N.Y.C. & H.R.R. Co., 152 App.Div. 70, 136 N.Y.S. 726 (1912).

Part 5
Security Entitlements

30-8-501. Securities account — acquisition of security entitlement from securities intermediary.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-501, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules apply to security entitlements, and Section 8-501(b) [30-8-501(2)] provides that a person has a security entitlement when a financial asset has been credited to a "securities account." Thus, the term "securities account" specifies the type of arrangements between institutions and their customers that are covered by Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. A securities account is a consensual arrangement in which the intermediary undertakes to treat the customer as entitled to exercise the rights that comprise the financial asset. The consensual aspect is covered by the requirement that the account be established pursuant to agreement. The term agreement is used in the broad sense defined in Section 1-201(3) [30-1-201(3)]. There is no requirement that a formal or written agreement be signed.

As the securities business is presently conducted, several significant relationships clearly fall within the definition of a securities account, including the relationship between a clearing corporation and its participants, a broker and customers who leave securities with the broker, and a bank acting as securities custodian and its custodial customers. Given the enormous variety of arrangements concerning securities that exist today, and the certainty that new arrangements will evolve in the future, it is not possible to specify all of the arrangements to which the term does and does not apply.

Whether an arrangement between a firm and another person concerning a security or other financial asset is a "securities account" under this Article [chapter] depends on whether the firm has undertaken to treat the other person as entitled to exercise the rights that comprise the security or other financial asset. Section 1-102 [30-1-102], however, states the fundamental principle of interpretation that the Code provisions should be construed and applied to promote their underlying purposes and policies. Thus, the question whether a given arrangement is a securities account should be decided not by dictionary analysis of the words of the definition taken out of context, but by considering whether it promotes the objectives of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] to include the arrangement within the term securities account.

The effect of concluding that an arrangement is a securities account is that the rules of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] apply. Accordingly, the definition of "securities account" must be interpreted in light of the substantive provisions in Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5], which describe the core features of the type of relationship for which the commercial law rules of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] concerning security entitlements were designed. There are many arrangements between institutions and other persons concerning securities or other financial assets which do not fall within the definition of "securities account" because the institutions have not undertaken to treat the other persons as entitled to exercise the ordinary rights of an entitlement holder specified in the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules. For example, the term securities account does not cover the relationship between a bank and its depositors or the relationship between a trustee and the beneficiary of an ordinary trust, because those are not relationships in which the holder of a financial asset has undertaken to treat the other as entitled to exercise the rights that comprise the financial asset in the fashion contemplated by the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules.

In short, the primary factor in deciding whether an arrangement is a securities account is whether application of the Part 5 rules is consistent with the expectations of the parties to the relationship. Relationships not governed by Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] may be governed by other parts of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] if the relationship gives rise to a new security, or may be governed by other law entirely.

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] of this section specifies what circumstances give rise to security entitlements. Paragraph (1) of subsection (b) [subsection (2)(a)] sets out the most important rule. It turns on the intermediary's conduct, reflecting a basic operating assumption of the indirect holding system that once a securities intermediary has acknowledged that it is carrying a position in a financial asset for its customer or participant, the intermediary is obligated to treat the customer or participant as entitled to the financial asset. Paragraph (1) [subsection (2)(a)] does not attempt to specify exactly what accounting, record-keeping, or information transmission steps suffice to indicate that the intermediary has credited the account. That is left to agreement, trade practice, or rule in order to provide the flexibility necessary to accommodate varying or changing accounting and information processing systems. The point of paragraph (1) [subsection (2)(a)] is that once an intermediary has acknowledged that it is carrying a position for the customer or participant, the customer or participant has a security entitlement. The precise form in which the intermediary manifests that acknowledgment is left to private ordering.

Paragraph (2) of subsection (b) [subsection (2)(b)] sets out a different operational test, turning not on the intermediary's accounting system but on the facts that accounting systems are supposed to represent. Under paragraph (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)] a person has a security entitlement if the intermediary has received and accepted a financial asset for credit to the account of its customer or participant. For example, if a customer of a broker or bank custodian delivers a security certificate in proper form to the broker or bank to be held in the customer's account, the customer acquires a security entitlement. Paragraph (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)] also covers circumstances in which the intermediary receives a financial asset from a third person for credit to the account of the customer or participant. Paragraph (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)] is not limited to circumstances in which the intermediary receives security certificates or other financial assets in physical form. Paragraph (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)] also covers circumstances in which the intermediary acquires a security entitlement with respect to a financial asset which is to be credited to the account of the intermediary's own customer. For example, if a customer transfers her account from Broker A to Broker B, she acquires security entitlements against Broker B once the clearing corporation has credited the positions to Broker B's account. It should be noted, however, that paragraph (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)] provides that a person acquires a security entitlement when the intermediary not only receives but also accepts the financial asset for credit to the account. This limitation is included to take account of the fact that there may be circumstances in which an intermediary has received a financial asset but is not willing to undertake the obligations that flow from establishing a security entitlement. For example, a security certificate which is sent to an intermediary may not be in proper form, or may represent a type of financial asset which the intermediary is not willing to carry for others. It should be noted that in all but extremely unusual cases, th [sic] circumstances covered by paragraph (2) [subsection (2)(b)] will also be covered by paragraph (1) [subsection (2)(a)], because the intermediary will have credited the positions to the customer's account.

Paragraph (3) of subsection (b) [subsection (2)(c)] sets out a residual test, to avoid any implication that the failure of an intermediary to make the appropriate entries to credit a position to a customer's securities account would prevent the customer from acquiring the rights of an entitlement holder under Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. As is the case with the paragraph (2) [subsection (2)(b)] test, the paragraph (3) [subsection (2)(c)] test would not be needed for the ordinary cases, since they are covered by paragraph (1) [subsection (2)(a)].

3. In a sense, Section 8-501(b) [30-8-501(2)] is analogous to the rules set out in the provisions of Sections 8-313(1)(d) and 8-320 [former 30-8-313(1)(d) and 30-8-320] of the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] that specified what acts by a securities intermediary or clearing corporation sufficed as a transfer of securities held in fungible bulk. Unlike the prior version of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], however, this section is not based on the idea that an entitlement holder acquires rights only by virtue of a "transfer" from the securities intermediary to the entitlement holder. In the indirect holding system, the significant fact is that the securities intermediary has undertaken to treat the customer as entitled to the financial asset. It is up to the securities intermediary to take the necessary steps to ensure that it will be able to perform its undertaking. It is, for example, entirely possible that a securities intermediary might make entries in a customer's account reflecting that customer's acquisition of a certain security at a time when the securities intermediary did not itself happen to hold any units of that security. The person from whom the securities intermediary bought the security might have failed to deliver and it might have taken some time to clear up the problem, or there may have been an operational gap in time between the crediting of a customer's account and the receipt of securities from another securities intermediary. The entitlement holder's rights against the securities intermediary do not depend on whether or when the securities intermediary acquired its interests. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] is intended to make this point clear. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] does not mean that the intermediary is free to create security entitlements without itself holding sufficient financial assets to satisfy its entitlement holders. The duty of a securities intermediary to maintain sufficient assets is governed by Section 8-504 [30-8-504] and regulatory law. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] is included only to make it clear the question whether a person has acquired a security entitlement does not depend on whether the intermediary has complied with that duty.

4. Part 5 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] sets out a carefully designed system of rules for the indirect holding system. Persons who hold securities through brokers or custodians have security entitlements that are governed by Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5], rather than being treated as the direct holders of securities. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] specifies the limited circumstance in which a customer who leaves a financial asset with a broker or other securities intermediary has a direct interest in the financial asset, rather than a security entitlement.

The customer can be a direct holder only if the security certificate, or other financial asset, is registered in the name of, payable to the order of, or specially indorsed to the customer, and has not been indorsed by the customer to the securities intermediary or in blank. The distinction between those circumstances where the customer can be treated as direct owner and those where the customer has a security entitlement is essentially the same as the distinction drawn under the federal bankruptcy code between customer name securities and customer property. The distinction does not turn on any form of physical identification or segregation. A customer who delivers certificates to a broker with blank indorsements or stock powers is not a direct holder but has a security entitlement, even though the broker holds those certificates in some form of separate safe-keeping arrangement for that particular customer. The customer remains the direct holder only if there is no indorsement or stock power so that further action by the customer is required to place the certificates in a form where they can be transferred by the broker.

The rule of subsection (d) [subsection (4)] corresponds to the rule set out in Section 8-301(a)(3) [30-8-331(1)(c)] specifying when acquisition of possession of a certificate by a securities intermediary counts as "delivery" to the customer.

5. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] is intended to make clear that Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] does not apply to an arrangement in which a security is issued representing an interest in underlying assets, as distinguished from arrangements in which the underlying assets are carried in a securities account. A common mechanism by which new financial instruments are devised is that a financial institution that holds some security, financial instrument, or pool thereof, creates interests in that asset or pool which are sold to others. In many such cases, the interests so created will fall within the definition of "security" in Section 8-102(a)(15) [30-8-112(1)(o)]. If so, then by virtue of subsection (e) of Section 8-501 [30-8-501(5)], the relationship between the institution that creates the interests and the persons who hold them is not a security entitlement to which the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules apply. Accordingly, an arrangement such as an American depositary receipt facility which creates freely transferable interests in underlying securities will be issuance of a security under Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rather than establishment of a security entitlement to the underlying securities.

The subsection (e) [subsection (5)] rule can be regarded as an aspect of the definitional rules specifying the meaning of securities account and security entitlement. Among the key components of the definition of security in Section 8-102(a)(15) [30-8-112(1)(o)] are the "transferability" and "divisibility" tests. Securities, in the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] sense, are fungible interests or obligations that are intended to be tradable. The concept of security entitlement under Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] is quite different. A security entitlement is the package of rights that a person has against the person's own intermediary with respect to the positions carried in the person's securities account. That package of rights is not, as such, something that is traded. When a customer sells a security that she had held through a securities account, her security entitlement is terminated; when she buys a security that she will hold through her securities account, she acquires a security entitlement. In most cases, settlement of a securities trade will involve termination of one person's security entitlement and acquisition of a security entitlement by another person. That transaction, however, is not a "transfer" of the same entitlement from one person to another. That is not to say that an entitlement holder cannot transfer an interest in her security entitlement as such; granting a security interest in a security entitlement is such a transfer. On the other hand, the nature of a security entitlement is that the intermediary is undertaking duties only to the person identified as the entitlement holder.

30-8-502. Assertion of adverse claim against entitlement holder.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-502, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. The section provides investors in the indirect holding system with protection against adverse claims by specifying that no adverse claim can be asserted against a person who acquires a security entitlement under Section 8-501 [30-8-501] for value and without notice of the adverse claim. It plays a role in the indirect holding system analogous to the rule of the direct holding system that protected purchasers take free from adverse claims (Section 8-303 [30-8-333]).

This section does not use the locution "takes free from adverse claims" because that could be confusing as applied to the indirect holding system. The nature of indirect holding system is that an entitlement holder has an interest in common with others who hold positions in the same financial asset through the same intermediary. Thus, a particular entitlement holder's interest in the financial assets held by its intermediary is necessarily "subject to" the interests of others. See Section 8-503 [30-8-503]. The rule stated in this section might have been expressed by saying that a person who acquires a security entitlement under Section 8-501 [30-8-501] for value and without notice of adverse claims takes "that security entitlement" free from adverse claims. That formulation has not been used, however, for fear that it would be misinterpreted as suggesting that the person acquires a right to the underlying financial assets that could not be affected by the competing rights of others claiming through common or higher tier intermediaries. A security entitlement is a complex bundle of rights. This section does not deal with the question of what rights are in the bundle. Rather, this section provides that once a person has acquired the bundle, someone else cannot take it away on the basis of assertion that the transaction in which the security entitlement was created involved a violation of the claimant's rights.

2. Because securities trades are typically settled on a net basis by book-entry movements, it would ordinarily be impossible for anyone to trace the path of any particular security, no matter how the interest of parties who hold through intermediaries is described. Suppose, for example, that S has a 1000 share position in XYZ common stock through an account with a broker, Able & Co. S's identical twin impersonates S and directs Able to sell the securities. That same day, B places an order with Baker & Co., to buy 1000 shares of XYZ common stock. Later, S discovers the wrongful act and seeks to recover "her shares." Even if S can show that, at the stage of the trade, her sell order was matched with B's buy order, that would not suffice to show that "her shares" went to B. Settlement between Able and Baker occurs on a net basis for all trades in XYZ that day; indeed Able's net position may have been such that it received rather than delivered shares in XYZ through the settlement system.

In the unlikely event that this was the only trade in XYZ common stock executed in the market that day, one could follow the shares from S's account to B's account. The plaintiff in an action in conversion or similar legal action to enforce a property interest must show that the defendant has an item of property that belongs to the plaintiff. In this example, B's security entitlement is not the same item of property that formerly was held by S, it is a new package of rights that B acquired against Baker under Section 8-501 [30-8-501]. Principles of equitable remedies might, however, provide S with a basis for contending that if the position B received was the traceable product of the wrongful taking of S's property by S's twin, a constructive trust should be imposed on B's property in favor of S. See G. Palmer, The Law of Restitution §2.14. Section 8-502 [30-8-502] ensures that no such claims can be asserted against a person, such as B in this example, who acquires a security entitlement under Section 8-501 [30-8-501] for value and without notice, regardless of what theory of law or equity is used to describe the basis of the assertion of the adverse claim.

In the above example, S would ordinarily have no reason to pursue B unless Able is insolvent and S's claim will not be satisfied in the insolvency proceedings. Because S did not give an entitlement order for the disposition of her security entitlement, Able must recredit her account for the 1000 shares of XYZ common stock. See Section 8-507(b) [30-8-507(2)].

3. The following examples illustrate the operation of Section 8-502 [30-8-502].

Example 1. Thief steals bearer bonds from Owner. Thief delivers the bonds to Broker for credit to Thief's securities account, thereby acquiring a security entitlement under Section 8-501(b) [30-8-501(2)]. Under other law, Owner may have a claim to have a constructive trust imposed on the security entitlement as the traceable product of the bonds that Thief misappropriated. Because Thief was himself the wrongdoer, Thief obviously had notice of Owner's adverse claim. Accordingly, Section 8-502 [30-8-502] does not preclude Owner from asserting an adverse claim against Thief.

Example 2. Thief steals bearer bonds from Owner. Thief owes a personal debt to Creditor. Creditor has a securities account with Broker. Thief agrees to transfer the bonds to Creditor as security for or in satisfaction of his debt to Creditor. Thief does so by sending the bonds to Broker for credit to Creditor's securities account. Creditor thereby acquires a security entitlement under Section 8-501(b) [30-8-501(2)]. Under other law, Owner may have a claim to have a constructive trust imposed on the security entitlement as the traceable product of the bonds that Thief misappropriated. Creditor acquired the security entitlement for value, since Creditor acquired it as security for or in satisfaction of Thief's debt to Creditor. See Section 1-201(44) [30-1-201(44)]. If Creditor did not have notice of Owner's claim, Section 8-502 [30-8-502] precludes any action by Owner against Creditor, whether framed in constructive trust or other theory. Section 8-105 [30-8-115] specifies what counts as notice of an adverse claim.

Example 3. Father, as trustee for Son, holds XYZ Co. shares in a securities account with Able & Co. In violation of his fiduciary duties, Father sells the XYZ Co. shares and uses the proceeds for personal purposes. Father dies, and his estate is insolvent. Assume implausibly that Son is able to trace the XYZ Co. shares and show that the "same shares" ended up in Buyer's securities account with Baker & Co. Section 8-502 [30-8-502] precludes any action by Son against Buyer, whether framed in constructive trust or other theory, provided that Buyer acquired the security entitlement for value and without notice of adverse claims.

Example 4. Debtor holds XYZ Co. shares in a securities account with Able & Co. As collateral for a loan from Bank, Debtor grants Bank a security interest in the security entitlement to the XYZ Co. shares. Bank perfects by a method which leaves Debtor with the ability to dispose of the shares. See Section 9-312 [30-9A-312]. In violation of the security agreement, Debtor sells the XYZ Co. shares and absconds with the proceeds. Assume implausibly that Bank is able to trace the XYZ Co. shares and show that the "same shares" ended up in Buyer's securities account with Baker & Co. Section 8-502 [30-8-502] precludes any action by Bank against Buyer, whether framed in constructive trust or other theory, provided that Buyer acquired the security entitlement for value and without notice of adverse claims.

Example 5. Debtor owns controlling interests in various public companies, including Acme and Ajax. Acme owns 60% of the stock of another public company, Beta. Debtor causes the Beta stock to be pledged to Lending Bank as collateral for Ajax's debt. Acme holds the Beta stock through an account with a securities custodian, C Bank, which in turn holds through Clearing Corporation. Lending Bank is also a Clearing Corporation participant. The pledge of the Beta stock is implemented by Acme instructing C Bank to instruct Clearing Corporation to debit C Bank's account and credit Lending Bank's account. Acme and Ajax both become insolvent. The Beta stock is still valuable. Acme's liquidator asserts that the pledge of the Beta stock for Ajax's debt was wrongful as against Acme and seeks to recover the Beta stock from Lending Bank. Because the pledge was implemented by an outright transfer into Lending Bank's account at Clearing Corporation, Lending Bank acquired a security entitlement to the Beta stock under Section 8-501 [30-8-501]. Lending Bank acquired the security entitlement for value, since it acquired it as security for a debt. See Section 1-201(44) [30-1-201(44)]. If Lending Bank did not have notice of Acme's claim, Section 8-502 [30-8-502] will preclude any action by Acme against Lending Bank, whether framed in constructive trust or other theory.

Example 6. Debtor grants Alpha Co. a security interest in a security entitlement that includes 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock that Debtor holds through an account with Able & Co. Alpha also has an account with Able. Debtor instructs Able to transfer the shares to Alpha, and Able does so by crediting the shares to Alpha's account. Alpha has control of the 1000 shares under Section 8-106(d) [30-8-116(4)]. (The facts to this point are identical to those in Section 8-106 [30-8-116], Comment 4, Example 1, except that Alpha Co. was Alpha Bank.) Alpha next grants Beta Co. a security interest in the 1000 shares included in Alpha's security entitlement. See Section 9-207(c)(3) [30-9A-207(3)(c)]. Alpha instructs Able to transfer the shares to Gamma Co., Beta's custodian. Able does so, and Gamma credits the 1000 shares to Beta's account. Beta now has control under Section 8-106(d) [30-8-116(4)]. By virtue of Debtor's explicit permission or by virtue of the permission inherent in Debtor's creation of a security interest in favor of Alpha and Alpha's resulting power to grant a security interest under Section 9-207 [30-9A-207], Debtor has no adverse claim to assert against Beta, assuming implausibly that Debtor could "trace" an interest to the Gamma account. Moreover, even if Debtor did hold an adverse claim, if Beta did not have notice of Debtor's claim, Section 8-502 [30-8-502] will preclude any action by Debtor against Beta, whether framed in constructive trust or other theory.

4. Although this section protects entitlement holders against adverse claims, it does not protect them against the risk that their securities intermediary will not itself have sufficient financial assets to satisfy the claims of all of its entitlement holders. Suppose that Customer A holds 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock in an account with her broker, Able & Co. Able in turn holds 1000 shares of XYZ Co. through its account with Clearing Corporation, but has no other positions in XYZ Co. shares, either for other customers or for its own proprietary account. Customer B places an order with Able for the purchase of 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock, and pays the purchase price. Able credits B's account with a 1000 share position in XYZ Co. stock, but Able does not itself buy any additional XYZ Co. shares. Able fails, having only 1000 shares to satisfy the claims of A and B. Unless other insolvency law establishes a different distributional rule, A and B would share the 1000 shares held by Able pro rata, without regard to the time that their respective entitlements were established. See Section 8-503(b) [30-8-503(2)]. Section 8-502 [30-8-502] protects entitlement holders, such as A and B, against adverse claimants. In this case, however, the problem that A and B face is not that someone is trying to take away their entitlements, but that the entitlements are not worth what they thought. The only role that Section 8-502 [30-8-502] plays in this case is to preclude any assertion that A has some form of claim against B by virtue of the fact that Able's establishment of an entitlement in favor of B diluted A's rights to the limited assets held by Able.

30-8-503. Property interest of entitlement holder in financial asset held by securities intermediary.

Official Comment

Official Comment:

1. This section specifies the sense in which a security entitlement is an interest in the property held by the securities intermediary. It expresses the ordinary understanding that securities that a firm holds for its customers are not general assets of the firm subject to the claims of creditors. Since securities intermediaries generally do not segregate securities in such fashion that one could identify particular securities as the ones held for customers, it would not be realistic for this section to state that "customers' securities" are not subject to creditors' claims. Rather subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that to the extent necessary to satisfy all customer claims, all units of that security held by the firm are held for the entitlement holders, are not property of the securities intermediary, and are not subject to creditors' claims, except as otherwise provided in Section 8-511 [30-8-511].

An entitlement holder's property interest under this section is an interest with respect to a specific issue of securities or financial assets. For example, customers of a firm who have positions in XYZ common stock have security entitlements with respect to the XYZ common stock held by the intermediary, while other customers who have positions in ABC common stock have security entitlements with respect to the ABC common stock held by the intermediary.

Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] makes clear that the property interest described in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is an interest held in common by all entitlement holders who have entitlements to a particular security or other financial asset. Temporal factors are irrelevant. One entitlement holder cannot claim that its rights to the assets held by the intermediary are superior to the rights of another entitlement holder by virtue of having acquired those rights before, or after, the other entitlement holder. Nor does it matter whether the intermediary had sufficient assets to satisfy all entitlement holders' claims at one point, but no longer does. Rather, all entitlement holders have a pro rata interest in whatever positions in that financial asset the intermediary holds.

Although this section describes the property interest of entitlement holders in the assets held by the intermediary, it does not necessarily determine how property held by a failed intermediary will be distributed in insolvency proceedings. If the intermediary fails and its affairs are being administered in an insolvency proceeding, the applicable insolvency law governs how the various parties having claims against the firm are treated. For example, the distributional rules for stockbroker liquidation proceedings under the Bankruptcy Code and Securities Investor Protection Act ("SIPA") provide that all customer property is distributed pro rata among all customers in proportion to the dollar value of their total positions, rather than dividing the property on an issue by issue basis. For intermediaries that are not subject to the Bankruptcy Code and SIPA, other insolvency law would determine what distributional rule is applied.

2. Although this section recognizes that the entitlement holders of a securities intermediary have a property interest in the financial assets held by the intermediary, the incidents of this property interest are established by the rules of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], not by common law property concepts. The traditional Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules on certificated securities were based on the idea that a paper certificate could be regarded as a nearly complete reification of the underlying right. The rules on transfer and the consequences of wrongful transfer could then be written using the same basic concepts as the rules for physical chattels. A person's claim of ownership of a certificated security is a right to a specific identifiable physical object, and that right can be asserted against any person who ends up in possession of that physical certificate, unless cut off by the rules protecting purchasers for value without notice. Those concepts do not work for the indirect holding system. A security entitlement is not a claim to a specific identifiable thing; it is a package of rights and interests that a person has against the person's securities intermediary and the property held by the intermediary. The idea that discrete objects might be traced through the hands of different persons has no place in the Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] rules for the indirect holding system. The fundamental principles of the indirect holding system rules are that an entitlement holder's own intermediary has the obligation to see to it that the entitlement holder receives all of the economic and corporate rights that comprise the financial asset, and that the entitlement holder can look only to that intermediary for performance of the obligations. The entitlement holder cannot assert rights directly against other persons, such as other intermediaries through whom the intermediary holds the positions, or third parties to whom the intermediary may have wrongfully transferred interests, except in extremely unusual circumstances where the third party was itself a participant in the wrongdoing. Subsections (c) through (e) [subsections 3 through 5] reflect these fundamental principles.

Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that an entitlement holder's property interest can be enforced against the intermediary only by exercise of the entitlement holder's rights under Sections 8-505 through 8-508 [30-8-505 through 30-8-508]. These are the provisions that set out the duty of an intermediary to see to it that the entitlement holder receives all of the economic and corporate rights that comprise the security. If the intermediary is in insolvency proceedings and can no longer perform in accordance with the ordinary Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules, the applicable insolvency law will determine how the intermediary's assets are to be distributed.

Subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)] specify the limited circumstances in which an entitlement holder's property interest can be asserted against a third person to whom the intermediary transferred a financial asset that was subject to the entitlement holder's claim when held by the intermediary. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides that the property interest of entitlement holders cannot be asserted against any transferee except in the circumstances therein specified. So long as the intermediary is solvent, the entitlement holders must look to the intermediary to satisfy their claims. If the intermediary does not hold financial assets corresponding to the entitlement holders' claims, the intermediary has the duty to acquire them. See Section 8-504 [30-8-504]. Thus, paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (d) [subsections (4)(a), (4)(b), and (4)(c)] specify that the only occasion in which the entitlement holders can pursue transferees is when the intermediary is unable to perform its obligation, and the transfer to the transferee was a violation of those obligations. Even in that case, a transferee who gave value and obtained control is protected by virtue of the rule in subsection (e) [subsection (5)], unless the transferee acted in collusion with the intermediary.

Subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)] have the effect of protecting transferees from an intermediary against adverse claims arising out of assertions by the intermediary's entitlement holders that the intermediary acted wrongfully in transferring the financial assets. These rules, however, operate in a slightly different fashion than traditional adverse claim cut-off rules. Rather than specifying that a certain class of transferee takes free from all claims, subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)] specify the circumstances in which this particular form of claim can be asserted against a transferee. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] also contains general adverse claim cut-off rules for the indirect holding system. See Sections 8-502 and 8-510 [30-8-502 and 30-8-510]. The rule of subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)] takes precedence over the general cut-off rules of those sections, because Section 8-503

[30-8-503] itself defines and sets limits on the assertion of the property interest of entitlement holders. Thus, the question whether entitlement holders' property interest can be asserted as an adverse claim against a transferee from the intermediary is governed by the collusion test of Section 8-503(e) [30-8-503(5)], rather than by the "without notice" test of Sections 8-502 and 8-510 [30-8-502 and 30-8-510].

3. The limitations that subsections (c) through (e) [subsections (3) through (5)] place on the ability of customers of a failed intermediary to recover securities or other financial assets from transferees are consistent with the fundamental policies of investor protection that underlie this Article [chapter] and other bodies of law governing the securities business. The commercial law rules for the securities holding and transfer system must be assessed from the forward-looking perspective of their impact on the vast number of transactions in which no wrongful conduct occurred or will occur, rather than from the post hoc perspective of what rule might be most advantageous to a particular class of persons in litigation that might arise out of the occasional case in which someone has acted wrongfully. Although one can devise hypothetical scenarios where particular customers might find it advantageous to be able to assert rights against someone other than the customers' own intermediary, commercial law rules that permitted customers to do so would impair rather than promote the interest of investors and the safe and efficient operation of the clearance and settlement system. Suppose, for example, that Intermediary A transfers securities to B, that Intermediary A acted wrongfully as against its customers in so doing, and that after the transaction Intermediary A did not have sufficient securities to satisfy its obligations to its entitlement holders. Viewed solely from the standpoint of the customers of Intermediary A, it would seem that permitting the property to be recovered from B, would be good for investors. That, however, is not the case. B may itself be an intermediary with its own customers, or may be some other institution through which individuals invest, such as a pension fund or investment company. There is no reason to think that rules permitting customers of an intermediary to trace and recover securities that their intermediary wrongfully transferred work to the advantage of investors in general. To the contrary, application of such rules would often merely shift losses from one set of investors to another. The uncertainties that would result from rules permitting such recoveries would work to the disadvantage of all participants in the securities markets.

The use of the collusion test in Section 8-503(e) [30-8-503(5)] furthers the interests of investors generally in the sound and efficient operation of the securities holding and settlement system. The effect of the choice of this standard is that customers of a failed intermediary must show that the transferee from whom they seek to recover was affirmatively engaged in wrongful conduct, rather than casting on the transferee any burden of showing that the transferee had no awareness of wrongful conduct by the failed intermediary. The rule of Section 8-503(e) [30-8-503(5)] is based on the long-standing policy that it is undesirable to impose upon purchasers of securities any duty to investigate whether their sellers may be acting wrongfully.

Rather than imposing duties to investigate, the general policy of the commercial law of the securities holding and transfer system has been to eliminate legal rules that might induce participants to conduct investigations of the authority of persons transferring securities on behalf of others for fear that they might be held liable for participating in a wrongful transfer. The rules in Part 4 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 4] concerning transfers by fiduciaries provide a good example. Under Lowry v. Commercial & Farmers' Bank, 15 F.Cas. 1040 (C.C.D.Md.1848) (No. 8581), an issuer could be held liable for wrongful transfer if it registered transfer of securities by a fiduciary under circumstances where it had any reason to believe that the fiduciary may have been acting improperly. In one sense that seems to be advantageous for beneficiaries who might be harmed by wrongful conduct by fiduciaries. The consequence of the Lowry rule, however, was that in order to protect against risk of such liability, issuers developed the practice of requiring extensive documentation for fiduciary stock transfers, making such transfers cumbersome and time consuming. Accordingly, the rules in Part 4 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 4], and in the prior fiduciary transfer statutes, were designed to discourage transfer agents from conducting investigations into the rightfulness of transfers by fiduciaries.

The rules of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] implement for the indirect holding system the same policies that the rules on protected purchasers and registration of transfer adopt for the direct holding system. A securities intermediary is, by definition, a person who is holding securities on behalf of other persons. There is nothing unusual or suspicious about a transaction in which a securities intermediary sells securities that it was holding for its customers. That is exactly what securities intermediaries are in business to do. The interests of customers of securities intermediaries would not be served by a rule that required counterparties to transfers from securities intermediaries to investigate whether the intermediary was acting wrongfully against its customers. Quite the contrary, such a rule would impair the ability of securities intermediaries to perform the function that customers want.

The rules of Section 8-503(c) through (e) [30-8-503(3) through (5)] apply to transferees generally, including pledgees. The reasons for treating pledgees in the same fashion as other transferees are discussed in the Comments to Section 8-511 [30-8-511]. The statement in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] that an intermediary holds financial assets for customers and not as its own property does not, of course, mean that the intermediary lacks power to transfer the financial assets to others. For example, although Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] provides that for a security interest to attach the debtor must have "rights" in the collateral, see Section 9-203 [30-9-203, now repealed, see 30-9A-203], the fact that an intermediary is holding a financial asset in a form that permits ready transfer means that it has such rights, even if the intermediary is acting wrongfully against its entitlement holders in granting the security interest. The question whether the secured party takes subject to the entitlement holder's claim in such a case is governed by Section 8-511 [30-8-511], which is an application to secured transactions of the general principles expressed in subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)] of this section.

30-8-504. Duty of securities intermediary to maintain financial asset.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-504, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section expresses one of the core elements of the relationships for which the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules were designed, to wit, that a securities intermediary undertakes to hold financial assets corresponding to the security entitlements of its entitlement holders. The locution "shall promptly obtain and shall thereafter maintain" is taken from the corresponding regulation under federal securities law, 17 C.F.R. §240.15c3-3. This section recognizes the reality that as the securities business is conducted today, it is not possible to identify particular securities as belonging to customers as distinguished from other particular securities that are the firm's own property. Securities firms typically keep all securities in fungible form, and may maintain their inventory of a particular security in various locations and forms, including physical securities held in vaults or in transit to transfer agents, and book entry positions at one or more clearing corporations. Accordingly, this section states that a securities intermediary shall maintain a quantity of financial assets corresponding to the aggregate of all security entitlements it has established. The last sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides explicitly that the securities intermediary may hold directly or indirectly. That point is implicit in the use of the term "financial asset," inasmuch as Section 8-102(a)(9) [30-8-112(1)(i)] provides that the term "financial asset" may refer either to the underlying asset or the means by which it is held, including both security certificates and security entitlements.

2. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] states explicitly a point that is implicit in the notion that a securities intermediary must maintain financial assets corresponding to the security entitlements of its entitlement holders, to wit, that it is wrongful for a securities intermediary to grant security interests in positions that it needs to satisfy customers' claims, except as authorized by the customers. This statement does not determine the rights of a secured party to whom a securities intermediary wrongfully grants a security interest; that issue is governed by Sections 8-503 and 8-511 [30-8-503 and 30-8-511].

Margin accounts are common examples of arrangements in which an entitlement holder authorizes the securities intermediary to grant security interests in the positions held for the entitlement holder. Securities firms commonly obtain the funds needed to provide margin loans to their customers by "rehypothecating" the customers' securities. In order to facilitate rehypothecation, agreements between margin customers and their brokers commonly authorize the broker to commingle securities of all margin customers for rehypothecation to the lender who provides the financing. Brokers commonly rehypothecate customer securities having a value somewhat greater than the amount of the loan made to the customer, since the lenders who provide the necessary financing to the broker need some cushion of protection against the risk of decline in the value of the rehypothecated securities. The extent and manner in which a firm may rehypothecate customers' securities are determined by the agreement between the intermediary and the entitlement holder and by applicable regulatory law. Current regulations under the federal securities laws require that brokers obtain the explicit consent of customers before pledging customer securities or commingling different customers' securities for pledge. Federal regulations also limit the extent to which a broker may rehypothecate customer securities to 110% of the aggregate amount of the borrowings of all customers.

3. The statement in this section that an intermediary must obtain and maintain financial assets corresponding to the aggregate of all security entitlements it has established is intended only to capture the general point that one of the key elements that distinguishes securities accounts from other relationships, such as deposit accounts, is that the intermediary undertakes to maintain a direct correspondence between the positions it holds and the claims of its customers. This section is not intended as a detailed specification of precisely how the intermediary is to perform this duty, nor whether there may be special circumstances in which an intermediary's general duty is excused. Accordingly, the general statement of the duties of a securities intermediary in this and the following sections is supplemented by two other provisions. First, each of Sections 8-504 through 8-508 [30-8-504 through 30-8-508] contains an "agreement/due care" provision. Second, Section 8-509 [30-8-509] sets out general qualifications on the duties stated in these sections, including the important point that compliance with corresponding regulatory provisions constitutes compliance with the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] duties.

4. The "agreement/due care" provision in subsection (c) [subsection (3)] of this section is necessary to provide sufficient flexibility to accommodate the general duty stated in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] to the wide variety of circumstances that may be encountered in the modern securities holding system. For the most common forms of publicly traded securities, the modern depository-based indirect holding system has made the likelihood of an actual loss of securities remote, though correctable errors in accounting or temporary interruptions of data processing facilities may occur. Indeed, one of the reasons for the evolution of book-entry systems is to eliminate the risk of loss or destruction of physical certificates. There are, however, some forms of securities and other financial assets which must still be held in physical certificated form, with the attendant risk of loss or destruction. Risk of loss or delay may be a more significant consideration in connection with foreign securities. An American securities intermediary may well be willing to hold a foreign security in a securities account for its customer, but the intermediary may have relatively little choice of or control over foreign intermediaries through which the security must in turn be held. Accordingly, it is common for American securities intermediaries to disclaim responsibility for custodial risk of holding through foreign intermediaries.

Subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a)] provides that a securities intermediary satisfies the duty stated in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] if the intermediary acts with respect to that duty in accordance with the agreement between the intermediary and the entitlement holder. Subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)] provides that if there is no agreement on the matter, the intermediary satisfies the subsection (a) [subsection (1)] duty if the intermediary exercises due care in accordance with reasonable commercial standards to obtain and maintain the financial asset in question. This formulation does not state that the intermediary has a universally applicable statutory duty of due care. Section 1-102(3) [30-1-102(3)] provides that statutory duties of due care cannot be disclaimed by agreement, but the "agreement/due care" formula contemplates that there may be particular circumstances where the parties do not wish to create a specific duty of due care, for example, with respect to foreign securities. Under subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a)], compliance with the agreement constitutes satisfaction of the subsection (a) [subsection (1)] duty, whether or not the agreement provides that the intermediary will exercise due care.

In each of the sections where the "agreement/due care" formula is used, it provides that entering into an agreement and performing in accordance with that agreement is a method by which the securities intermediary may satisfy the statutory duty stated in that section. Accordingly, the general obligation of good faith performance of statutory and contract duties, see Sections 1-203 and 8-102(a)(10) [30-1-203 and 30-8-112(1)(j)], would apply to such an agreement. It would not be consistent with the obligation of good faith performance for an agreement to purport to establish the usual sort of arrangement between an intermediary and entitlement holder, yet disclaim altogether one of the basic elements that define that relationship. For example, an agreement stating that an intermediary assumes no responsibilities whatsoever for the safekeeping any of the entitlement holder's securities positions would not be consistent with good faith performance of the intermediary's duty to obtain and maintain financial assets corresponding to the entitlement holder's security entitlements.

To the extent that no agreement under subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a)] has specified the details of the intermediary's performance of the subsection (a) [subsection (1)] duty, subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)] provides that the intermediary satisfies that duty if it exercises due care in accordance with reasonable commercial standards. The duty of care includes both care in the intermediary's own operations and care in the selection of other intermediaries through whom the intermediary holds the assets in question. The statement of the obligation of due care is meant to incorporate the principles of the common law under which the specific actions or precautions necessary to meet the obligation of care are determined by such factors as the nature and value of the property, the customs and practices of the business, and the like.

5. This section necessarily states the duty of a securities intermediary to obtain and maintain financial assets only at the very general and abstract level. For the most part, these matters are specified in great detail by regulatory law. Broker-dealers registered under the federal securities laws are subject to detailed regulation concerning the safeguarding of customer securities. See 17 C.F.R. §240.15c3-3. Section 8-509(a) [30-8-509(1)] provides explicitly that if a securities intermediary complies with such regulatory law, that constitutes compliance with Section 8-503 [30-8-503]. In certain circumstances, these rules permit a firm to be in a position where it temporarily lacks a sufficient quantity of financial assets to satisfy all customer claims. For example, if another firm has failed to make a delivery to the firm in settlement of a trade, the firm is permitted a certain period of time to clear up the problem before it is obligated to obtain the necessary securities from some other source.

6. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] is intended to recognize that there are some circumstances, where the duty to maintain a sufficient quantity of financial assets does not apply because the intermediary is not holding anything on behalf of others. For example, the Options Clearing Corporation is treated as a "securities intermediary" under this Article [chapter], although it does not itself hold options on behalf of its participants. Rather, it becomes the issuer of the options, by virtue of guaranteeing the obligations of participants in the clearing corporation who have written or purchased the options cleared through it. See Section 8-103(e) [30-8-113(5)]. Accordingly, the general duty of an intermediary under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] does not apply, nor would other provisions of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] that depend upon the existence of a requirement that the securities intermediary hold financial assets, such as Sections 8-503 and 8-508 [30-8-503 and 30-8-508].

30-8-505. Duty of securities intermediary with respect to payments and distributions.

Official Comment

Official Comment:

1. One of the core elements of the securities account relationships for which the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules were designed is that the securities intermediary passes through to the entitlement holders the economic benefit of ownership of the financial asset, such as payments and distributions made by the issuer. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] expresses the ordinary understanding that a securities intermediary will take appropriate action to see to it that any payments or distributions made by the issuer are received. One of the main reasons that investors make use of securities intermediaries is to obtain the services of a professional in performing the record-keeping and other functions necessary to ensure that payments and other distributions are received.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] incorporates the same "agreement/due care" formula as the other provisions of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] dealing with the duties of a securities intermediary. See Comment 4 to Section 8-504 [30-8-504]. This formulation permits the parties to specify by agreement what action, if any, the intermediary is to take with respect to the duty to obtain payments and distributions. In the absence of specification by agreement, the intermediary satisfies the duty if the intermediary exercises due care in accordance with reasonable commercial standards. The provisions of Section 8-509 [30-8-509] also apply to the Section 8-505 [30-8-505] duty, so that compliance with applicable regulatory requirements constitutes compliance with the Section 8-505 [30-8-505] duty.

3. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that a securities intermediary is obligated to its entitlement holder for those payments or distributions made by the issuer that are in fact received by the intermediary. It does not deal with the details of the time and manner of payment. Moreover, as with any other monetary obligation, the obligation to pay may be subject to other rights of the obligor, by way of set-off counterclaim or the like. Section 8-509(c) [30-8-509(3)] makes this point explicit.

30-8-506. Duty of securities intermediary to exercise rights as directed by entitlement holder.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-506, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Another of the core elements of the securities account relationships for which the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] rules were designed is that although the intermediary may, by virtue of the structure of the indirect holding system, be the party who has the power to exercise the corporate and other rights that come from holding the security, the intermediary exercises these powers as representative of the entitlement holder rather than at its own discretion. This characteristic is one of the things that distinguishes a securities account from other arrangements where one person holds securities "on behalf of" another, such as the relationship between a mutual fund and its shareholders or a trustee and its beneficiary.

2. The fact that the intermediary exercises the rights of security holding as representative of the entitlement holder does not, of course, preclude the entitlement holder from conferring discretionary authority upon the intermediary. Arrangements are not uncommon in which investors do not wish to have their intermediaries forward proxy materials or other information. Thus, this section provides that the intermediary shall exercise corporate and other rights "if directed to do so" by the entitlement holder. Moreover, as with the other Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] duties, the "agreement/due care" formulation is used in stating how the intermediary is to perform this duty. This section also provides that the intermediary satisfies the duty if it places the entitlement holder in a position to exercise the rights directly. This is to take account of the fact that some of the rights attendant upon ownership of the security, such as rights to bring derivative and other litigation, are far removed from the matters that intermediaries are expected to perform.

3. This section, and the two that follow, deal with the aspects of securities holding that are related to investment decisions. For example, one of the rights of holding a particular security that would fall within the purview of this section would be the right to exercise a conversion right for a convertible security. It is quite common for investors to confer discretionary authority upon another person, such as an investment adviser, with respect to these rights and other investment decisions. Because this section, and the other sections of Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5], all specify that a securities intermediary satisfies the Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] duties if it acts in accordance with the entitlement holder's agreement, there is no inconsistency between the statement of duties of a securities intermediary and these common arrangements.

4. Section 8-509 [30-8-509] also applies to the Section 8-506 [30-8-506] duty, so that compliance with applicable regulatory requirements constitutes compliance with this duty. This is quite important in this context, since the federal securities laws establish a comprehensive system of regulation of the distribution of proxy materials and exercise of voting rights with respect to securities held through brokers and other intermediaries. By virtue of Section 8-509(a) [30-8-509(1)], compliance with such regulatory requirement constitutes compliance with the Section 8-506 [30-8-506] duty.

30-8-507. Duty of securities intermediary to comply with entitlement order.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-507, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] of this section states another aspect of duties of securities intermediaries that make up security entitlements—the securities intermediary's duty to comply with entitlement orders. One of the main reasons for holding securities through securities intermediaries is to enable rapid transfer in settlement of trades. Thus the right to have one's orders for disposition of the security entitlement honored is an inherent part of the relationship. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] states the correlative liability of a securities intermediary for transferring a financial asset from an entitlement holder's account pursuant to an entitlement order that was not effective.

2. The duty to comply with entitlement orders is subject to several qualifications. The intermediary has a duty only with respect to an entitlement order that is in fact originated by the appropriate person. Moreover, the intermediary has a duty only if it has had reasonable opportunity to assure itself that the order is genuine and authorized, and reasonable opportunity to comply with the order. The same "agreement/due care" formula is used in this section as in the other Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] sections on the duties of intermediaries, and the rules of Section 8-509 [30-8-509] apply to the Section 8-507 [30-8-507] duty.

3. Appropriate person is defined in Section 8-107 [30-8-117]. In the usual case, the appropriate person is the entitlement holder, see Section 8-107(a)(3) [30-8-117(1)(c)]. Entitlement holder is defined in Section 8-102(a)(7) [30-8-112(1)(g)] as the person "identified in the records of a securities intermediary as the person having a security entitlement." Thus, the general rule is that an intermediary's duty with respect to entitlement orders runs only to the person with whom the intermediary has established a relationship. One of the basic principles of the indirect holding system is that securities intermediaries owe duties only to their own customers. See also Section 8-115 [30-8-125]. The only situation in which a securities intermediary has a duty to comply with entitlement orders originated by a person other than the person with whom the intermediary established a relationship is covered by Section 8-107(a)(4) and (a)(5) [30-8-117(1)(d) and (1)(e)], which provide that the term "appropriate person" includes the successor or personal representative of a decedent, or the custodian or guardian of a person who lacks capacity. If the entitlement holder is competent, another person does not fall within the defined term "appropriate person" merely by virtue of having power to act as an agent for the entitlement holder. Thus, an intermediary is not required to determine at its peril whether a person who purports to be authorized to act for an entitlement holder is in fact authorized to do so. If an entitlement holder wishes to be able to act through agents, the entitlement holder can establish appropriate arrangements in advance with the securities intermediary.

One important application of this principle is that if an entitlement holder grants a security interest in its security entitlements to a third-party lender, the intermediary owes no duties to the secured party, unless the intermediary has entered into a "control" agreement in which it agrees to act on entitlement orders originated by the secured party. See Section 8-106 [30-8-116]. Even though the security agreement or some other document may give the secured party authority to act as agent for the debtor, that would not make the secured party an "appropriate person" to whom the security intermediary owes duties. If the entitlement holder and securities intermediary have agreed to such a control arrangement, then the intermediary's action in following instructions from the secured party would satisfy the subsection (a) [subsection (1)] duty. Although an agent, such as the secured party in this example, is not an "appropriate person," an entitlement order is "effective" if originated by an authorized person. See Section 8-107(a) and (b) [30-8-117(1) and (2)]. Moreover, Section 8-507(a) [30-8-507(1)] provides that the intermediary satisfies its duty if it acts in accordance with the entitlement holder's agreement.

4. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that an intermediary is liable for a wrongful transfer if the entitlement order was "ineffective." Section 8-107 [30-8-117] specifies whether an entitlement order is effective. An "effective entitlement order" is different from an "entitlement order originated by an appropriate person." An entitlement order is effective under Section 8-107(b) [30-8-117(2)] if it is made by the appropriate person, or by a person who has power to act for the appropriate person under the law of agency, or if the appropriate person has ratified the entitlement order or is precluded from denying its effectiveness. Thus, although a securities intermediary does not have a duty to act on an entitlement order originated by the entitlement holder's agent, the intermediary is not liable for wrongful transfer if it does so.

Subsection (b) [subsection (2)], together with Section 8-107 [30-8-117], has the effect of leaving to other law most of the questions of the sort dealt with by Article 4A [Title 30, chapter 4A] for wire transfers of funds, such as allocation between the securities intermediary and the entitlement holder of the risk of fraudulent entitlement orders.

5. The term entitlement order does not cover all directions that a customer might give a broker concerning securities held through the broker. Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is not a codification of all of the law of customers and stockbrokers. Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] deals with the settlement of securities trades, not the trades. The term entitlement order does not refer to instructions to a broker to make trades, that is, enter into contracts for the purchase or sale of securities. Rather, the entitlement order is the mechanism of transfer for securities held through intermediaries, just as indorsements and instructions are the mechanism for securities held directly. In the ordinary case the customer's direction to the broker to deliver the securities at settlement is implicit in the customer's instruction to the broker to sell. The distinction is, however, significant in that this section has no application to the relationship between the customer and broker with respect to the trade itself. For example, assertions by a customer that it was damaged by a broker's failure to execute a trading order sufficiently rapidly or in the proper manner are not governed by this Article [chapter].

30-8-508. Duty of securities intermediary to change entitlement holder's position to other form of security holding.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-508, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section states another aspect of the duties of securities intermediaries that make up security entitlements—the obligation of the securities intermediary to change an entitlement holder's position into any other form of holding for which the entitlement holder is eligible or to transfer the entitlement holder's position to an account at another intermediary. This section does not state unconditionally that the securities intermediary is obligated to turn over a certificate to the customer or to cause the customer to be registered on the books of the issuer, because the customer may not be eligible to hold the security directly. For example, municipal bonds are now commonly issued in "book-entry only" form, in which the only entity that the issuer will register on its own books is a depository.

If security certificates in registered form are issued for the security, and individuals are eligible to have the security registered in their own name, the entitlement holder can request that the intermediary deliver or cause to be delivered to the entitlement holder a certificate registered in the name of the entitlement holder or a certificate indorsed in blank or specially indorsed to the entitlement holder. If security certificates in bearer form are issued for the security, the entitlement holder can request that the intermediary deliver or cause to be delivered a certificate in bearer form. If the security can be held by individuals directly in uncertificated form, the entitlement holder can request that the security be registered in its name. The specification of this duty does not determine the pricing terms of the agreement in which the duty arises.

2. The same "agreement/due care" formula is used in this section as in the other Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5] sections on the duties of intermediaries. So too, the rules of Section 8-509 [30-8-509] apply to the Section 8-508 [30-8-508] duty.

Official Comment:

This Article [chapter] is not a comprehensive statement of the law governing the relationship between broker-dealers or other securities intermediaries and their customers. Most of the law governing that relationship is the common law of contract and agency, supplemented or supplanted by regulatory law. This Article [chapter] deals only with the most basic commercial/property law principles governing the relationship. Although Sections 8-504 through 8-508 [30-8-504 through 30-8-508] specify certain duties of securities intermediaries to entitlement holders, the point of these sections is to identify what it means to have a security entitlement, not to specify the details of performance of these duties.

For many intermediaries, regulatory law specifies in great detail the intermediary's obligations on such matters as safekeeping of customer property, distribution of proxy materials, and the like. To avoid any conflict between the general statement of duties in this Article [chapter] and the specific statement of intermediaries' obligations in such regulatory schemes, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that compliance with applicable regulation constitutes compliance with the duties specified in Sections 8-504 through 8-508 [30-8-504 through 30-8-508].

30-8-510. Rights of purchaser of security entitlement from entitlement holder.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-510, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section specifies certain rules concerning the rights of persons who purchase interests in security entitlements from entitlement holders. The rules of this section are provided to take account of cases where the purchaser's rights are derivative from the rights of another person who is and continues to be the entitlement holder.

2. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that no adverse claim can be asserted against a purchaser of an interest in a security entitlement if the purchaser gives value, obtains control, and does not have notice of the adverse claim. The primary purpose of this rule is to give adverse claim protection to persons who take security interests in security entitlements and obtain control, but do not themselves become entitlement holders.

The following examples illustrate subsection (a) [subsection (1)]:

Example 1. X steals a certificated bearer bond from Owner. X delivers the certificate to Able & Co. for credit to X's securities account. Later, X borrows from Bank and grants bank a security interest in the security entitlement. Bank obtains control under Section 8-106(d)(2) [30-8-116(4)(b)] by virtue of an agreement in which Able agrees to comply with entitlement orders originated by Bank. X absconds.

Example 2. Same facts as in Example 1, except that Bank does not obtain a control agreement. Instead, Bank perfects by filing a financing statement.

In both of these examples, when X deposited the bonds X acquired a security entitlement under Section 8-501 [30-8-501]. Under other law, Owner may be able to have a constructive trust imposed on the security entitlement as the traceable product of the bonds that X misappropriated. X granted a security interest in that entitlement to Bank. Bank was a purchaser of an interest in the security entitlement from X. In Example 1, although Bank was not a person who acquired a security entitlement from the intermediary, Bank did obtain control. If Bank did not have notice of Owner's claim, Section 8-510(a) [30-8-510(1)] precludes Owner from asserting an adverse claim against Bank. In Example 2, Bank had a perfected security interest, but did not obtain control. Accordingly, Section 8-510(a) [30-8-510(1)] does not preclude Owner from asserting its adverse claim against Bank.

3. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] applies to the indirect holding system a limited version of the "shelter principle." The following example illustrates the relatively limited class of cases for which it may be needed:

Example 3. Thief steals a certificated bearer bond from Owner. Thief delivers the certificate to Able & Co. for credit to Thief's securities account. Able forwards the certificate to a clearing corporation for credit to Able's account. Later Thief instructs Able to sell the positions in the bonds. Able sells to Baker & Co., acting as broker for Buyer. The trade is settled by book-entries in the accounts of Able and Baker at the clearing corporation, and in the accounts of Thief and Buyer at Able and Baker respectively. Owner may be able to reconstruct the trade records to show that settlement occurred in such fashion that the "same bonds" that were carried in Thief's account at Able are traceable into Buyer's account at Baker. Buyer later decides to donate the bonds to Alma Mater University and executes an assignment of its rights as entitlement holder to Alma Mater.

Buyer had a position in the bonds, which Buyer held in the form of a security entitlement against Baker. Buyer then made a gift of the position to Alma Mater. Although Alma Mater is a purchaser, Section 1-201(33) [30-1-201(33)], it did not give value. Thus, Alma Mater is a person who purchased a security entitlement, or an interest therein, from an entitlement holder (Buyer). Buyer was protected against Owner's adverse claim by the Section 8-502 [30-8-502] rule. Thus, by virtue of Section 8-510(b) [30-8-510(2)], Owner is also precluded from asserting an adverse claim against Alma Mater.

4. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] specifies a priority rule for cases where an entitlement holder transfers conflicting interests in the same security entitlement to different purchasers. It follows the same principle as the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] priority rule for investment property, that is, control trumps non-control. Indeed, the most significant category of conflicting "purchasers" may be secured parties. Priority questions for security interests, however, are governed by the rules in Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] applies only to cases not covered by the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] rules. It is intended primarily for disputes over conflicting claims arising out of repurchase agreement transactions that are not covered by the other rules set out in Articles 8 and 9 [Title 30, chapters 8 and 9A].

The following example illustrates subsection (c) [subsection (3)]:

Example 4. Dealer holds securities through an account at Alpha Bank. Alpha Bank in turns holds through a clearing corporation account. Dealer transfers securities to RP1 in a "hold in custody" repo transaction. Dealer then transfers the same securities to RP2 in another repo transaction. The repo to RP2 is implemented by transferring the securities from Dealer's regular account at Alpha Bank to a special account maintained by Alpha Bank for Dealer and RP2. The agreement among Dealer, RP2, and Alpha Bank provides that Dealer can make substitutions for the securities but RP2 can direct Alpha Bank to sell any securities held in the special account. Dealer becomes insolvent. RP1 claims a prior interest in the securities transferred to RP2.

In this example Dealer remained the entitlement holder but agreed that RP2 could initiate entitlement orders to Dealer's security intermediary, Alpha Bank. If RP2 had become the entitlement holder, the adverse claim rule of Section 8-502 [30-8-502] would apply. Even if RP2 does not become the entitlement holder, the arrangement among Dealer, Alpha Bank, and RP2 does suffice to give RP2 control. Thus, under Section 8-510(c) [30-8-510(3)], RP2 has priority over RP1, because RP2 is a purchaser who obtained control, and RP1 is a purchaser who did not obtain control. The same result could be reached under Section 8-510(a) [30-8-510(1)] which provides that RP1's earlier in time interest cannot be asserted as an adverse claim against RP2. The same result would follow under the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] priority rules if the interests of RP1 and RP2 are characterized as "security interests," see Section 9-328(1) [30-9A-328(1)]. The main point of the rules of Section 8-510(c) [30-8-510(3)] is to ensure that there will be clear rules to cover the conflicting claims of RP1 and RP2 without characterizing their interests as Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] security interests.

The priority rules in Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] for conflicting security interests also include a default temporal priority rule for cases where multiple secured parties have obtained control but omitted to specify their respective rights by agreement. See Section 9-328(2) [30-9A-328(2)] and Comment 5 to Section 9-328 [30-9A-328]. Because the purchaser priority rule in Section 8-510(c) [30-8-510(3)] is intended to track the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] priority rules, it too has a temporal priority rule for cases where multiple non-secured party purchasers have obtained control but omitted to specify their respective rights by agreement. The rule is patterned on Section 9-328(2) [30-9A-328(2)].

5. If a securities intermediary itself is a purchaser, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides that it has priority over the interest of another purchaser who has control. Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] contains a similar rule. See Section 9-328(3) [30-9A-328(3)].

Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 305 at beginning inserted "In an action not covered by the priority rules in chapter 9 [renumbered chapter 9A] or the rules stated in subsection (3)"; in (3) at beginning of second sentence inserted exception clause and after "rank" substituted "according to the priority in time of" for "equally, except that"; inserted (3)(a) through (3)(c) outlining priority determination; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

30-8-511. Priority among security interests and entitlement holders.

Official Comment

Source: Section 8-511, U.C.C.

Official Comment:

1. This section sets out priority rules for circumstances in which a securities intermediary fails leaving an insufficient quantity of securities or other financial assets to satisfy the claims of its entitlement holders and the claims of creditors to whom it has granted security interests in financial assets held by it. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that entitlement holders' claims have priority except as otherwise provided in subsection (b) [subsection (2)], and subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that the secured creditor's claim has priority if the secured creditor obtains control, as defined in Section 8-106 [30-8-116]. The following examples illustrate the operation of these rules.

Example 1. Able & Co., a broker, borrows from Alpha Bank and grants Alpha Bank a security interest pursuant to a written agreement which identifies certain securities that are to be collateral for the loan, either specifically or by category. Able holds these securities in a clearing corporation account. Able becomes insolvent and it is discovered that Able holds insufficient securities to satisfy the claims of customers who have paid for securities that they held in accounts with Able and the collateral claims of Alpha Bank. Alpha Bank's security interest in the security entitlements that Able holds through the clearing corporation account may be perfected under the automatic perfection rule of Section 9-115(4)(c) [30-9-115(4)(c), now repealed, see 30-9A-309], but Alpha Bank did not obtain control under Section 8-106 [30-8-116]. Thus, under Section 8-511(a) [30-8-511(1)] the entitlement holders' claims have priority over Alpha Bank's claim.

Example 2. Able & Co., a broker, borrows from Beta Bank and grants Beta Bank a security interest in securities that Able holds in a clearing corporation account. Pursuant to the security agreement, the securities are debited from Alpha's account and credited to Beta's account in the clearing corporation account. Able becomes insolvent and it is discovered that Able holds insufficient securities to satisfy the claims of customers who have paid for securities that they held in accounts with Able and the collateral claims of Alpha Bank. Although the transaction between Able and Beta took the form of an outright transfer on the clearing corporation's books, as between Able and Beta, Able remains the owner and Beta has a security interest. In that respect the situation is no different than if Able had delivered bearer bonds to Beta in pledge to secure a loan. Beta's security interest is perfected, and Beta obtained control. See Sections 8-106 and 9-115 [30-8-116 and 30-9-115, now repealed, see 30-9A-308, 30-9A-309, 30-9A-313, and 30-9A-314]. Under Section 8-511(b) [30-8-511(2)], Beta Bank's security interest has priority over claims of Able's customers.

The result in Example 2 is an application to this particular setting of the general principle expressed in Section 8-503 [30-8-503], and explained in the Comments thereto, that the entitlement holders of a securities intermediary cannot assert rights against third parties to whom the intermediary has wrongfully transferred interests, except in extremely unusual circumstances where the third party was itself a participant in the transferor's wrongdoing. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] the claim of a secured creditor of a securities intermediary has priority over the claims of entitlement holders if the secured creditor has obtained control. If, however, the secured creditor acted in collusion with the intermediary in violating the intermediary's obligation to its entitlement holders, then under Section 8-503(e) [30-8-503(5)], the entitlement holders, through their representative in insolvency proceedings, could recover the interest from the secured creditor, that is, set aside the security interest.

2. The risk that investors who hold through an intermediary will suffer a loss as a result of a wrongful pledge by the intermediary is no different than the risk that the intermediary might fail and not have the securities that it was supposed to be holding on behalf of its customers, either because the securities were never acquired by the intermediary or because the intermediary wrongfully sold securities that should have been kept to satisfy customers' claims. Investors are protected against that risk by the regulatory regimes under which securities intermediaries operate. Intermediaries are required to maintain custody, through clearing corporation accounts or in other approved locations, of their customers' securities and are prohibited from using customers' securities in their own business activities. Securities firms who are carrying both customer and proprietary positions are not permitted to grant blanket liens to lenders covering all securities which they hold, for their own account or for their customers. Rather, securities firms designate specifically which positions they are pledging. Under SEC Rules 8c1 and 15c21, customers' securities can be pledged only to fund loans to customers, and only with the consent of the customers. Customers' securities cannot be pledged for loans for the firm's proprietary business; only proprietary positions can be pledged for proprietary loans. SEC Rule 15c33 implements these prohibitions in a fashion tailored to modern securities firm accounting systems by requiring brokers to maintain a sufficient inventory of securities, free from any liens, to satisfy the claims of all of their customers for fully paid and excess margin securities. Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] mirrors that requirement, specifying in Section 8-504 [30-8-504] that a securities intermediary must maintain a sufficient quantity of investment property to satisfy all security entitlements, and may not grant security interests in the positions it is required to hold for customers, except as authorized by the customers.

If a failed brokerage has violated the customer protection regulations and does not have sufficient securities to satisfy customers' claims, its customers are protected against loss from a shortfall by the Securities Investor Protection Act ("SIPA"). Securities firms required to register as brokers or dealers are also required to become members of the Securities Investor Protection Corporation ("SIPC"), which provides their customers with protection somewhat similar to that provided by FDIC and other deposit insurance programs for bank depositors. When a member firm fails, SIPC is authorized to initiate a liquidation proceeding under the provisions of SIPA. If the assets of the securities firm are insufficient to satisfy all customer claims, SIPA makes contributions to the estate from a fund financed by assessments on its members to protect customers against losses up to $500,000 for cash and securities held at member firms.

Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] is premised on the view that the important policy of protecting investors against the risk of wrongful conduct by their intermediaries is sufficiently treated by other law.

3. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] sets out a special rule for secured financing provided to enable clearing corporations to complete settlement. The reasons that secured financing arrangements are needed in such circumstances are explained in Comment 7 to Section 9-115 [30-9-115, now repealed, see 30-9A-308, 30-9A-309, 30-9A-313, and 30-9A-314]. In order to permit clearing corporations to establish liquidity facilities where necessary to ensure completion of settlement, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides a priority for secured lenders to such clearing corporations. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] does not turn on control because the clearing corporation may be the top tier securities intermediary for the securities pledged, so that there may be no practicable method for conferring control on the lender.

SECURED TRANSACTIONS

Chapter Official Comment

Official Comments to Transition Provisions

[Effective Date — Section 171, Ch. 305, L. 1999]

A uniform law as complex as Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] necessarily gives rise to difficult problems and uncertainties during the transition to the new law. As is customary for uniform laws, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] is based on the general assumption that all States will have enacted substantially identical versions. While always important, uniformity is essential to the success of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. If former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] is in effect in some jurisdictions, and this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] is in effect in others, horrendous complications may arise. For example, the proper place in which to file to perfect a security interest (and thus the status of a particular security interest as perfected or unperfected) would depend on whether the matter was litigated in a State in which former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] was in effect or a State in which this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] was in effect. Accordingly, this section contemplates that States will adopt a uniform effective date for this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. Any one State's failure to adopt the uniform effective date will greatly increase the cost and uncertainty surrounding the transition.

Other problems arise from transactions and relationships that were entered into under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] or under non-UCC law and which remain outstanding on the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. The difficulties arise primarily because this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] expands the scope of former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] to cover additional types of collateral and transactions and because it provides new methods of perfection for some types of collateral, different priority rules, and different choice-of-law rules governing perfection and priority. This Section and the other sections in this Part [not codified] address primarily this second set of problems.

1. Pre-Effective-Date Transactions. Subsection (a) [subsection 1] contains the general rule that this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] applies to transactions, security interests, and other liens within its scope (see Section 9-109 [30-9-129]), even if the transaction or lien was entered into or created before the effective date. Thus, secured transactions entered into under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] must be terminated, completed, consummated, and enforced under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] is an exception to the general rule. It applies to valid, pre-effective-date transactions and liens that were not governed by former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] but would be governed by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] if they had been entered into or created after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], these valid transactions, such as the creation of agricultural liens and security interests in commercial tort claims, retain their validity under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] and may be terminated, completed, consummated, and enforced under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. However, these transactions also may be terminated, completed, consummated, and enforced by the law that otherwise would apply had this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] not taken effect.

2. Judicial Proceedings Commenced Before Effective Date. As is usual in transition provisions, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] does not affect litigation pending on the effective date.

[Security Interest Perfected Before Effective Date — Section 162, Ch. 305, L. 1999]

1. Perfected Security Interests Under Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] and this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. This section deals with security interests that are perfected (i.e., that are enforceable and have priority over the rights of a lien creditor) under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] or other applicable law immediately before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect. Subsection (a) [subsection 1] provides, not surprisingly, that if the security interest would be a perfected security interest under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] (i.e., if the transaction satisfies this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9] requirements for enforceability (attachment) and perfection), no further action need be taken for the security interest to be a perfected security interest.

2. Security Interests Enforceable and Perfected Under Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] but Unenforceable or Unperfected Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] deals with security interests that are enforceable and perfected under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] or other applicable law immediately before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect but do not satisfy the requirements for enforceability (attachment) or perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. Except as otherwise provided in Section 9-705 [sec. 164, Ch. 305, L. 1999], these security interests are perfected security interests for one year after the effective date. If the security interest satisfies the requirements for attachment and perfection within that period, the security interest remains perfected thereafter. If the security interest satisfies only the requirements for attachment within that period, the security interest becomes unperfected at the end of the one-year period.

Example 1: A pre-effective-date security agreement in a consumer transaction covers "all securities accounts." The security interest is properly perfected. The collateral description was adequate under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] (see former Section 9-115(3) [30-9-115(3)]) but is insufficient under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] (see Section 9-108(e)(2) [30-9-128(5)(b)]). Unless the debtor authenticates a new security agreement describing the collateral other than by "type" (or Section 9-203(b)(3) [30-9-213(2)(c)] otherwise is satisfied) within the one-year period following the effective date, the security interest becomes unenforceable at the end of that period.

Other examples under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] or other applicable law that may be effective as attachment or enforceability steps but may be ineffective under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] include an oral agreement to sell a payment intangible or possession by virtue of a notification to a bailee under former Section 9-305 [30-9-305]. Neither the oral agreement nor the notification would satisfy the revised Section 9-203 [30-9-213] requirements for attachment.

Example 2: A pre-effective-date possessory security interest in instruments is perfected by a bailee's receipt of notification under former 9-305 [30-9-305]. The bailee has not, however, acknowledged that it holds for the secured party's benefit under revised Section 9-313 [30-9-333]. Unless the bailee authenticates a record acknowledging that it holds for the secured party (or another appropriate perfection step is taken) within the one-year period following the effective date, the security interest becomes unperfected at the end of that period.

3. Interpretation of Pre-Effective-Date Security Agreements. Section 9-102 [30-9-122] defines "security agreement" as "an agreement that creates or provides for a security interest." Under Section 1-201(3) [30-1-201(3)], an "agreement" is a "bargain of the parties in fact." If parties to a pre-effective-date security agreement describe the collateral by using a term defined in former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] in one way and defined in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] in another way, in most cases it should be presumed that the bargain of the parties contemplated the meaning of the term under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9].

Example 3: A pre-effective-date security agreement covers "all accounts" of a debtor. As defined under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9], an "account" did not include a right to payment for lottery winnings. These rights to payment are "accounts" under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], however. The agreement of the parties presumptively created a security interest in "accounts" as defined in former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9]. A different result might be appropriate, for example, if the security agreement explicitly contemplated future changes in the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] definitions of types of collateral-e.g., "'Accounts' means 'accounts' as defined in the UCC Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] of [State X], as that definition may be amended from time to time." Whether a different approach is appropriate in any given case depends on the bargain of the parties, as determined by applying ordinary principles of contract construction.

[Security Interest Unperfected Before Effective Date — Section 163, C. 305, L. 1999]

This section deals with security interests that are enforceable but unperfected (i.e., subordinate to the rights of a person who becomes a lien creditor) under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] or other applicable law immediately before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect. These security interests remain enforceable for one year after the effective date, and thereafter if the appropriate steps for attachment under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] are taken before the one-year period expires. (This section's treatment of enforceability is the same as that of Section 9-703 [sec. 162, Ch. 305, L. 1999].) The security interest becomes a perfected security interest on the effective date if, at that time, the security interest satisfies the requirements for perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. If the security interest does not satisfy the requirements for perfection until sometime thereafter, it becomes a perfected security interest at that later time.

Example: A security interest has attached under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] but is unperfected because the filed financing statement covers "all of debtor's personal property" and controlling case law in the applicable jurisdiction has determined that this identification of collateral in a financing statement is insufficient. Upon the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], the financing statement becomes sufficient under Section 9-504(2) [30-9-524(2)]. On that date the security interest becomes perfected. (This assumes, of course, that the financing statement is filed in the proper filing office under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9].)

1. General. This section addresses primarily the situation in which the perfection step is taken under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] or other applicable law before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], but the security interest does not attach until after that date.

2. Perfection Other Than by Filing. Subsection (a) [subsection 1] applies when the perfection step is a step other than the filing of a financing statement. If the step that would be a valid perfection step under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] or other law is taken before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect, and if a security interest attaches within one year after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect, then the security interest becomes a perfected security interest upon attachment. However, the security interest becomes unperfected one year after the effective date unless the requirements for attachment and perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] are satisfied within that period.

3. Perfection by Filing: Ineffective Filings Made Effective. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] deals with financing statements that were filed under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] and which would not have perfected a security interest under the former Article [Title 30, chapter 9] (because, e.g., they did not accurately describe the collateral or were filed in the wrong place), but which would perfect a security interest under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], such a financing statement is effective to perfect a security interest to the extent it complies with this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] applies regardless of the reason for the filing. For example, a secured party need not wait until the effective date to respond to the change this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] makes with respect to the jurisdiction whose law governs perfection of certain security interests. Rather, a secured party may wish to prepare for this change by filing a financing statement before the effective date in the jurisdiction whose law governs perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. When this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect, the filing becomes effective to perfect a security interest (assuming the filing satisfies the perfection requirements of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]). Note, however, that Section 9-706 [sec. 165, Ch. 305, L. 1999] determines whether a financing statement filed before the effective date operates to continue the effectiveness of a financing statement filed in another office before the effective date.

4. Perfection by Filing: Change in Applicable Law. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that a financing statement filed in the proper jurisdiction under former Section 9-103 [30-9-103] remains effective for all purposes, despite the fact that Part 3 of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9, part 3] would require filing of a financing statement in a different jurisdiction. This means that, during the early years of this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9] effectiveness, it may be necessary to search the files not only in the jurisdiction whose law governs perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] but also (if different) in the jurisdiction(s) whose law governed perfection under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9]. To limit this burden, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that a financing statement filed in the jurisdiction determined by former Section 9-103 [30-9-103] becomes ineffective at the earlier of the time it would become ineffective under the law of that jurisdiction or June 30, 2006. The June 30, 2006, limitation addresses some nonuniform versions of former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] that extended the effectiveness of a financing statement beyond five years. Note that a financing statement filed before the effective date may remain effective beyond June 30, 2006, if subsection (d) [subsections (3) and (4)] (concerning continuation statements) or (e) [not adopted in Montana] (concerning transmitting utilities) or Section 9-706 [sec. 165, Ch. 305, L. 1999] (concerning initial financing statements that operate to continue pre-effective-date financing statements) so provides.

Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] is an exception to Section 9-703(b) [sec. 162(2), Ch. 305, L. 1999]. Under the general rule in Section 9-703(b) [sec. 162(2), Ch. 305, L. 1999], a security interest that is enforceable and perfected on the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] is a perfected security interest for one year after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect, even if the security interest is not enforceable under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] and the applicable requirements for perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] have not been met. However, in some cases subsection (c) [subsection (3)] may shorten the one-year period of perfection; in others, if the security interest is enforceable under Section 9-203 [30-9-213], it may extend the period of perfection. A financing statement that remains effective under subsection (c) [subsection (3)] may be amended (but generally may not be continued) after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect by filing an amendment in the office where the financing statement was filed.

Example 1: On July 3, 1996, D, a State X corporation, creates a security interest in certain manufacturing equipment located in State Y. On July 6, 1996, SP perfects a security interest in the equipment under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] by filing in the office of the State Y Secretary of State. See former Section 9-103(1)(b) [30-9-103(1)(b)]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect in States X and Y on July 1, 2001. Under Section 9-705(c) [subsection (3)], the financing statement remains effective for the first five days of July, 2001, after which it lapses.

See former Section 9-403 [30-9-403]. Had SP continued the effectiveness of the financing statement by filing a continuation statement in State Y under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] before July 1, 2001, the financing statement would have remained effective to perfect the security interest through June 30, 2006. See subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(a)(ii)]. Alternatively, SP could have filed an initial financing statement in State X under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] or Section 9-706 [sec. 165, Ch. 305, L. 1999] before the State Y financing statement lapsed. Had SP done so, the security interest would have remained perfected without interruption until the State X financing statement lapsed.

5. Continuing Effectiveness of Filed Financing Statement. A financing statement filed before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] may be continued only by filing in the State and office designated by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. This result is accomplished in the following manner: Subsection (d) [subsection (5)(b)] indicates that, as a general matter, a continuation statement filed after the effective date of this Article [July 1, 2001] does not continue the effectiveness of a financing statement filed under the law designated by former Section 9-103 [30-9-103]. Instead, an initial financing statement must be filed under Section 9-706 [sec. 165, Ch. 305, L. 1999]. The second sentence of subsection (d) [subsection (5)] contains an exception to the general rule. It provides that a continuation statement is effective to continue the effectiveness of a financing statement filed before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect if this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] prescribes not only the same jurisdiction but also the same filing office.

Example 2: On November 8, 2000, D, a State X corporation, creates a security interest in certain manufacturing equipment located in State Y. On November 15, 2000, SP perfects a security interest in the equipment under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] by filing in office of the State Y Secretary of State. See former Section 9-103(1)(b) [30-9-103(1)(b)]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect in States X and Y on July 1, 2001. Under Section 9-705(c) [subsection (3)(a)(ii)], the financing statement ceases to be effective in November, 2005, when it lapses. See Section 9-515 [30-9-535]. Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], the law of D's location (State X, see Section 9-307 [30-9-327]) governs perfection. See Section 9-301 [30-9-321]. Thus, the filing of a continuation statement in State Y after the effective date would not continue the effectiveness of the financing statement. See subsection (d) [subsection (4)]. However, the effectiveness of the financing statement could be continued under Section 9-706 [sec. 165, Ch. 305, L. 1999].

Example 3: The facts are as in Example 2, except that D is a State Y corporation. Assume State Y adopted former Section 9-401(1) [30-9-401(1)] (second alternative). State Y law governs perfection under Part 3 of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9, part 3]. (See Sections 9-301, 9-307 [30-9-321, 30-9-327].) Under the second sentence of subsection (d) [subsection (4) (no second sentence)], the timely filing of a continuation statement in accordance with the law of State Y continues the effectiveness of the financing statement.

Example 4: The facts are as in Example 3, except that the collateral is equipment used in farming operations and, in accordance with former Section 9-401(1) [30-9-401(1)] (second alternative) as enacted in State Y, the financing statement was filed in State Y, in the office of the Shelby County Recorder of Deeds. Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], a continuation statement must be filed in the office of the State Y Secretary of State. See Section 9-501(a)(2) [30-9-521(1)(b)]. Under the second sentence of subsection (d) [first sentence of subsection (5)], the timely filing of a continuation statement in accordance with the law of State Y operates to continue a pre-effective-date financing statement only if the continuation statement is filed in the same office as the financing statement. Accordingly, the continuation statement is not effective in this case, but the financing statement may be continued under Section 9-706 [sec. 165, Ch. 305, L. 1999].

Example 5: The facts are as in Example 3, except that State Y enacted former Section 9-401(1) [30-9-401(1)] (third alternative). As required by former Section 9-401(1) [30-9-401(1)], SP filed financing statements in both the office of the State Y Secretary of State and the office of the Shelby County Recorder of Deeds. Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], a continuation statement must be filed in the office of the State Y Secretary of State. See Section 9-501(a)(2) [30-9-521(1)(b)]. The timely filing of a continuation statement in that office after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect would be effective to continue the effectiveness of the financing statement (and thus continue the perfection of the security interest), even if the financing statement filed with the County Recorder lapses.

6. Continuation Statements. In some cases, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] reclassifies collateral covered by a financing statement filed under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9]. For example, collateral consisting of the right to payment for real property sold would be a "general intangible" under the former Article [Title 30, chapter 9] but an "account" under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. To continue perfection under those circumstances, a continuation statement must comply with the normal requirements for a continuation statement. See Section 9-515 [30-9-535]. In addition, the pre-effective-date financing statement and continuation statement, taken together, must satisfy the requirements of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] concerning the sufficiency of the debtor's name, secured party's name, and indication of collateral. See subsection (f) [subsection (7)].

Example 6: A pre-effective-date financing statement covers "all general intangibles" of a debtor. As defined under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9], a "general intangible," would include rights to payment for lottery winnings. These rights to payment are "accounts" under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], however. A post-effective-date continuation statement will not continue the effectiveness of the pre-effective-date financing statement with respect to lottery winnings unless it amends the indication of collateral covered to include lottery winnings (e.g., by adding "accounts," "rights to payment for lottery winnings," or the like). If the continuation statement does not amend the indication of collateral, the continuation statement will be effective to continue the effectiveness of the financing statement only with respect to "general intangibles" as defined in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9].

Example 7: The facts are as in Example 6, except that the pre-effective-date financing statement covers "all accounts and general intangibles." Even though rights to payment for lottery winnings are "general intangibles" under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] and "accounts" under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], a post-effective-date continuation statement would continue the effectiveness of the pre-effective-date financing statement with respect to lottery winnings. There would be no need to amend the indication of collateral covered, inasmuch as the indication ("accounts") satisfies the requirements of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9].

[When Initial Financing Statement Suffices as Continuation Statement — Section 165, Ch. 305, L. 1999]

1. Continuation of Financing Statements Not Filed in Proper Filing Office Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. This section deals with continuing the effectiveness of financing statements that are filed in the proper State and office under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9], but which would be filed in the wrong State or in the wrong office of the proper State under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. Section 9-705(d) [sec. 164(5)(b), Ch. 305, L. 1999] provides that, under these circumstances, filing a continuation statement after the effective date of this Article [July 1, 2001] in the office designated by former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] would not be effective. This section provides the means by which the effectiveness of such a financing statement can be continued if this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] governs perfection under the applicable choice-of-law rule: filing an initial financing statement in the office specified by Section 9-501 [30-9-521].

Although it has the effect of continuing the effectiveness of a pre-effective-date financing statement, an initial financing statement described in this section is not a continuation statement. Rather, it is governed by the rules applicable to initial financing statements. (However, the debtor need not authorize the filing. See Section 9-707 [sec. 166, Ch. 305, L. 1999].) Unlike a continuation statement, the initial financing statement described in this section may be filed any time during the effectiveness of the pre-effective-date financing statement-even before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] is enacted- and not only within the six months immediately prior to lapse. In contrast to a continuation statement, which extends the lapse date of a filed financing statement for five years, the initial financing statement has its own lapse date, which bears no relation to the lapse date of the pre-effective-date financing statement whose effectiveness the initial financing statement continues. See subsection (b) [subsection (2)].

As subsection (a) [subsection (1)] makes clear, the filing of an initial financing statement under this section continues the effectiveness of a pre-effective-date financing statement. If the effectiveness of a pre-effective-date financing statement lapses before the initial financing statement is filed, the effectiveness of the pre-effective-date financing statement cannot be continued. Rather, unless the security interest is perfected otherwise, there will be a period during which the security interest is unperfected before becoming perfected again by the filing of the initial financing statement under this section.

If an initial financing statement is filed under this section before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], it takes effect when this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect (assuming that it is ineffective under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9]). Note, however, that former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] determines whether the filing office is obligated to accept such an initial financing statement. For the reason given in the preceding paragraph, an initial financing statement filed before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] does not continue the effectiveness of a pre-effective-date financing statement unless the latter remains effective on the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. Thus, for example, if the effectiveness of the pre-effective-date financing statement lapses before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect, the initial financing statement would not continue its effectiveness.

2. Requirements of Initial Financing Statement Filed in Lieu of Continuation Statement. Subsection (c) [subsection (2)] sets forth the requirements for the initial financing statement under subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. These requirements are needed to inform searchers that the initial financing statement operates to continue a financing statement filed elsewhere and to enable searchers to locate and discover the attributes of the other financing statement. A single initial financing statement may continue the effectiveness of more than one financing statement filed before this Article's effective date [July 1, 2001]. See Section 1-102(5)(a) [30-1-102(5)(a)] (words in the singular include the plural). If under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] the collateral is of a type different from its type under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9]-as would be the case, e.g., with a right to payment of lottery winnings (a "general intangible" under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] and an "account" under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]), then subsection (c) [subsection (2)(a)] requires that the initial financing statement indicate the type under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9].

[Persons Entitled to File Initial Financing Statement or Continuation of Statement — Section 166, Ch. 305, L. 1999]

This section permits a secured party to file an initial financing statement or continuation statement necessary under this Part [not codified] to continue the effectiveness of a financing statement filed before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect or to perfect or otherwise continue the perfection of a security interest. Because a filing described in this section typically operates to continue the effectiveness of a financing statement whose filing the debtor already has authorized, this section does not require authorization from the debtor.

[Priority — Section 167, Ch. 305, L. 1997]

1. Law Governing Priority. Ordinarily, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] determines the priority of conflicting claims to collateral. However, when the relative priorities of the claims were established before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect, former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] governs.

Example 1: In 1999, SP-1 obtains a security interest in a right to payment for goods sold ("account"). SP-1 fails to file a financing statement. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect on July 1, 2001. Thereafter, on August 1, 2001, D creates a security interest in the same account in favor of SP-2, who files a financing statement. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9] determines the relative priorities of the claims. SP-2's security interest has priority under Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9-342(1)(a)].

Example 2: In 1999, SP-1 obtains a security interest in a right to payment for goods sold ("account"). SP-1 fails to file a financing statement. In 2000, D creates a security interest in the same account in favor of SP-2, who likewise fails to file a financing statement. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect on July 1, 2001. Because the relative priorities of the security interests were established before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] governs priority, and SP-1's security interest has priority under former Section 9-312(5)(b) [30-9-312(5)(b)].

Example 3: The facts are as in Example 2, except that, on August 1, 2001, SP-2 files a proper financing statement under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. Until August 1, 2001, the relative priorities of the security interests were established before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], as in Example 2. However, by taking the affirmative step of filing a financing statement, SP-2 established anew the relative priority of the conflicting claims after the effective date. Thus, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] determines priority. SP-2's security interest has priority under Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9-342(1)(a)].

As Example 3 illustrates, relative priorities that are "established" before the effective date do not necessarily remain unchanged following the effective date. Of course, unlike priority contests among unperfected security interests, some priorities are established permanently, e.g., the rights of a buyer of property who took free of a security interest under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9].

One consequence of the rule in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is that the mere taking effect of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] does not of itself adversely affect the priority of conflicting claims to collateral.

Example 4: In 1999, SP-1 obtains a security interest in a right to payment for lottery winnings (a "general intangible" as defined in former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] but an "account" as defined in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]). SP-1's security interest is unperfected because its filed financing statement covers only "accounts." In 2000, D creates a security interest in the same right to payment in favor of SP-2, who files a financing statement covering "accounts and general intangibles." Before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect on July 1, 2001, SP-2's perfected security interest has priority over SP-1's unperfected security interest under former 9-312(5) [30-9-312(5)]. Because the relative priorities of the security interests were established before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] continues to govern priority after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect. Thus, SP-2's priority is not adversely affected by this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9] having taken effect.

Note that were this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] to govern priority, SP-2 would become subordinated to SP-1 under Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9-342(1)(a)], even though nothing changes other than this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9] having taken effect. Under Section 9-704 [sec. 163, Ch. 305, L. 1999], SP-1's security interest would become perfected; the financing statement covering "accounts" adequately covers the lottery winnings and complies with the other perfection requirements of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], e.g., it is filed in the proper office.

Example 5: In 1999, SP-1 obtains a security interest in a right to payment for lottery winnings-a "general intangible" (as defined under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9]). SP-1's security interest is unperfected because its filed financing statement covers only "accounts." In 2000, D creates a security interest in the same right to payment in favor of SP-2, who makes the same mistake and also files a financing statement covering only "accounts." Before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect on July 1, 2001, SP-1's unperfected security interest has priority over SP-2's unperfected security interest, because SP-1's security interest was the first to attach. See former Section 9-312(5)(b) [30-9-312(5)(b)]. Because the relative priorities of the security interests were established before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] continues to govern priority after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect. Although Section 9-704 [sec. 163, Ch. 305, L. 1999] makes both security interests perfected for purposes of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], both are unperfected under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9], which determines their relative priorities.

2. Financing Statements Ineffective Under Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] but Effective Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. If this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] determines priority, subsection (b) [subsection (2)] may apply. It deals with the case in which a filing that occurs before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] would be ineffective to perfect a security interest under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] but effective under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9]. For purposes of Section 9-322(a) [30-9-342(1)], the priority of a security interest that attaches after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect and is perfected in this manner dates from the time this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect.

Example 6: In 1999, SP-1 obtains a security interest in D's existing and after-acquired instruments and files a financing statement covering "instruments." In 2000, D grants a security interest in its existing and after-acquired accounts in favor of SP-2, who files a financing statement covering "accounts." After this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect on July 1, 2001, one of D's account debtors gives D a negotiable note to evidence its obligation to pay an overdue account. Under the first-to-file-or-perfect rule in Section 9-322(a) [30-9-342(1)], SP-1 would have priority in the instrument, which constitutes SP-2's proceeds. SP-1's filing in 1999 was earlier than SP-2's in 2000. However, subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that, for purposes of Section 9-322(a) [30-9-342(1)], SP-1's priority dates from the time this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect (July 1, 2001). Under Section 9-322(b) [30-9-342(2)], SP-2's priority with respect to the proceeds (instrument) dates from its filing as to the original collateral (accounts). Accordingly, SP-2's security interest would be senior.

Subsection (b) [subsection 2] does not apply to conflicting security interests each of which is perfected by a pre-effective-date filing that was not effective under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9] but is effective under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9].

Example 7: In 1999, SP-1 obtains a security interest in D's existing and after-acquired instruments and files a financing statement covering "instruments." In 2000, D grants a security interest in its existing and after-acquired instruments in favor of SP-2, who files a financing statement covering "instruments." After this Article [Title 30, chapter 9] takes effect on July 1, 2001, one of D's account debtors gives D a negotiable note to evidence its obligation to pay an overdue account. Under the first-to-file-or-perfect rule in Section 9-322(a) [30-9-342(1)], SP-1 would have priority in the instrument. Both filings are effective under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9], see Section 9-705(b) [sec. 164(2), Ch. 305, L. 1999], and SP-1's filing in 1999 was earlier than SP-2's in 2000. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] does not change this result.

Official Comment

1. Source. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] supersedes former Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. As did its predecessor, it provides a comprehensive scheme for the regulation of security interests in personal property and fixtures. For the most part this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] follows the general approach and retains much of the terminology of former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. In addition to describing many aspects of the operation and interpretation of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], these Comments explain the material changes that this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] makes to former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] superseded the wide variety of pre-UCC security devices. Unlike the Comments to former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], however, these Comments dwell very little on the pre-UCC state of the law. For that reason, the Comments to former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] will remain of substantial historical value and interest. They also will remain useful in understanding the background and general conceptual approach of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A].

Citations to "Bankruptcy Code Section" in these Comments are to Title 11 of the United States Code as in effect on December 31, 1998.

2. Background and History. In 1990, the Permanent Editorial Board for the UCC with the support of its sponsors, The American Law Institute and the National Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws, established a committee to study Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] of the UCC. The study committee issued its report as of December 1, 1992, recommending the creation of a drafting committee for the revision of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] and also recommending numerous specific changes to Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. Organized in 1993, a drafting committee met fifteen times from 1993 to 1998. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] was approved by its sponsors in 1998.

3. Reorganization and Renumbering; Captions; Style. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] reflects a substantial reorganization of former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] and renumbering of most sections. New Part 4 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 4] deals with several aspects of third-party rights and duties that are unrelated to perfection and priority. Some of these were covered by Part 3 of former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, part 3, now repealed]. Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5] deals with filing (covered by former Part 4 [Title 30, chapter 9, part 4, now repealed]) and Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] deals with default and enforcement (covered by former Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9, part 5, now repealed]). Appendix I contains conforming revisions to other articles of the UCC, and Appendix II contains model provisions for production-money priority.

This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] also includes headings for the subsections as an aid to readers. Unlike section captions, which are part of the UCC, see Section 1-109 [30-1-109], subsection headings are not a part of the official text itself and have not been approved by the sponsors. Each jurisdiction in which this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] is introduced may consider whether to adopt the headings as a part of the statute and whether to adopt a provision clarifying the effect, if any, to be given to the headings. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] also has been conformed to current style conventions.

4. Summary of Revisions. Following is a brief summary of some of the more significant revisions of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] that are included in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A].

a. Scope of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] expands the scope of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] in several respects.

Deposit accounts. Section 9-109 [30-9A-109] includes within this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] scope deposit accounts as original collateral, except in consumer transactions. Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] dealt with deposit accounts only as proceeds of other collateral.

Sales of payment intangibles and promissory notes. Section 9-109 [30-9A-109] also includes within the scope of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] most sales of "payment intangibles" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] as general intangibles under which an account debtor's principal obligation is monetary) and "promissory notes" (also defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]). Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] included sales of accounts and chattel paper, but not sales of payment intangibles or promissory notes. In its inclusion of sales of payment intangibles and promissory notes, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] continues the drafting convention found in former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]; it provides that the sale of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes creates a "security interest." The definition of "account" in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] also has been expanded to include various rights to payment that were general intangibles under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed].

Health-care-insurance receivables. Section 9-109 [30-9A-109] narrows Article 9's [Title 30, chapter 9A] exclusion of transfers of interests in insurance policies by carving out of the exclusion "health-care-insurance receivables" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]). A health-care-insurance receivable is included within the definition of "account" in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102].

Nonpossessory statutory agricultural liens. Section 9-109 [30-9A-109] also brings nonpossessory statutory agricultural liens within the scope of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A].

Consignments. Section 9-109 [30-9A-109] provides that "true" consignments-bailments for the purpose of sale by the bailee-are security interests covered by Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A], with certain exceptions. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (defining "consignment"). Currently, many consignments are subject to Article 9's [Title 30, chapter 9A] filing requirements by operation of former Section 2-326 [30-2-326].

Supporting obligations and property securing rights to payment. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] also addresses explicitly (i) obligations, such as guaranties and letters of credit, that support payment or performance of collateral such as accounts, chattel paper, and payment intangibles, and (ii) any property (including real property) that secures a right to payment or performance that is subject to an Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] security interest. See Sections 9-203, 9-308 [30-9A-203 and 30-9A-308].

Commercial tort claims. Section 9-109 [30-9A-109] expands the scope of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] to include the assignment of commercial tort claims by narrowing the exclusion of tort claims generally. However, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] continues to exclude tort claims for bodily injury and other non-business tort claims of a natural person. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (defining "commercial tort claim").

Transfers by States and governmental units of States. Section 9-109 [30-9A-109] narrows the exclusion of transfers by States and their governmental units. It excludes only transfers covered by another statute (other than a statute generally applicable to security interests) to the extent the statute governs the creation, perfection, priority, or enforcement of security interests.

Nonassignable general intangibles, promissory notes, health-care-insurance receivables, and letter-of-credit rights. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] enables a security interest to attach to letter-of-credit rights, health-care-insurance receivables, promissory notes, and general intangibles, including contracts, permits, licenses, and franchises, notwithstanding a contractual or statutory prohibition against or limitation on assignment. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] explicitly protects third parties against any adverse effect of the creation or attempted enforcement of the security interest. See Sections 9-408, 9-409 [30-9A-408 and 30-9A-409].

Subject to Sections 9-408 and 9-409 [30-9A-408 and 30-9A-409] and two other exceptions (Sections 9-406 [30-9A-406], concerning accounts, chattel paper, and payment intangibles, and 9-407 [30-9A-407], concerning interests in leased goods), Section 9-401 [30-9A-401] establishes a baseline rule that the inclusion of transactions and collateral within the scope of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] has no effect on non-Article 9 [non-Title 30, chapter 9A] law dealing with the alienability or inalienability of property. For example, if a commercial tort claim is nonassignable under other applicable law, the fact that a security interest in the claim is within the scope of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not override the other applicable law's effective prohibition of assignment.

b. Duties of Secured Party. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] provides for expanded duties of secured parties.

Release of control. Section 9-208 [30-9A-208] imposes upon a secured party having control of a deposit account, investment property, or a letter-of-credit right the duty to release control when there is no secured obligation and no commitment to give value. Section 9-209 [30-9A-209] contains analogous provisions when an account debtor has been notified to pay a secured party.

Information. Section 9-210 [30-9A-210] expands a secured party's duties to provide the debtor with information concerning collateral and the obligations that it secures.

Default and enforcement. Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] also includes some additional duties of secured parties in connection with default and enforcement. See, e.g., Section 9-616 [30-9A-616] (duty to explain calculation of deficiency or surplus in a consumer-goods transaction).

c. Choice of Law. The choice-of-law rules for the law governing perfection, the effect of perfection or nonperfection, and priority are found in Part 3, Subpart 1 (Sections 9-301 through 9-307 [30-9A-301 through 30-9A-307]). See also Section 9-316 [30-9A-316].

Where to file: Location of debtor. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] changes the choice-of-law rule governing perfection (i.e., where to file) for most collateral to the law of the jurisdiction where the debtor is located. See Section 9-301 [30-9A-301]. Under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], the jurisdiction of the debtor's location governed only perfection and priority of a security interest in accounts, general intangibles, mobile goods, and, for purposes of perfection by filing, chattel paper and investment property.

Determining debtor's location. As a baseline rule, Section 9-307 [30-9A-307] follows former Section 9-103 [30-9-103, now repealed, see 30-9A-307], under which the location of the debtor is the debtor's place of business (or chief executive office, if the debtor has more than one place of business). Section 9-307 [30-9A-307] contains three major exceptions. First, a "registered organization," such as a corporation or limited liability company, is located in the State under whose law the debtor is organized, e.g., a corporate debtor's State of incorporation. Second, an individual debtor is located at his or her principal residence. Third, there are special rules for determining the location of the United States and registered organizations organized under the law of the United States.

Location of non-U.S. debtors. If, applying the foregoing rules, a debtor is located in a jurisdiction whose law does not require public notice as a condition of perfection of a nonpossessory security interest, the entity is deemed located in the District of Columbia. See Section 9-307 [30-9A-307]. Thus, to the extent that this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] applies to non-U.S. debtors, perfection could be accomplished in many cases by a domestic filing.

Priority. For tangible collateral such as goods and instruments, Section 9-301 [30-9A-301] provides that the law applicable to priority and the effect of perfection or nonperfection will remain the law of the jurisdiction where the collateral is located, as under former Section 9-103 [30-9-103, now repealed, see 30-9A-301] (but without the confusing "last event" test). For intangible collateral, such as accounts, the applicable law for priority will be that of the jurisdiction in which the debtor is located.

Possessory security interests; agricultural liens. Perfection, the effect of perfection or nonperfection, and priority of a possessory security interest or an agricultural lien are governed by the law of the jurisdiction where the collateral subject to the security interest or lien is located. See Sections 9-301, 9-302 [30-9A-301 and 30-9A-302].

Goods covered by certificates of title; deposit accounts; letter-of-credit rights; investment property. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] includes several refinements to the treatment of choice-of-law matters for goods covered by certificates of title. See Section 9-303 [30-9A-303]. It also provides special choice-of-law rules, similar to those for investment property under current Articles 8 and 9 [Title 30, chapters 8 and 9A], for deposit accounts (Section 9-304 [30-9A-304]), investment property (Section 9-305 [30-9A-305]), and letter-of-credit rights (Section 9-306 [30-9A-306]).

Change in applicable law. Section 9-316 [30-9A-316] addresses perfection following a change in applicable law.

d. Perfection. The rules governing perfection of security interests and agricultural liens are found in Part 3, Subpart 2 (Sections 9-308 through 9-316 [30-9A-308 through 30-9A-316]).

Deposit accounts; letter-of-credit rights. With certain exceptions, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] provides that a security interest in a deposit account or a letter-of-credit right may be perfected only by the secured party's acquiring "control" of the deposit account or letter-of-credit right. See Sections 9-312, 9-314 [30-9A-312 and 30-9A-314]. Under Section 9-104 [30-9A-104], a secured party has "control" of a deposit account when, with the consent of the debtor, the secured party obtains the depositary bank's agreement to act on the secured party's instructions (including when the secured party becomes the account holder) or when the secured party is itself the depositary bank. The control requirements are patterned on Section 8-106 [30-8-116], which specifies the requirements for control of investment property. Under Section 9-107 [30-9A-107], "control" of a letter-of-credit right occurs when the issuer or nominated person consents to an assignment of proceeds under Section 5-114 [30-5-134].

Electronic chattel paper. Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] includes a new defined term: "electronic chattel paper." Electronic chattel paper is a record or records consisting of information stored in an electronic medium (i.e., it is not written). Perfection of a security interest in electronic chattel paper may be by control or filing. See Sections 9-105 [30-9A-105] (sui generis definition of control of electronic chattel paper), 9-312 [30-9A-312] (perfection by filing), 9-314 [30-9A-314] (perfection by control).

Investment property. The perfection requirements for "investment property" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]), including perfection by control under Section 9-106 [30-9A-106], remain substantially unchanged. However, a new provision in Section 9-314 [30-9A-314] is designed to ensure that a secured party retains control in "repledge" transactions that are typical in the securities markets.

Instruments, agricultural liens, and commercial tort claims. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] expands the types of collateral in which a security interest may be perfected by filing to include instruments. See Section 9-312 [30-9A-312]. Agricultural liens and security interests in commercial tort claims also are perfected by filing, under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. See Sections 9-308, 9-310 [30-9A-308 and 30-9A-310].

Sales of payment intangibles and promissory notes. Although former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] covered the outright sale of accounts and chattel paper, sales of most other types of receivables also are financing transactions to which Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] should apply. Accordingly, Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] expands the definition of "account" to include many types of receivables (including "health-care-insurance receivables," defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]) that former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] classified as "general intangibles." It thereby subjects to Article 9's [Title 30, chapter 9A] filing system sales of more types of receivables than did former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. Certain sales of payment intangibles-primarily bank loan participation transactions-should not be subject to the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] filing rules. These transactions fall in a residual category of collateral, "payment intangibles" (general intangibles under which the account debtor's principal obligation is monetary), the sale of which is exempt from the filing requirements of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. See Sections 9-102, 9-109, 9-309 [30-9A-102, 30-9A-109, and 30-9A-309] (perfection upon attachment). The perfection rules for sales of promissory notes are the same as those for sales of payment intangibles.

Possessory security interests. Several provisions of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] address aspects of security interests involving a secured party or a third party who is in possession of the collateral. In particular, Section 9-313 [30-9A-313] resolves a number of uncertainties under former Section 9-305 [30-9A-305]. It provides that a security interest in collateral in the possession of a third party is perfected when the third party acknowledges in an authenticated record that it holds for the secured party's benefit. Section 9-313 [30-9A-313] also provides that a third party need not so acknowledge and that its acknowledgment does not impose any duties on it, unless it otherwise agrees. A special rule in Section 9-313 [30-9A-313] provides that if a secured party already is in possession of collateral, its security interest remains perfected by possession if it delivers the collateral to a third party and the collateral is accompanied by instructions to hold it for the secured party or to redeliver it to the secured party. Section 9-313 [30-9A-313] also clarifies the limited circumstances under which a security interest in goods covered by a certificate of title may be perfected by the secured party's taking possession.

Automatic perfection. Section 9-309 [30-9A-309] lists various types of security interests as to which no public-notice step is required for perfection (e.g., purchase-money security interests in consumer goods other than automobiles). This automatic perfection also extends to a transfer of a health-care-insurance receivable to a health-care provider. Those transfers normally will be made by natural persons who receive health-care services; there is little value in requiring filing for perfection in that context. Automatic perfection also applies to security interests created by sales of payment intangibles and promissory notes. Section 9-308 [30-9A-308] provides that a perfected security interest in collateral supported by a "supporting obligation" (such as an account supported by a guaranty) also is a perfected security interest in the supporting obligation, and that a perfected security interest in an obligation secured by a security interest or lien on property (e.g., a real-property mortgage) also is a perfected security interest in the security interest or lien.

e. Priority; Special Rules for Banks and Deposit Accounts. The rules governing priority of security interests and agricultural liens are found in Part 3, Subpart 3 (Sections 9-317 through 9-342 [30-9A-317 through 30-9A-342]). This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] includes several new priority rules and some special rules relating to banks and deposit accounts (Sections 9-340 through 9-342 [30-9A-340 through 30-9A-342]).

Purchase-money security interests: General; consumer-goods transactions; inventory. Section 9-103 [30-9A-103] substantially rewrites the definition of purchase-money security interest (PMSI) (although the term is not formally "defined"). The substantive changes, however, apply only to non-consumer-goods transactions. (Consumer transactions and consumer-goods transactions are discussed below in Comment 4.j.) For non-consumer-goods transactions, Section 9-103 [30-9A-103] makes clear that a security interest in collateral may be (to some extent) both a PMSI as well as a non-PMSI, in accord with the "dual status" rule applied by some courts under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] (thereby rejecting the "transformation" rule). The definition provides an even broader conception of a PMSI in inventory, yielding a result that accords with private agreements entered into in response to the uncertainty under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. It also treats consignments as purchase-money security interests in inventory. Section 9-324 [30-9A-324] revises the PMSI priority rules, but for the most part without material change in substance. Section 9-324 [30-9A-324] also clarifies the priority rules for competing PMSIs in the same collateral.

Purchase-money security interests in livestock; agricultural liens. Section 9-324 [30-9A-324] provides a special PMSI priority, similar to the inventory PMSI priority rule, for livestock. Section 9-322 [30-9A-322] (which contains the baseline first-to-file-or-perfect priority rule) also recognizes special non-Article 9 [non-Title 30, chapter 9A] priority rules for agricultural liens, which can override the baseline first-in-time rule.

Purchase-money security interests in software. Section 9-324 [30-9A-324] contains a new priority rule for a software purchase-money security interest. (Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] includes a definition of "software.") Under Section 9-103 [30-9A-103], a software PMSI includes a PMSI in software that is used in goods that are also subject to a PMSI. (Note also that the definition of "chattel paper" has been expanded to include records that evidence a monetary obligation and a security interest in specific goods and software used in the goods.)

Investment property. The priority rules for investment property are substantially similar to the priority rules found in former Section 9-115 [30-9-115, now repealed, see 30-9A-106, 30-9A-203, 30-9A-308, 30-9A-309, 30-9A-313, 30-9A-314, and 30-9A-328], which was added in conjunction with the 1994 revisions to UCC Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Under Section 9-328 [30-9A-328], if a secured party has control of investment property (Sections 8-106, 9-106 [30-8-116, 30-9A-106]), its security interest is senior to a security interest perfected in another manner (e.g., by filing). Also under Section 9-328 [30-9A-328], security interests perfected by control generally rank according to the time that control is obtained or, in the case of a security entitlement or a commodity contract carried in a commodity account, the time when the control arrangement is entered into. This is a change from former Section 9-115 [30-9-115, now repealed, see 30-9A-314], under which the security interests ranked equally. However, as between a securities intermediary's security interest in a security entitlement that it maintains for the debtor and a security interest held by another secured party, the securities intermediary's security interest is senior.

Deposit accounts. This Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] priority rules applicable to deposit accounts are found in Section 9-327 [30-9A-327]. They are patterned on and are similar to those for investment property in former Section 9-115 [30-9-115, now repealed, see 30-9A-327] and Section 9-328 [30-9A-328] of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Under Section 9-327 [30-9A-327], if a secured party has control of a deposit account, its security interest is senior to a security interest perfected in another manner (i.e., as cash proceeds). Also under Section 9-327 [30-9A-327], security interests perfected by control rank according to the time that control is obtained, but as between a depositary bank's security interest and one held by another secured party, the depositary bank's security interest is senior. A corresponding rule in Section 9-340 [30-9A-340] makes a depositary bank's right of set-off generally senior to a security interest held by another secured party. However, if the other secured party becomes the depositary bank's customer with respect to the deposit account, then its security interest is senior to the depositary bank's security interest and right of set-off. Sections 9-327, 9-340 [30-9A-327 and 30-9A-340].

Letter-of-credit rights. The priority rules for security interests in letter-of-credit rights are found in Section 9-329 [30-9A-329]. They are somewhat analogous to those for deposit accounts. A security interest perfected by control has priority over one perfected in another manner (i.e., as a supporting obligation for the collateral in which a security interest is perfected). Security interests in a letter-of-credit right perfected by control rank according to the time that control is obtained. However, the rights of a transferee beneficiary or a nominated person are independent and superior to the extent provided in Section 5-114 [30-5-134]. See Section 9-109(c)(4) [30-9A-102(3)(d), now repealed, see 30-9A-102].

Chattel paper and instruments. Section 9-330 [30-9A-330] is the successor to former Section 9-308 [30-9-308, now repealed, see 30-9A-330]. As under former Section 9-308 [30-9-308, now repealed, see 30-9A-330], differing priority rules apply to purchasers of chattel paper who give new value and take possession (or, in the case of electronic chattel paper, obtain control) of the collateral depending on whether a conflicting security interest in the collateral is claimed merely as proceeds. The principal change relates to the role of knowledge and the effect of an indication of a previous assignment of the collateral. Section 9-330 [30-9A-330] also affords priority to purchasers of instruments who take possession in good faith and without knowledge that the purchase violates the rights of the competing secured party. In addition, to qualify for priority, purchasers of chattel paper, but not of instruments, must purchase in the ordinary course of business.

Proceeds. Section 9-322 [30-9A-322] contains new priority rules that clarify when a special priority of a security interest in collateral continues or does not continue with respect to proceeds of the collateral. Other refinements to the priority rules for proceeds are included in Sections 9-324 [30-9A-324] (purchase-money security interest priority) and 9-330 [30-9A-330] (priority of certain purchasers of chattel paper and instruments).

Miscellaneous priority provisions. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] also includes (i) clarifications of selected good-faith-purchase and similar issues (Sections 9-317, 9-331 [30-9A-317 and 30-9A-331]); (ii) new priority rules to deal with the "double debtor" problem arising when a debtor creates a security interest in collateral acquired by the debtor subject to a security interest created by another person (Section 9-325 [30-9A-325]); (iii) new priority rules to deal with the problems created when a change in corporate structure or the like results in a new entity that has become bound by the original debtor's after-acquired property agreement (Section 9-326 [30-9A-326]); (iv) a provision enabling most transferees of funds from a deposit account or money to take free of a security interest (Section 9-332 [30-9A-332]); (v) substantially rewritten and refined priority rules dealing with accessions and commingled goods (Sections 9-335, 9-336 [30-9A-335 and 30-9A-336]); (vi) revised priority rules for security interests in goods covered by a certificate of title (Section 9-337 [30-9A-337]); and (vii) provisions designed to ensure that security interests in deposit accounts will not extend to most transferees of funds on deposit or payees from deposit accounts and will not otherwise "clog" the payments system (Sections 9-341, 9-342 [30-9A-341 and 30-9A-342]).

Model provisions relating to production-money security interests. Appendix II to this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] contains model definitions and priority rules relating to "production-money security interests" held by secured parties who give new value used in the production of crops. Because no consensus emerged on the wisdom of these provisions during the drafting process, the sponsors make no recommendation on whether these model provisions should be enacted.

f. Proceeds. Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] contains an expanded definition of "proceeds" of collateral which includes additional rights and property that arise out of collateral, such as distributions on account of collateral and claims arising out of the loss or nonconformity of, defects in, or damage to collateral. The term also includes collections on account of "supporting obligations," such as guarantees.

g. Part 4 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 4]: Additional Provisions Relating to Third-Party Rights. New Part 4 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 4] contains several provisions relating to the relationships between certain third parties and the parties to secured transactions. It contains new Sections 9-401 [30-9A-401] (replacing former Section 9-311) [30-9-311, now repealed, see 30-9A-401] (alienability of debtor's rights), 9-402 [30-9A-402] (replacing former Section 9-317 [30-9-317, now repealed, see 30-9A-402]) (secured party not obligated on debtor's contracts), 9-403 [30-9A-403] (replacing former Section 9-206) [30-9-206, now repealed, see 30-9A-403] (agreement not to assert defenses against assignee), 9-404, 9-405, and 9-406 [30-9A-404, 30-9A-405, and 30-9A-406] (replacing former Section 9-318 [30-9-318, now repealed, see 30-9A-404 through 30-9A-406]) (rights acquired by assignee, modification of assigned contract, discharge of account debtor, restrictions on assignment of account, chattel paper, promissory note, or payment intangible ineffective), 9-407 [30-9A-407] (replacing some provisions of former Section 2A-303 [30-2A-303]) (restrictions on creation or enforcement of security interest in leasehold interest or lessor's residual interest ineffective). It also contains new Sections 9-408 [30-9A-408] (restrictions on assignment of promissory notes, health-care-insurance receivables ineffective, and certain general intangibles ineffective) and 9-409 [30-9A-409] (restrictions on assignment of letter-of-credit rights ineffective), which are discussed above.

h. Filing. Part 5 (formerly Part 4 [Title 30, chapter 9, part 4, now repealed]) of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5] has been substantially rewritten to simplify the statutory text and to deal with numerous problems of interpretation and implementation that have arisen over the years.

Medium-neutrality. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] is "medium-neutral"; that is, it makes clear that parties may file and otherwise communicate with a filing office by means of records communicated and stored in media other than on paper.

Identity of person who files a record; authorization. Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5] is largely indifferent as to the person who effects a filing. Instead, it addresses whose authorization is necessary for a person to file a record with a filing office. The filing scheme does not contemplate that the identity of a "filer" will be a part of the searchable records. This approach is consistent with, and a necessary aspect of, eliminating signatures or other evidence of authorization from the system (except to the extent that filing offices may choose to employ authentication procedures in connection with electronic communications). As long as the appropriate person authorizes the filing, or, in the case of a termination statement, the debtor is entitled to the termination, it is largely insignificant whether the secured party or another person files any given record.

Section 9-509 [30-9A-509] collects in one place most of the rules that determine when a record may be filed. In general, the debtor's authorization is required for the filing of an initial financing statement or an amendment that adds collateral. With one further exception, a secured party of record's authorization is required for the filing of other amendments. The exception arises if a secured party has failed to provide a termination statement that is required because there is no outstanding secured obligation or commitment to give value. In that situation, a debtor is authorized to file a termination statement indicating that it has been filed by the debtor.

Financing statement formal requisites. The formal requisites for a financing statement are set out in Section 9-502 [30-9A-502]. A financing statement must provide the name of the debtor and the secured party and an indication of the collateral that it covers. Sections 9-503 and 9-506 [30-9A-503 and 30-9A-506] address the sufficiency of a name provided on a financing statement and clarify when a debtor's name is correct and when an incorrect name is insufficient. Section 9-504 [30-9A-504] addresses the indication of collateral covered. Under Section 9-504 [30-9A-504], a super-generic description (e.g.,"all assets" or "all personal property") in a financing statement is a sufficient indication of the collateral. (Note, however, that a super-generic description is inadequate for purposes of a security agreement. See Sections 9-108, 9-203 [30-9A-108 and 30-9A-203].) To facilitate electronic filing, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not require that the debtor's signature or other authorization appear on a financing statement. Instead, it prohibits the filing of unauthorized financing statements and imposes liability upon those who violate the prohibition. See Sections 9-509, 9-626 [30-9A-509 and 30-9A-626].

Filing-office operations. Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5] contains several provisions governing filing operations. First, it prohibits the filing office from rejecting an initial financing statement or other record for a reason other than one of the few that are specified. See Sections 9-520, 9-516 [30-9A-520 and 30-9A-516]. Second, the filing office is obliged to link all subsequent records (e.g., assignments, continuation statements, etc.) to the initial financing statement to which they relate. See Section 9-519 [30-9A-519]. Third, the filing office may delete a financing statement and related records from the files no earlier than one year after lapse (lapse normally is five years after the filing date), and then only if a continuation statement has not been filed. See Sections 9-515, 9-519, 9-522 [30-9A-515, 30-9A-519, and 30-9A-522]. Thus, a financing statement and related records would be discovered by a search of the files even after the filing of a termination statement. This approach helps eliminate filing-office discretion and also eases problems associated with multiple secured parties and multiple partial assignments. Fourth, Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5] mandates performance standards for filing offices. See Sections 9-519, 9-520, 9-523 [30-9A-519, 30-9A-520, and 30-9A-523]. Fifth, it provides for the promulgation of filing-office rules to deal with details best left out of the statute and requires the filing office to submit periodic reports. See Sections 9-526, 9-527 [30-9A-526 and 30-9A-527].

Correction of records: Defaulting or missing secured parties and fraudulent filings. In some areas of the country, serious problems have arisen from fraudulent financing statements that are filed against public officials and other persons. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] addresses the fraud problem by providing the opportunity for a debtor to file a termination statement when a secured party wrongfully refuses or fails to provide a termination statement. See Section 9-509 [30-9A-509]. This opportunity also addresses the problem of secured parties that simply disappear through mergers or liquidations. In addition, Section 9-518 [30-9A-518] affords a statutory method by which a debtor who believes that a filed record is inaccurate or was wrongfully filed may indicate that fact in the files by filing a correction statement, albeit without affecting the efficacy, if any, of the challenged record.

Extended period of effectiveness for certain financing statements. Section 9-515 [30-9A-515] contains an exception to the usual rule that financing statements are effective for five years unless a continuation statement is filed to continue the effectiveness for another five years. Under that section, an initial financing statement filed in connection with a "public-finance transaction" or a "manufactured-home transaction" (terms defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]) is effective for 30 years.

National form of financing statement and related forms. Section 9-521 [30-9A-521] provides for uniform, national written forms of financing statements and related written records that must be accepted by a filing office that accepts written records.

i. Default and Enforcement. Part 6 of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] extensively revises former Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9, part 5, now repealed]. Provisions relating to enforcement of consumer-goods transactions and consumer transactions are discussed in Comment 4.j.

Debtor, secondary obligor; waiver. Section 9-602 [30-9A-602] clarifies the identity of persons who have rights and persons to whom a secured party owes specified duties under Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. Under that section, the rights and duties are enjoyed by and run to the "debtor," defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] to mean any person with a non-lien property interest in collateral, and to any "obligor." However, with one exception (Section 9-616 [30-9A-616], as it relates to a consumer obligor), the rights and duties concerned affect non-debtor obligors only if they are "secondary obligors." "Secondary obligor" is defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] to include one who is secondarily obligated on the secured obligation, e.g., a guarantor, or one who has a right of recourse against the debtor or another obligor with respect to an obligation secured by collateral. However, under Section 9-628 [30-9A-628], the secured party is relieved from any duty or liability to any person unless the secured party knows that the person is a debtor or obligor. Resolving an issue on which courts disagreed under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] generally prohibits waiver by a secondary obligor of its rights and a secured party's duties under Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. See Section 9-602 [30-9A-602]. However, Section 9-624 [30-9A-624] permits a secondary obligor or debtor to waive the right to notification of disposition of collateral and, in a non-consumer transaction, the right to redeem collateral, if the secondary obligor or debtor agrees to do so after default.

Rights of collection and enforcement of collateral. Section 9-607 [30-9A-607] explains in greater detail than former 9-502 [30-9-502, now repealed, see 30-9A-607 and 30-9A-608] the rights of a secured party who seeks to collect or enforce collateral, including accounts, chattel paper, and payment intangibles. It also sets forth the enforcement rights of a depositary bank holding a security interest in a deposit account maintained with the depositary bank. Section 9-607 [30-9A-607] relates solely to the rights of a secured party vis-a-vis a debtor with respect to collections and enforcement. It does not affect the rights or duties of third parties, such as account debtors on collateral, which are addressed elsewhere (e.g., Section 9-406 [30-9A-406]). Section 9-608 [30-9A-608] clarifies the manner in which proceeds of collection or enforcement are to be applied.

Disposition of collateral: Warranties of title. Section 9-610 [30-9A-610] imposes on a secured party who disposes of collateral the warranties of title, quiet possession, and the like that are otherwise applicable under other law. It also provides rules for the exclusion or modification of those warranties.

Disposition of collateral: Notification, application of proceeds, surplus and deficiency, other effects. Section 9-611 [30-9A-611] requires a secured party to give notification of a disposition of collateral to other secured parties and lienholders who have filed financing statements against the debtor covering the collateral. (That duty was eliminated by the 1972 revisions to Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed].) However, that section relieves the secured party from that duty when the secured party undertakes a search of the records and a report of the results is unreasonably delayed. Section 9-613 [30-9A-613], which applies only to non-consumer transactions, specifies the contents of a sufficient notification of disposition and provides that a notification sent 10 days or more before the earliest time for disposition is sent within a reasonable time. Section 9-615 [30-9A-615] addresses the application of proceeds of disposition, the entitlement of a debtor to any surplus, and the liability of an obligor for any deficiency. Section 9-619 [30-9A-619] clarifies the effects of a disposition by a secured party, including the rights of transferees of the collateral.

Rights and duties of secondary obligor. Section 9-618 [30-9A-618] provides that a secondary obligor obtains the rights and assumes the duties of a secured party if the secondary obligor receives an assignment of a secured obligation, agrees to assume the secured party's rights and duties upon a transfer to it of collateral, or becomes subrogated to the rights of the secured party with respect to the collateral. The assumption, transfer, or subrogation is not a disposition of collateral under Section 9-610 [30-9A-610], but it does relieve the former secured party of further duties. Former Section 9-504(5) [30-9-504(5), now repealed, see 30-9A-618] did not address whether a secured party was relieved of its duties in this situation.

Transfer of record or legal title. Section 9-619 [30-9A-619] contains a new provision making clear that a transfer of record or legal title to a secured party is not of itself a disposition under Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. This rule applies regardless of the circumstances under which the transfer of title occurs.

Strict foreclosure. Section 9-620 [30-9A-620], unlike former Section 9-505 [30-9-505, now repealed, see 30-9A-620, 30-9A-621, and 30-9A-624], permits a secured party to accept collateral in partial satisfaction, as well as full satisfaction, of the obligations secured. This right of strict foreclosure extends to intangible as well as tangible property. Section 9-622 [30-9A-622] clarifies the effects of an acceptance of collateral on the rights of junior claimants. It rejects the approach taken by some courts-deeming a secured party to have constructively retained collateral in satisfaction of the secured obligations-in the case of a secured party's unreasonable delay in the disposition of collateral. Instead, unreasonable delay is relevant when determining whether a disposition under Section 9-610 [30-9A-610] is commercially reasonable.

Effect of noncompliance: "Rebuttable presumption" test. Section 9-626 [30-9A-626] adopts the "rebuttable presumption" test for the failure of a secured party to proceed in accordance with certain provisions of Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. (As discussed in Comment 4.j., the test does not necessarily apply to consumer transactions.) Under this approach, the deficiency claim of a noncomplying secured party is calculated by crediting the obligor with the greater of the actual net proceeds of a disposition and the amount of net proceeds that would have been realized if the disposition had been conducted in accordance with Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] (e.g., in a commercially reasonable manner). For non-consumer transactions, Section 9-626 [30-9A-626] rejects the "absolute bar" test that some courts have imposed; that approach bars a noncomplying secured party from recovering any deficiency, regardless of the loss (if any) the debtor suffered as a consequence of the noncompliance.

"Low-price" dispositions: Calculation of deficiency and surplus. Section 9-615(f) [30-9A-615(6)] addresses the problem of procedurally regular dispositions that fetch a low price. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] provides a special method for calculating a deficiency if the proceeds of a disposition of collateral to a secured party, a person related to the secured party, or a secondary obligor are "significantly below the range of proceeds that a complying disposition to a person other than the secured party, a person related to the secured party, or a secondary obligor would have brought." ("Person related to" is defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102].) In these situations there is reason to suspect that there may be inadequate incentives to obtain a better price. Consequently, instead of calculating a deficiency (or surplus) based on the actual net proceeds, the deficiency (or surplus) would be calculated based on the proceeds that would have been received in a disposition to a person other than the secured party, a person related to the secured party, or a secondary obligor.

j. Consumer Goods, Consumer-Goods Transactions, and Consumer Transactions. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] (including the accompanying conforming revisions (see Appendix I)) includes several special rules for "consumer goods," "consumer transactions," and "consumer-goods transactions." Each term is defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102].

(i) Revised Sections 2-502 and 2-716 [30-2-502 and 30-2-716] provide a buyer of consumer goods with enhanced rights to possession of the goods, thereby accelerating the opportunity to achieve "buyer in ordinary course of business" status under Section 1-201 [30-1-201].

(ii) Section 9-103(e) [30-9A-103(5)] (allocation of payments for determining extent of purchase-money status), (f) [30-9A-103(6)] (purchase-money status not affected by cross-collateralization, refinancing, restructuring, or the like), and (g) [30-9A-103(7)] (secured party has burden of establishing extent of purchase-money status) do not apply to consumer-goods transactions. Sections 9-103 [30-9A-103] also provides that the limitation of those provisions to transactions other than consumer-goods transactions leaves to the courts the proper rules for consumer-goods transactions and prohibits the courts from drawing inferences from that limitation.

(iii) Section 9-108 [30-9A-108] provides that in a consumer transaction a description of consumer goods, a security entitlement, securities account, or commodity account "only by [UCC-defined] type of collateral" is not a sufficient collateral description in a security agreement.

(iv) Sections 9-403 and 9-404 [30-9A-403 and 30-9A-404] make effective the Federal Trade Commission's anti-holder-in-due-course rule (when applicable), 16 C.F.R. Part 433, even in the absence of the required legend.

(v) The 10-day safe-harbor for notification of a disposition provided by Section 9-612 [30-9A-612] does not apply in a consumer transaction.

(vi) Section 9-613 [30-9A-613] (contents and form of notice of disposition) does not apply to a consumer-goods transaction.

(vii) Section 9-614 [30-9A-614] contains special requirements for the contents of a notification of disposition and a safe-harbor, "plain English" form of notification, for consumer-goods transactions.

(viii) Section 9-616 [30-9A-616] requires a secured party in a consumer-goods transaction to provide a debtor with a notification of how it calculated a deficiency at the time it first undertakes to collect a deficiency.

(ix) Section 9-620 [30-9A-620] prohibits partial strict foreclosure with respect to consumer goods collateral and, unless the debtor agrees to waive the requirement in an authenticated record after default, in certain cases requires the secured party to dispose of consumer goods collateral which has been repossessed.

(x) Section 9-626 [30-9A-626] ("rebuttable presumption" rule) does not apply to a consumer transaction. Section 9-626 [30-9A-626] also provides that its limitation to transactions other than consumer transactions leaves to the courts the proper rules for consumer transactions and prohibits the courts from drawing inferences from that limitation.

k. Good Faith. Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] contains a new definition of "good faith" that includes not only "honesty in fact" but also "the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing." The definition is similar to the ones adopted in connection with other, recently completed revisions of the UCC.

l. Transition Provisions. Part 7 (Sections 9-701 through 9-707 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 7]) contains transition provisions. Transition from former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] to this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] will be particularly challenging in view of its expanded scope, its modification of choice-of-law rules for perfection and priority, and its expansion of the methods of perfection.

m. Conforming and Related Amendments to Other UCC Articles [chapters]. Appendix I contains several proposed revisions to the provisions and Comments of other UCC articles [chapters]. For the most part the revisions are explained in the Comments to the proposed revisions. Cross-references in other UCC articles [chapters] to sections of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] also have been revised.

Article 1 [Title 30, chapter 1]. Revised Section 1-201 [30-1-201] contains revisions to the definitions of "buyer in ordinary course of business," "purchaser," and "security interest."

Articles 2 and 2A [Title 30, chapters 2 and 2A. Sections 2-210, 2-326, 2-502, 2-716, 2A-303, and 2A-307 [30-2-210, 30-2-326, 30-2-502, 30-2-716, 30-2A-303, and 30-2A-307] have been revised to address the intersection between Articles 2 and 2A and Article 9 [Title 30, chapters 2 and 2A and chapter 9A].

Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. New Section 5-118 [30-5-118] is patterned on Section 4-210 [30-4-210]. It provides for a security interest in documents presented under a letter of credit in favor of the issuer and a nominated person on the letter of credit.

Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. Revisions to Section 8-106 [30-8-116], which deals with "control" of securities and security entitlements, conform it to Section 8-302 [sic] [30-8-331], which deals with "delivery." Revisions to Section 8-110 [30-8-120], which deals with a "securities intermediary's jurisdiction," conform it to the revised treatment of a "commodity intermediary's jurisdiction" in Section 9-305 [30-9A-305]. Sections 8-301 and 8-302 [30-8-331 and 30-8-332] have been revised for clarification. Section 8-510 [30-8-510] has been revised to conform it to the revised priority rules of Section 9-328 [30-9A-328]. Several Comments in Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] also have been revised.

Official Comments

1. Source. All terms that are defined in Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] and used in more than one section are consolidated in this section. Note that the definition of "security interest" is found in Section 1-201 [30-1-201], not in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], and has been revised. See Appendix I. Many of the definitions in this section are new; many others derive from those in former Section 9-105 [30-9-105, now repealed, see 30-9A-102]. The following Comments also indicate other sections of former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] that defined (or explained) terms.

2. Parties to Secured Transactions.

a. "Debtor"; "Obligor"; "Secondary Obligor." Determining whether a person was a "debtor" under former Section 9-105(1)(d) [30-9-105(1)(d), now repealed, see 30-9A-102(1)(bb)] required a close examination of the context in which the term was used. To reduce the need for this examination, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] redefines "debtor" and adds new defined terms, "secondary obligor" and "obligor." In the context of Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] (default and enforcement), these definitions distinguish among three classes of persons: (i) those persons who may have a stake in the proper enforcement of a security interest by virtue of their non-lien property interest (typically, an ownership interest) in the collateral, (ii) those persons who may have a stake in the proper enforcement of the security interest because of their obligation to pay the secured debt, and (iii) those persons who have an obligation to pay the secured debt but have no stake in the proper enforcement of the security interest. Persons in the first class are debtors. Persons in the second class are secondary obligors if any portion of the obligation is secondary or if the obligor has a right of recourse against the debtor or another obligor with respect to an obligation secured by collateral. One must consult the law of suretyship to determine whether an obligation is secondary. The Restatement (3d), Suretyship and Guaranty §1 (1996), contains a useful explanation of the concept. Obligors in the third class are neither debtors nor secondary obligors. With one exception (Section 9-616 [30-9A-616], as it relates to a consumer obligor), the rights and duties provided by Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] affect non-debtor obligors only if they are "secondary obligors."

By including in the definition of "debtor" all persons with a property interest (other than a security interest in or other lien on collateral), the definition includes transferees of collateral, whether or not the secured party knows of the transfer or the transferee's identity. Exculpatory provisions in Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] protect the secured party in that circumstance. See Sections 9-605 and 9-628 [30-9A-605 and 30-9A-628]. The definition renders unnecessary former Section 9-112 [30-9-112, now repealed, see 30-9A-202], which governed situations in which collateral was not owned by the debtor. The definition also includes a "consignee," as defined in this section, as well as a seller of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes.

Secured parties and other lienholders are excluded from the definition of "debtor" because the interests of those parties normally derive from and encumber a debtor's interest. However, if in a separate secured transaction a secured party grants, as debtor, a security interest in its own interest (i.e., its security interest and any obligation that it secures), the secured party is a debtor in that transaction. This typically occurs when a secured party with a security interest in specific goods assigns chattel paper.

Consider the following examples:

Example 1: Behnfeldt borrows money and grants a security interest in her Miata to secure the debt. Behnfeldt is a debtor and an obligor.

Example 2: Behnfeldt borrows money and grants a security interest in her Miata to secure the debt. Bruno co-signs a negotiable note as maker. As before, Behnfeldt is the debtor and an obligor. As an accommodation party (see Section 3-419 [30-3-419]), Bruno is a secondary obligor. Bruno has this status even if the note states that her obligation is a primary obligation and that she waives all suretyship defenses.

Example 3: Behnfeldt borrows money on an unsecured basis. Bruno co-signs the note and grants a security interest in her Honda to secure her obligation. Inasmuch as Behnfeldt does not have a property interest in the Honda, Behnfeldt is not a debtor. Having granted the security interest, Bruno is the debtor. Because Behnfeldt is a principal obligor, she is not a secondary obligor. Whatever the outcome of enforcement of the security interest against the Honda or Bruno's secondary obligation, Bruno will look to Behnfeldt for her losses. The enforcement will not affect Behnfeldt's aggregate obligations.

When the principal obligor (borrower) and the secondary obligor (surety) each has granted a security interest in different collateral, the status of each is determined by the collateral involved.

Example 4: Behnfeldt borrows money and grants a security interest in her Miata to secure the debt. Bruno co-signs the note and grants a security interest in her Honda to secure her obligation. When the secured party enforces the security interest in Behnfeldt's Miata, Behnfeldt is the debtor, and Bruno is a secondary obligor. When the secured party enforces the security interest in the Honda, Bruno is the "debtor." As in Example 3, Behnfeldt is an obligor, but not a secondary obligor.

b. "Secured Party." The secured party is the person in whose favor the security interest has been created, as determined by reference to the security agreement. This definition controls, among other things, which person has the duties and potential liability that Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] imposes upon a secured party. The definition of "secured party" also includes a "consignee," a person to which accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes have been sold, and the holder of an agricultural lien.

The definition of "secured party" clarifies the status of various types of representatives. Consider, for example, a multi-bank facility under which Bank A, Bank B, and Bank C are lenders and Bank A serves as the collateral agent. If the security interest is granted to the banks, then they are the secured parties. If the security interest is granted to Bank A as collateral agent, then Bank A is the secured party.

c. Other Parties. A "consumer obligor" is defined as the obligor in a consumer transaction. Definitions of "new debtor" and "original debtor" are used in the special rules found in Sections 9-326 and 9-508 [30-9A-326 and 30-9A-508].

3. Definitions Relating to Creation of a Security Interest.

a. "Collateral." As under former Section 9-105 [30-9-105, now repealed, see 30-9A-102(1)(l)], "collateral" is the property subject to a security interest and includes accounts and chattel paper that have been sold. It has been expanded in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. The term now explicitly includes proceeds subject to a security interest. It also reflects the broadened scope of the Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. It includes property subject to an agricultural lien as well as payment intangibles and promissory notes that have been sold.

b. "Security Agreement." The definition of "security agreement" is substantially the same as under former Section 9-105 [30-9-105, now repealed, see 30-9A-102(1)(uuu)]—an agreement that creates or provides for a security interest. However, the term frequently was used colloquially in former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] to refer to the document or writing that contained a debtor's security agreement. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] eliminates that usage, reserving the term for the more precise meaning specified in the definition.

Whether an agreement creates a security interest depends not on whether the parties intend that the law characterize the transaction as a security interest but rather on whether the transaction falls within the definition of "security interest" in Section 1-201 [30-1-201]. Thus, an agreement that the parties characterize as a "lease" of goods may be a "security agreement," notwithstanding the parties' stated intention that the law treat the transaction as a lease and not as a secured transaction.

4. Goods-Related Definitions.

a. "Goods"; "Consumer Goods"; "Equipment"; "Farm Products"; "Farming Operation"; "Inventory." The definition of "goods" is substantially the same as the definition in former Section 9-105 [30-9-105, now repealed, see 30-9A-102(1)(rr)]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] also retains the four mutually-exclusive "types" of collateral that consist of goods: "consumer goods," "equipment," "farm products," and "inventory." The revisions are primarily for clarification.

The classes of goods are mutually exclusive. For example, the same property cannot simultaneously be both equipment and inventory. In borderline cases-a physician's car or a farmer's truck that might be either consumer goods or equipment-the principal use to which the property is put is determinative. Goods can fall into different classes at different times. For example, a radio may be inventory in the hands of a dealer and consumer goods in the hands of a consumer. As under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], goods are "equipment" if they do not fall into another category.

The definition of "consumer goods" follows former Section 9-109 [30-9-109, now repealed, see 30-9A-102(1)(w)]. The classification turns on whether the debtor uses or bought the goods for use "primarily for personal, family, or household purposes."

Goods are inventory if they are leased by a lessor or held by a person for sale or lease. The revised definition of "inventory" makes clear that the term includes goods leased by the debtor to others as well as goods held for lease. (The same result should have obtained under the former definition.) Goods to be furnished or furnished under a service contract, raw materials, and work in process also are inventory. Implicit in the definition is the criterion that the sales or leases are or will be in the ordinary course of business. For example, machinery used in manufacturing is equipment, not inventory, even though it is the policy of the debtor to sell machinery when it becomes obsolete or worn. Inventory also includes goods that are consumed in a business (e.g., fuel used in operations). In general, goods used in a business are equipment if they are fixed assets or have, as identifiable units, a relatively long period of use, but are inventory, even though not held for sale or lease, if they are used up or consumed in a short period of time in producing a product or providing a service.

Goods are "farm products" if the debtor is engaged in farming operations with respect to the goods. Animals in a herd of livestock are covered whether the debtor acquires them by purchase or as a result of natural increase. Products of crops or livestock remain farm products as long as they have not been subjected to a manufacturing process. The terms "crops" and "livestock" are not defined. The new definition of "farming operations" is for clarification only.

Crops, livestock, and their products cease to be "farm products" when the debtor ceases to be engaged in farming operations with respect to them. If, for example, they come into the possession of a marketing agency for sale or distribution or of a manufacturer or processor as raw materials, they become inventory. Products of crops or livestock, even though they remain in the possession of a person engaged in farming operations, lose their status as farm products if they are subjected to a manufacturing process. What is and what is not a manufacturing operation is not specified in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. At one end of the spectrum, some processes are so closely connected with farming-such as pasteurizing milk or boiling sap to produce maple syrup or sugar-that they would not constitute manufacturing. On the other hand an extensive canning operation would be manufacturing. Once farm products have been subjected to a manufacturing operation, they normally become inventory.

The revised definition of "farm products" clarifies the distinction between crops and standing timber and makes clear that aquatic goods produced in aquacultural operations may be either crops or livestock. Although aquatic goods that are vegetable in nature often would be crops and those that are animal would be livestock, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] leaves the courts free to classify the goods on a case-by-case basis. See Section 9-324 [30-9A-324], Comment 11.

b. "Accession"; "Manufactured Home"; "Manufactured-Home Transaction." Other specialized definitions of goods include "accession" (see the special priority and enforcement rules in Section 9-335 [30-9A-335]), and "manufactured home" (see Section 9-515 [30-9A-515], permitting a financing statement in a "manufactured-home transaction" to be effective for 30 years). The definition of "manufactured home" borrows from the federal Manufactured Housing Act, 42 U.S.C. §5401 et seq., and is intended to have the same meaning.

c. "As-Extracted Collateral." Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], oil, gas, and other minerals that have not been extracted from the ground are treated as real property, to which this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not apply. Upon extraction, minerals become personal property (goods) and eligible to be collateral under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. See the definition of "goods," which excludes "oil, gas, and other minerals before extraction." To take account of financing practices reflecting the shift from real to personal property, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] contains special rules for perfecting security interests in minerals which attach upon extraction and in accounts resulting from the sale of minerals at the wellhead or minehead. See, e.g., Sections 9-301(4) [30-9A-301(4)] (law governing perfection and priority); 9-501 [30-9A-501] (place of filing), 9-502 [30-9A-502] (contents of financing statement), 9-519 [30-9A-519] (indexing of records). The new term, "as-extracted collateral," refers to the minerals and related accounts to which the special rules apply. The term "at the wellhead" encompasses arrangements based on a sale of the produce at the moment that it issues from the ground and is measured, without technical distinctions as to whether title passes at the "Christmas tree" of a well, the far side of a gathering tank, or at some other point. The term "at . . . the minehead" is comparable.

The following examples explain the operation of these provisions.

Example 5: Debtor owns an interest in oil that is to be extracted. To secure Debtor's obligations to Lender, Debtor enters into an authenticated agreement granting Lender an interest in the oil. Although Lender may acquire an interest in the oil under real-property law, Lender does not acquire a security interest under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] until the oil becomes personal property, i.e., until is extracted and becomes "goods" to which this Article

[Title 30, chapter 9A] applies. Because Debtor had an interest in the oil before extraction and Lender's security interest attached to the oil as extracted, the oil is "as-extracted collateral."

Example 6: Debtor owns an interest in oil that is to be extracted and contracts to sell the oil to Buyer at the wellhead. In an authenticated agreement, Debtor agrees to sell to Lender the right to payment from Buyer. This right to payment is an account that constitutes "as-extracted collateral." If Lender then resells the account to Financer, Financer acquires a security interest. However, inasmuch as the debtor-seller in that transaction, Lender, had no interest in the oil before extraction, Financer's collateral (the account it owns) is not "as-extracted collateral."

Example 7: Under the facts of Example 6, before extraction, Buyer grants a security interest in the oil to Bank. Although Bank's security interest attaches when the oil is extracted, Bank's security interest is not in "as-extracted collateral," inasmuch as its debtor, Buyer, did not have an interest in the oil before extraction.

5. Receivables-related Definitions.

a. "Account"; "Health-Care-Insurance Receivable"; "As-Extracted Collateral." The definition of "account" has been expanded and reformulated. It is no longer limited to rights to payment relating to goods or services. Many categories of rights to payment that were classified as general intangibles under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] are accounts under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Thus, if they are sold, a financing statement must be filed to perfect the buyer's interest in them. Among the types of property that are expressly excluded from the definition is "a right to payment for money or funds advanced or sold." As defined in Section 1-201 [30-1-201], "money" is limited essentially to currency. As used in the exclusion from the definition of "account," however, "funds" is a broader concept (although the term is not defined). For example, when a bank-lender credits a borrower's deposit account for the amount of a loan, the bank's advance of funds is not a transaction giving rise to an account.

The definition of "health-care-insurance receivable" is new. It is a subset of the definition of "account." However, the rules generally applicable to account debtors on accounts do not apply to insurers obligated on health-care-insurance receivables. See Sections 9-404(e), 9-405(d), 9-406(i) [30-9A-404(5), 30-9A-405(4), and 30-9A-406(8)].

Note that certain accounts also are "as-extracted collateral." See Comment 4.c., Examples 6 and 7.

b. "Chattel Paper"; "Electronic Chattel Paper"; "Tangible Chattel Paper." "Chattel paper" consists of a monetary obligation together with a security interest in or a lease of specific goods if the obligation and security interest or lease are evidenced by "a record or records." The definition has been expanded from that found in former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] to include records that evidence a monetary obligation and a security interest in specific goods and software used in the goods, a security interest in specific goods and license of software used in the goods, or a lease of specific goods and license of software used in the goods. The expanded definition covers transactions in which the debtor's or lessee's monetary obligation includes amounts owed with respect to software used in the goods. The monetary obligation with respect to the software need not be owed under a license from the secured party or lessor, and the secured party or lessor need not be a party to the license transaction itself. Among the types of monetary obligations that are included in "chattel paper" are amounts that have been advanced by the secured party or lessor to enable the debtor or lessee to acquire or obtain financing for a license of the software used in the goods.

Charters of vessels are expressly excluded from the definition of chattel paper; they are accounts. The term "charter" as used in this section includes bareboat charters, time charters, successive voyage charters, contracts of affreightment, contracts of carriage, and all other arrangements for the use of vessels.

Under former Section 9-105 [30-9-105, now repealed, see 30-9A-102], only if the evidence of an obligation consisted of "a writing or writings" could an obligation qualify as chattel paper. In this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], traditional, written chattel paper is included in the definition of "tangible chattel paper." "Electronic chattel paper" is chattel paper that is stored in an electronic medium instead of in tangible form. The concept of an electronic medium should be construed liberally to include electrical, digital, magnetic, optical, electromagnetic, or any other current or similar emerging technologies.

The definition of electronic chattel paper does not dictate that it be created in any particular fashion. For example, a record consisting of a tangible writing may be converted to electronic form (e.g., by creating electronic images of a signed writing). Or, records may be initially created and executed in electronic form (e.g., a lessee might authenticate an electronic record of a lease that is then stored in electronic form). In either case the resulting records are electronic chattel paper.

c. "Instrument"; "Promissory Note." The definition of "instrument" includes a negotiable instrument. As under former Section 9-105 [30-9-105, now repealed, see 30-9A-102], it also includes any other right to payment of a monetary obligation that is evidenced by a writing of a type that in ordinary course of business is transferred by delivery (and, if necessary, an indorsement or assignment). Except in the case of chattel paper, the fact that an instrument is secured by a security interest or encumbrance on property does not change the character of the instrument as such or convert the combination of the instrument and collateral into a separate classification of personal property. The definition makes clear that rights to payment arising out of credit-card transactions are not instruments. The definition of "promissory note" is new, necessitated by the inclusion of sales of promissory notes within the scope of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. It explicitly excludes obligations arising out of "orders" to pay (e.g., checks) as opposed to "promises" to pay. See Section 3-104 [30-3-104].

d. "General Intangible"; "Payment Intangible." "General intangible" is the residual category of personal property, including things in action, that is not included in the other defined types of collateral. Examples are various categories of intellectual property and the right to payment of a loan of funds that is not evidenced by chattel paper or an instrument. The definition has been revised to exclude commercial tort claims, deposit accounts, and letter-of-credit rights. Each of the three is a separate type of collateral. One important consequence of this exclusion is that tortfeasors (commercial tort claims), banks (deposit accounts), and persons obligated on letters of credit (letter-of-credit rights) are not "account debtors" having the rights and obligations set forth in Sections 9-404, 9-405, and 9-406 [30-9A-404, 30-9A-405, and 30-9A-406]. In particular, tortfeasors, banks, and persons obligated on letters of credit are not obligated to pay an assignee (secured party) upon receipt of the notification described in Section 9-404(a) [30-9A-404(1)]. See Comment 5.h. Another important consequence relates to the adequacy of the description in the security agreement. See Section 9-108 [30-9A-108].

"Payment intangible" is a subset of the definition of "general intangible." The sale of a payment intangible is subject to this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. See Section 9-109(a)(3) [30-9A-109(1)(c)]. Virtually any intangible right could give rise to a right to payment of money once one hypothesizes, for example, that the account debtor is in breach of its obligation. The term "payment intangible," however, embraces only those general intangibles "under which the account debtor's principal obligation is a monetary obligation." (Emphasis added.)

In classifying intangible collateral, a court should begin by identifying the particular rights that have been assigned. The account debtor (promisor) under a particular contract may owe several types of monetary obligations as well as other, nonmonetary obligations. If the promisee's right to payment of money is assigned separately, the right is an account or payment intangible, depending on how the account debtor's obligation arose. When all the promisee's rights are assigned together, an account, a payment intangible, and a general intangible all may be involved, depending on the nature of the rights.

A right to the payment of money is frequently buttressed by ancillary covenants, such as covenants in a purchase agreement, note, or mortgage requiring insurance on the collateral or forbidding removal of the collateral, or covenants to preserve the creditworthiness of the promisor, such as covenants restricting dividends and the like. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not treat these ancillary rights separately from the rights to payment to which they relate. For example, attachment and perfection of an assignment of a right to payment of a monetary obligation, whether it be an account or payment intangible, also carries these ancillary rights.

Every "payment intangible" is also a "general intangible." Likewise, "software" is a "general intangible" for purposes of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. See Comment 25. Accordingly, except as otherwise provided, statutory provisions applicable to general intangibles apply to payment intangibles and software.

e. "Letter-of-Credit Right." The term "letter-of-credit right" embraces the rights to payment and performance under a letter of credit (defined in Section 5-102 [30-5-122]). However, it does not include a beneficiary's right to demand payment or performance. Transfer of those rights to a transferee beneficiary is governed by Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. See Sections 9-107 [30-9A-107], Comment 4, and 9-329 [30-9A-329], Comments 3 and 4.

f. "Supporting Obligation." This new term covers the most common types of credit enhancements-suretyship obligations (including guarantees) and letter-of-credit rights that support one of the types of collateral specified in the definition. As explained in Comment 2.a., suretyship law determines whether an obligation is "secondary" for purposes of this definition. Section 9-109 [30-9A-109] generally excludes from this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] transfers of interests in insurance policies. However, the regulation of a secondary obligation as an insurance product does not necessarily mean that it is a "policy of insurance" for purposes of the exclusion in Section 9-109 [30-9A-109]. Thus, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] may cover a secondary obligation (as a supporting obligation), even if the obligation is issued by a regulated insurance company and the obligation is subject to regulation as an "insurance" product.

This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] contains rules explicitly governing attachment, perfection, and priority of security interests in supporting obligations. See Sections 9-203, 9-308, 9-310, and 9-322 [30-9A-203, 30-9A-308, 30-9A-310, and 30-9A-322]. These provisions reflect the principle that a supporting obligation is an incident of the collateral it supports.

Collections of or other distributions under a supporting obligation are "proceeds" of the supported collateral as well as "proceeds" of the supporting obligation itself. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (defining "proceeds") and Comment 13.b. As such, the collections and distributions are subject to the priority rules applicable to proceeds generally. See Section 9-322 [30-9A-322]. However, under the special rule governing security interests in a letter-of-credit right, a secured party's failure to obtain control (Section 9-107 [30-9A-107]) of a letter-of-credit right supporting collateral may leave its security interest exposed to a priming interest of a party who does take control. See Section 9-329 [30-9A-329] (security interest in a letter-of-credit right perfected by control has priority over a conflicting security interest).

g. "Commercial Tort Claim." This term is new. A tort claim may serve as original collateral under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] only if it is a "commercial tort claim." See Section 9-109(d) [30-9A-109(4)]. Although security interests in commercial tort claims are within its scope, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not override other applicable law restricting the assignability of a tort claim. See Section 9-401 [30-9A-401]. A security interest in a tort claim also may exist under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] if the claim is proceeds of other collateral.

h. "Account Debtor." An "account debtor" is a person obligated on an account, chattel paper, or general intangible. The account debtor's obligation often is a monetary obligation; however, this is not always the case. For example, if a franchisee uses its rights under a franchise agreement (a general intangible) as collateral, then the franchisor is an "account debtor." As a general matter, Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3], and not Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A], governs obligations on negotiable instruments. Accordingly, the definition of "account debtor" excludes obligors on negotiable instruments constituting part of chattel paper. The principal effect of this change from the definition in former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] is that the rules in Sections 9-403, 9-404, 9-405, and 9-406 [30-9A-403, 30-9A-404, 30-9A-405, and 30-9A-406], dealing with the rights of an assignee and duties of an account debtor, do not apply to an assignment of chattel paper in which the obligation to pay is evidenced by a negotiable instrument. (Section 9-406(d) [30-9A-406(4)], however, does apply to promissory notes, including negotiable promissory notes.) Rather, the assignee's rights are governed by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Similarly, the duties of an obligor on a nonnegotiable instrument are governed by non-Article 9 [non-Title 30, chapter 9A] law unless the nonnegotiable instrument is a part of chattel paper, in which case the obligor is an account debtor.

i. Receivables Under Government Entitlement Programs. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not contain a defined term that encompasses specifically rights to payment or performance under the many and varied government entitlement programs. Depending on the nature of a right under a program, it could be an account, a payment intangible, a general intangible other than a payment intangible, or another type of collateral. The right also might be proceeds of collateral (e.g., crops).

6. Investment-Property-Related Definitions: "Commodity Account"; "Commodity Contract"; "Commodity Customer"; "Commodity Intermediary"; "Investment Property." These definitions are substantially the same as the corresponding definitions in former Section 9-115 [30-9-115, now repealed, see 30-9A-102]. "Investment property" includes securities, both certificated and uncertificated, securities accounts, security entitlements, commodity accounts, and commodity contracts. The term investment property includes a "securities account" in order to facilitate transactions in which a debtor wishes to create a security interest in all of the investment positions held through a particular account rather than in particular positions carried in the account. Former Section 9-115 [30-9-115, now repealed, see 30-9A-102] was added in conjunction with Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] and contained a variety of rules applicable to security interests in investment property. These rules have been relocated to the appropriate sections of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. See, e.g., Sections 9-203 [30-9A-203] (attachment), 9-314 [30-9A-314] (perfection by control), 9-328 [30-9A-328] (priority).

The terms "security," "security entitlement," and related terms are defined in Section 8-102 [30-8-112], and the term "securities account" is defined in Section 8-501 [30-8-501]. The terms "commodity account," "commodity contract," "commodity customer," and "commodity intermediary" are defined in this section. Commodity contracts are not "securities" or "financial assets" under Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. See Section 8-103(f) [30-8-113(5)]. Thus, the relationship between commodity intermediaries and commodity customers is not governed by the indirect-holding-system rules of Part 5 of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8, part 5]. For securities, Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] contains rules on security interests, and Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] contains rules on the rights of transferees, including secured parties, on such matters as the rights of a transferee if the transfer was itself wrongful and gives rise to an adverse claim. For commodity contracts, Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] establishes rules on security interests, but questions of the sort dealt with in Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] for securities are left to other law.

The indirect-holding-system rules of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] are sufficiently flexible to be applied to new developments in the securities and financial markets, where that is appropriate. Accordingly, the definition of "commodity contract" is narrowly drafted to ensure that it does not operate as an obstacle to the application of the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] indirect-holding-system rules to new products. The term "commodity contract" covers those contracts that are traded on or subject to the rules of a designated contract market and foreign commodity contracts that are carried on the books of American commodity intermediaries. The effect of this definition is that the category of commodity contracts that are excluded from Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] but governed by Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] is essentially the same as the category of contracts that fall within the exclusive regulatory jurisdiction of the federal Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

Commodity contracts are different from securities or other financial assets. A person who enters into a commodity futures contract is not buying an asset having a certain value and holding it in anticipation of increase in value. Rather the person is entering into a contract to buy or sell a commodity at set price for delivery at a future time. That contract may become advantageous or disadvantageous as the price of the commodity fluctuates during the term of the contract. The rules of the commodity exchanges require that the contracts be marked to market on a daily basis; that is, the customer pays or receives any increment attributable to that day's price change. Because commodity customers may incur obligations on their contracts, they are required to provide collateral at the outset, known as "original margin," and may be required to provide additional amounts, known as "variation margin," during the term of the contract.

The most likely setting in which a person would want to take a security interest in a commodity contract is where a lender who is advancing funds to finance an inventory of a physical commodity requires the borrower to enter into a commodity contract as a hedge against the risk of decline in the value of the commodity. The lender will want to take a security interest in both the commodity itself and the hedging commodity contract. Typically, such arrangements are structured as security interests in the entire commodity account in which the borrower carries the hedging contracts, rather than in individual contracts.

One important effect of including commodity contracts and commodity accounts in Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] is to provide a clearer legal structure for the analysis of the rights of commodity clearing organizations against their participants and futures commission merchants against their customers. The rules and agreements of commodity clearing organizations generally provide that the clearing organization has the right to liquidate any participant's positions in order to satisfy obligations of the participant to the clearing corporation. Similarly, agreements between futures commission merchants and their customers generally provide that the futures commission merchant has the right to liquidate a customer's positions in order to satisfy obligations of the customer to the futures commission merchant.

The main property that a commodity intermediary holds as collateral for the obligations that the commodity customer may incur under its commodity contracts is not other commodity contracts carried by the customer but the other property that the customer has posted as margin. Typically, this property will be securities. The commodity intermediary's security interest in such securities is governed by the rules of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] on security interests in securities, not the rules on security interests in commodity contracts or commodity accounts.

Although there are significant analytic and regulatory differences between commodities and securities, the development of commodity contracts on financial products in the past few decades has resulted in a system in which the commodity markets and securities markets are closely linked. The rules on security interests in commodity contracts and commodity accounts provide a structure that may be essential in times of stress in the financial markets. Suppose, for example that a firm has a position in a securities market that is hedged by a position in a commodity market, so that payments that the firm is obligated to make with respect to the securities position will be covered by the receipt of funds from the commodity position. Depending upon the settlement cycles of the different markets, it is possible that the firm could find itself in a position where it is obligated to make the payment with respect to the securities position before it receives the matching funds from the commodity position. If cross-margining arrangements have not been developed between the two markets, the firm may need to borrow funds temporarily to make the earlier payment. The rules on security interests in investment property would facilitate the use of positions in one market as collateral for loans needed to cover obligations in the other market.

7. Consumer-Related Definitions: "Consumer Debtor"; "Consumer Goods"; "Consumer-goods transaction"; "Consumer Obligor"; "Consumer Transaction." The definition of "consumer goods" (discussed above) is substantially the same as the definition in former Section 9-109 [30-9-109, now repealed, see 30-9A-102]. The definitions of "consumer debtor," "consumer obligor," "consumer-goods transaction," and "consumer transaction" have been added in connection with various new (and old) consumer-related provisions and to designate certain provisions that are inapplicable in consumer transactions.

"Consumer-goods transaction" is a subset of "consumer transaction." Under each definition, both the obligation secured and the collateral must have a personal, family, or household purpose. However, "mixed" business and personal transactions also may be characterized as a consumer-goods transaction or consumer transaction. Subparagraph (A) [subsection (1)(x)(i)] of the definition of consumer-goods transactions and clause (i) [subsection (1)(z)(i)] of the definition of consumer transaction are primary purposes tests. Under these tests, it is necessary to determine the primary purpose of the obligation or obligations secured. Subparagraph (B) and clause (iii) [subsections (1)(x)(ii) and (1)(z)(iii)] of these definitions are satisfied if any of the collateral is consumer goods, in the case of a consumer-goods transaction, or "is held or acquired primarily for personal, family, or household purposes," in the case of a consumer transaction. The fact that some of the obligations secured or some of the collateral for the obligation does not satisfy the tests (e.g., some of the collateral is acquired for a business purpose) does not prevent a transaction from being a "consumer transaction" or "consumer-goods transaction."

8. Filing-Related Definitions: "Continuation Statement"; "File Number"; "Filing Office"; "Filing-office Rule"; "Financing Statement"; "Fixture Filing"; "Manufactured-Home Transaction"; "New Debtor"; "Original Debtor"; "Public-Finance Transaction"; "Termination Statement"; "Transmitting Utility." These definitions are used exclusively or primarily in the filing-related provisions in Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5]. Most are self-explanatory and are discussed in the Comments to Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5]. A financing statement filed in a manufactured-home transaction or a public-finance transaction may remain effective for 30 years instead of the 5 years applicable to other financing statements. See Section 9-515(b) [30-9A-515(2)]. The definitions relating to medium neutrality also are significant for the filing provisions. See Comment 9.

The definition of "transmitting utility" has been revised to embrace the business of transmitting communications generally to take account of new and future types of communications technology. The term designates a special class of debtors for whom separate filing rules are provided in Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5], thereby obviating the many local fixture filings that would be necessary under the rules of Section 9-501 [30-9A-501] for a far-flung public-utility debtor. A transmitting utility will not necessarily be regulated by or operating as such in a jurisdiction where fixtures are located. For example, a utility might own transmission lines in a jurisdiction, although the utility generates no power and has no customers in the jurisdiction.

9. Definitions Relating to Medium Neutrality.

a. "Record." In many, but not all, instances, the term "record" replaces the term "writing" and "written." A "record" includes information that is in intangible form (e.g., electronically stored) as well as tangible form (e.g., written on paper). Given the rapid development and commercial adoption of modern communication and storage technologies, requirements that documents or communications be "written," "in writing," or otherwise in tangible form do not necessarily reflect or aid commercial practices.

A "record" need not be permanent or indestructible, but the term does not include any oral or other communication that is not stored or preserved by any means. The information must be stored on paper or in some other medium. Information that has not been retained other than through human memory does not qualify as a record. Examples of current technologies commercially used to communicate or store information include, but are not limited to, magnetic media, optical discs, digital voice messaging systems, electronic mail, audio tapes, and photographic media, as well as paper. "Record" is an inclusive term that includes all of these methods of storing or communicating information. Any "writing" is a record. A record may be authenticated. See Comment 9.b. A record may be created without the knowledge or intent of a particular person.

Like the terms "written" or "in writing," the term "record" does not establish the purposes, permitted uses, or legal effect that a record may have under any particular provision of law. Whatever is filed in the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] filing system, including financing statements, continuation statements, and termination statements, whether transmitted in tangible or intangible form, would fall within the definition. However, in some instances, statutes or filing-office rules may require that a paper record be filed. In such cases, even if this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] permits the filing of an electronic record, compliance with those statutes or rules is necessary. Similarly, a filer must comply with a statute or rule that requires a particular type of encoding or formatting for an electronic record.

This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] sometimes uses the terms "for record," "of record," "record or legal title," and "record owner." Some of these are terms traditionally used in real-property law. The definition of "record" in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] now explicitly excepts these usages from the defined term. Also, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] refers to a record that is filed or recorded in real-property recording systems to record a mortgage as a "record of a mortgage." This usage recognizes that the defined term "mortgage" means an interest in real property; it does not mean the record that evidences, or is filed or recorded with respect to, the mortgage.

b. "Authenticate"; "Communicate"; "Send." The terms "authenticate" and "authenticated" generally replace "sign" and "signed." "Authenticated" replaces and broadens the definition of "signed," in Section 1-201 [30-1-201], to encompass authentication of all records, not just writings. (References to authentication of, e.g., an agreement, demand, or notification mean, of course, authentication of a record containing an agreement, demand, or notification.) The terms "communicate" and "send" also contemplate the possibility of communication by nonwritten media. These definitions include the act of transmitting both tangible and intangible records. The definition of "send" replaces, for purposes of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], the corresponding term in Section 1-201 [30-1-201]. The reference to "usual means of communication" in that definition contemplates an inquiry into the appropriateness of the method of transmission used in the particular circumstances involved.

10. Scope-Related Definitions.

a. Expanded Scope of Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]: "Agricultural Lien"; "Consignment"; "Payment Intangible"; "Promissory Note." These new definitions reflect the expanded scope of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A], as provided in Section 9-109(a) [30-9A-109(1)].

b. Reduced Scope of Exclusions: "Governmental Unit"; "Health-Care-Insurance Receivable"; "Commercial Tort Claims." These new definitions reflect the reduced scope of the exclusions, provided in Section 9-109(c) and (d) [30-9A-109(3) and (4)], of transfers by governmental debtors and assignments of interests in insurance policies and commercial tort claims.

11. Choice-of-Law-Related Definitions: "Certificate of Title"; "Governmental Unit"; "Jurisdiction of Organization"; "Registered Organization"; "State." These new definitions reflect the changes in the law governing perfection and priority of security interests and agricultural liens provided in Part 3, Subpart 1 [30-9A-301 through 30-9A-307].

Not every organization that may provide information about itself in the public records is a "registered organization." For example, a general partnership is not a "registered organization," even if it files a statement of partnership authority under Section 303 of the Uniform Partnership Act (1994) or an assumed name ("dba") certificate. This is because the State under whose law the partnership is organized is not required to maintain a public record showing that the partnership has been organized. In contrast, corporations, limited liability companies, and limited partnerships are "registered organizations."

12. Deposit-Account-Related Definitions: "Deposit Account"; "Bank." The revised definition of "deposit account" incorporates the definition of "bank," which is new. The definition derives from the definitions of "bank" in Sections 4-105(1) and 4A-105(a)(2) [30-4-105(1) and 30-4A-105(1)(b)], which focus on whether the organization is "engaged in the business of banking."

Deposit accounts evidenced by Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] "instruments" are excluded from the term "deposit account." In contrast, former Section 9-105 [30-9-105, now repealed, see 30-9A-102] excluded from the former definition "an account evidenced by a certificate of deposit." The revised definition clarifies the proper treatment of nonnegotiable or uncertificated certificates of deposit. Under the definition, an uncertificated certificate of deposit would be a deposit account (assuming there is no writing evidencing the bank's obligation to pay) whereas a nonnegotiable certificate of deposit would be a deposit account only if it is not an "instrument" as defined in this section (a question that turns on whether the nonnegotiable certificate of deposit is "of a type that in ordinary course of business is transferred by delivery with any necessary indorsement or assignment.")

A deposit account evidenced by an instrument is subject to the rules applicable to instruments generally. As a consequence, a security interest in such an instrument cannot be perfected by "control" (see Section 9-104 [30-9A-104]), and the special priority rules applicable to deposit accounts (see Sections 9-327 and 9-340 [30-9A-327 and 30-9A-340]) do not apply.

The term "deposit account" does not include "investment property," such as securities and security entitlements. Thus, the term also does not include shares in a money-market mutual fund, even if the shares are redeemable by check.

13. Proceeds-Related Definitions: "Cash Proceeds"; "Noncash Proceeds"; "Proceeds." The revised definition of "proceeds" expands the definition beyond that contained in former Section 9-306 [30-9-306, now repealed, see 30-9A-102] and resolves ambiguities in the former section.

a. Distributions on Account of Collateral. The phrase "whatever is collected on, or distributed on account of, collateral," in subparagraph (B) [subsection (1)(lll)(ii)], is broad enough to cover cash or stock dividends distributed on account of securities or other investment property that is original collateral. Compare former Section 9-306 [30-9-306, now repealed, see 30-9A-102] ("Any payments or distributions made with respect to investment property collateral are proceeds."). This section rejects the holding of Hastie v. FDIC, 2 F.3d 1042 (10th Cir. 1993) (postpetition cash dividends on stock subject to a prepetition pledge are not "proceeds" under Bankruptcy Code Section 552(b)), to the extent the holding relies on the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] definition of "proceeds."

b. Distributions on Account of Supporting Obligations. Under subparagraph (B) [subsection (1)(lll)(ii)], collections on and distributions on account of collateral consisting of various credit-support arrangements ("supporting obligations," as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]) also are proceeds. Consequently, they are afforded treatment identical to proceeds collected from or distributed by the obligor on the underlying (supported) right to payment or other collateral. Proceeds of supporting obligations also are proceeds of the underlying rights to payment or other collateral.

c. Proceeds of Proceeds. The definition of "proceeds" no longer provides that proceeds of proceeds are themselves proceeds. That idea is expressed in the revised definition of "collateral" in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. No change in meaning is intended.

d. Proceeds Received by Person Who Did Not Create Security Interest. When collateral is sold subject to a security interest and the buyer then resells the collateral, a question arose under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] concerning whether the "debtor" had "received" what the buyer received on resale and, therefore, whether those receipts were "proceeds" under former Section 9-306(2) [30-9-306(2), now repealed, see 30-9A-315]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] contains no requirement that property be "received" by the debtor for the property to qualify as proceeds. It is necessary only that the property be traceable, directly or indirectly, to the original collateral.

e. Cash Proceeds and Noncash Proceeds. The definition of "cash proceeds" is substantially the same as the corresponding definition in former Section 9-306 [30-9-306, now repealed, see 30-9A-315]. The phrase "and the like" covers property that is functionally equivalent to "money, checks, or deposit accounts," such as some money-market accounts that are securities or part of securities entitlements. Proceeds other than cash proceeds are noncash proceeds.

14. Consignment-Related Definitions: "Consignee"; "Consignment"; "Consignor." The definition of "consignment" excludes, in subparagraphs (B) and (C) [subsections (1)(t)(ii) and (1)(t)(iii)], transactions for which filing would be inappropriate or of insufficient benefit to justify the costs. A consignment excluded from the application of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] by one of those subparagraphs may still be a true consignment; however, it is governed by non-Article 9 [non-Title 30, chapter 9A] law. The definition also excludes, in subparagraph (D) [subsection (1)(t)(iv)], what have been called "consignments intended for security." These "consignments" are not bailments but secured transactions. Accordingly, all of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] applies to them. See Sections 1-201(37), 9-109(a)(1) [30-1-201(37), 30-9A-109(1)(a)]. The "consignor" is the person who delivers goods to the "consignee" in a consignment.

The definition of "consignment" requires that the goods be delivered "to a merchant for the purpose of sale." If the goods are delivered for another purpose as well, such as milling or processing, the transaction is a consignment nonetheless because a purpose of the delivery is "sale." On the other hand, if a merchant-processor-bailee will not be selling the goods itself but will be delivering to buyers to which the owner-bailor agreed to sell the goods, the transaction would not be a consignment.

15. "Accounting." This definition describes the record and information that a debtor is entitled to request under Section 9-210 [30-9A-210].

16. "Document." The definition of "document" is unchanged in substance from the corresponding definitions in former Section 9-105 [30-9-105, now repealed, see 30-9A-102]. See Section 1-201(15) [30-1-201(15)] and Comment 15.

17. "Encumbrance"; "Mortgage." The definitions of "encumbrance" and "mortgage" are unchanged in substance from the corresponding definitions in former Section 9-105 [30-9-105, now repealed, see 30-9A-102]. They are used primarily in the special real-property-related priority and other provisions relating to crops, fixtures, and accessions.

18. "Fixtures." This definition is unchanged in substance from the corresponding definition in former Section 9-313 [30-9-313, now repealed, see 30-9A-102]. See Section 9-334 [30-9A-334] (priority of security interests in fixtures and crops).

19. "Good Faith." This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] expands the definition of "good faith" to include "the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing." The definition in this section applies when the term is used in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], and the same concept applies in the context of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] for purposes of the obligation of good faith imposed by Section 1-203 [30-1-203]. See subsection (c) [subsection 3].

20. "Lien Creditor" This definition is unchanged in substance from the corresponding definition in former Section 9-301 [30-9-301, now repealed, see 30-9A-102].

21. "New Value." This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] deletes former Section 9-108 [30-9-108, now repealed, see 30-9A-102]. Its broad formulation of new value, which embraced the taking of after-acquired collateral for a pre-existing claim, was unnecessary, counterintuitive, and ineffective for its original purpose of sheltering after-acquired collateral from attack as a voidable preference in bankruptcy. The new definition derives from Bankruptcy Code Section 547(a). The term is used with respect to temporary perfection of security interests in instruments, certificated securities, or negotiable documents under Section 9-312(e) [30-9A-312(5)] and with respect to chattel paper priority in Section 9-330 [30-9A-330].

22. "Person Related To." Section 9-615 [30-9A-615] provides a special method for calculating a deficiency or surplus when "the secured party, a person related to the secured party, or a secondary obligor" acquires the collateral at a foreclosure disposition. Separate definitions of the term are provided with respect to an individual secured party and with respect to a secured party that is an organization. The definitions are patterned on the corresponding definition in Section 1.301(32) of the Uniform Consumer Credit Code (1974).

23. "Proposal." This definition describes a record that is sufficient to propose to retain collateral in full or partial satisfaction of a secured obligation. See Sections 9-620, 9-621, 9-622 [30-9A-620, 30-9A-621, and 30-9A-622].

24. "Pursuant to Commitment." This definition is unchanged in substance from the corresponding definition in former Section 9-105 [30-9-105, now repealed, see 30-9A-102]. It is used in connection with special priority rules applicable to future advances. See Section 9-323 [30-9A-323].

25. "Software." The definition of "software" is used in connection with the priority rules applicable to purchase-money security interests. See Sections 9-103, 9-324 [30-9A-103 and 30-9A-324]. Software, like a payment intangible, is a type of general intangible for purposes of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A].

26. Terminology: "Assignment" and "Transfer." In numerous provisions, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] refers to the "assignment" or the "transfer" of property interests. These terms and their derivatives are not defined. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] generally follows common usage by using the terms "assignment" and "assign" to refer to transfers of rights to payment, claims, and liens and other security interests. It generally uses the term "transfer" to refer to other transfers of interests in property. Except when used in connection with a letter-of-credit transaction (see Section 9-107 [30-9A-107], Comment 4), no significance should be placed on the use of one term or the other. Depending on the context, each term may refer to the assignment or transfer of an outright ownership interest or to the assignment or transfer of a limited interest, such as a security interest.

Compiler's Comments

2001 Amendment: Chapter 179 in definition of chattel paper in (1) near beginning of first sentence after "obligation and a security interest in" substituted "specific goods, a security interest in" for "or a lease of specific goods or of" and at end inserted "a security interest in specific goods and license of software used in the goods, a lease of specific goods, or a lease of specific goods and license of software used in the goods" and inserted second sentence defining monetary obligation, inserted (ii)(A)(II) excluding records that evidence a right to payment out of use of credit card from definition of chattel paper, and in (ii)(B) after "evidenced" substituted "by records that include an instrument" for "both by a security agreement or lease and by an instrument"; in definition of original debtor inserted exception clause; in definition of proceeds inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Parol Evidence Held Inadmissible to Prove Representative Capacity of Maker of Note — Definition of Debtor — Unambiguous Terms Notwithstanding Security Agreement — Statute Not Retroactive — Former Statute Inapplicable: By use of a note and security agreement, Carelli sold 38 elk to Hall who, as Stireses' partner, operated the Elk Valley Game Ranch (Game Ranch). Later, Carelli brought an action against Stireses, alleging that Stireses were also liable on the debt because Hall had orally told Carelli at the time of the sale that the elk were being purchased for the Game Ranch. The Supreme Court held that Hall's oral statements to Carelli were inadmissible on the issue of Stireses' liability on the note for three reasons: (1) The note was clear and unambiguous in that Hall's representative capacity did not appear on the note, Hall was the "debtor" as defined in the security agreement, and a reference to the Game Ranch in the security agreement did not make the note ambiguous so as to require explanation by parol evidence. (2) The Supreme Court held that a 1991 amendment to 30-3-403 regarding the capacity in which a person signs an instrument, if applied in this case, would cause a difference in the liability of the parties. Therefore, the amendment is substantive. Because there was no expression of legislative intent that the 1991 version be applied retroactively, the 1985 version of 30-3-403 and not the 1991 version applies, and parol evidence is not relevant to that 1985 version. (3) The facts of the case did not fall within the terms of the 1985 version of 30-3-403. Carelli v. Hall, 279 M 202, 926 P2d 756, 53 St. Rep. 1116 (1996).

Generally Worded After-Acquired Property Security Interest: Security interest covered all goods used in rental business, including but not limited to machinery, equipment, and inventory held for sale or rent "existing or hereafter acquired". Lower court's conclusion that a general description of items covered was insufficient and that trailers, hoppers, mixer, and loader used by renters to make, haul, and pour cement were not covered was erroneous. Further, the conclusion that there could be no security interest because those items were not financed by the holder of the security interest was also erroneous. Taylor Rental Corp. v. Ted Godwin Leasing, Inc., 209 M 124, 681 P2d 691, 41 St. Rep. 594 (1984).

When Limitation of Remedies Permissible — Equipment Sales — Factors: In a case stemming from an accident involving a hay baler, one issue on appeal was the limitation of remedies. Although limitation of damages for personal injuries in the case of consumer goods is prima facie unconscionable under 30-2-719, farm equipment is defined as "equipment". The limitation of remedy provisions could as a matter of law be found unconscionable. Accordingly, the court ordered an evidentiary hearing on the remedy limitations. Factors under 30-2-302 were to be considered at the hearing. Schlenz v. John Deere Co., 511 F. Supp. 224, 38 St. Rep. 579 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

30-9A-103. Purchase-money security interest — application of payments — burden of establishing purchase-money security interest.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-107 [30-9-107, now repealed].

2. Scope of This Section. Under Section 9-309(1) [30-9A-309(1)], a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods is perfected when it attaches. Sections 9-317 and 9-324 [30-9A-317 and 30-9A-324] provide special priority rules for purchase-money security interests in a variety of contexts. This section explains when a security interest enjoys purchase-money status.

3. "Purchase-Money Collateral"; "Purchase-Money Obligation"; "Purchase-Money Security Interest." Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] defines "purchase-money collateral" and "purchase-money obligation." These terms are essential to the description of what constitutes a purchase-money security interest under subsection (b) [subsection (2)]. As used in subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)], the definition of "purchase-money obligation," the "price" of collateral or the "value given to enable" includes obligations for expenses incurred in connection with acquiring rights in the collateral, sales taxes, duties, finance charges, interest, freight charges, costs of storage in transit, demurrage, administrative charges, expenses of collection and enforcement, attorney's fees, and other similar obligations.

The concept of "purchase-money security interest" requires a close nexus between the acquisition of collateral and the secured obligation. Thus, a security interest does not qualify as a purchase-money security interest if a debtor acquires property on unsecured credit and subsequently creates the security interest to secure the purchase price.

4. Cross-Collateralization of Purchase-Money Security Interests in Inventory. Subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)] deals with the problem of cross-collateralized purchase-money security interests in inventory. Consider a simple example:

Example: Seller (S) sells an item of inventory (Item-1) to Debtor (D), retaining a security interest in Item-1 to secure Item-1's price and all other obligations, existing and future, of D to S. S then sells another item of inventory to D (Item-2), again retaining a security interest in Item-2 to secure Item-2's price as well as all other obligations of D to S. D then pays to S Item-1's price. D then sells Item-2 to a buyer in ordinary course of business, who takes Item-2 free of S's security interest. Under subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)], S's security interest in Item-1 securing Item-2's unpaid price would be a purchase-money security interest. This is so because S has a purchase-money security interest in Item-1, Item-1 secures the price of (a "purchase-money obligation incurred with respect to") Item-2 ("other inventory"), and Item-2 itself was subject to a purchase-money security interest. Note that, to the extent Item-1 secures the price of Item-2, S's security interest in Item-1 would not be a purchase-money security interest under subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)]. The security interest in Item-1 is a purchase-money security interest under subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] only to the extent that Item-1 is "purchase-money collateral," i.e., only to the extent that Item-1 "secures a purchase-money obligation incurred with respect to that collateral" (i.e., Item-1). See subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)].

5. Purchase-Money Security Interests in Goods and Software. Subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)] limit purchase-money security interests to security interests in goods, including fixtures, and software. Otherwise, no change in meaning from former Section 9-107 [30-9-107, now repealed] is intended. The second sentence of former Section 9-115(5)(f) [30-9-115(5)(f), now repealed, see 30-9A-328] made the purchase-money priority rule (former Section 9-312(4) [30-9-312(4), now repealed, see 30-9A-324]) inapplicable to investment property. This section's limitation makes that provision unnecessary.

Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] describes the limited circumstances under which a security interest in goods may be accompanied by a purchase-money security interest in software. The software must be acquired by the debtor in a transaction integrated with the transaction in which the debtor acquired the goods, and the debtor must acquire the software for the principal purpose of using the software in the goods. "Software" is defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102].

6. Consignments. Under former Section 9-114 [30-9-114, now repealed], the priority of the consignor's interest is similar to that of a purchase-money security interest. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] achieves this result more directly, by defining the interest of a "consignor," defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102], to be a purchase-money security interest in inventory for purposes of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. This drafting convention obviates any need to set forth special priority rules applicable to the interest of a consignor. Rather, the priority of the consignor's interest as against the rights of lien creditors of the consignee, competing secured parties, and purchasers of the goods from the consignee can be determined by reference to the priority rules generally applicable to inventory, such as Sections 9-317, 9-320, 9-322, and 9-324 [30-9A-317, 30-9A-320, 30-9A-322, and 30-9A-324]. For other purposes, including the rights and duties of the consignor and consignee as between themselves, the consignor would remain the owner of goods under a bailment arrangement with the consignee. See Section 9-319 [30-9A-319).

7. Provisions Applicable Only to Non-Consumer-Goods Transactions.

a. "Dual-Status" Rule. For transactions other than consumer-goods transactions, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] approves what some cases have called the "dual-status" rule, under which a security interest may be a purchase-money security interest to some extent and a non-purchase-money security interest to some extent. (Concerning consumer-goods transactions, see subsection (h) [subsection (8)] and Comment 8.) Some courts have found this rule to be explicit or implicit in the words "to the extent," found in former Section 9-107 [30-9-107, now repealed] and continued in subsections (b)(1) and (b)(2) [subsections (2)(a) and (2)(b)]. The rule is made explicit in subsection (e) [subsection (5)]. For non-consumer-goods transactions, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] rejects the "transformation" rule adopted by some cases, under which any cross-collateralization, refinancing, or the like destroys the purchase-money status entirely.

Consider, for example, what happens when a $10,000 loan secured by a purchase-money security interest is refinanced by the original lender, and, as part of the transaction, the debtor borrows an additional $2,000 secured by the collateral. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] resolves any doubt that the security interest remains a purchase-money security interest. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], however, it enjoys purchase-money status only to the extent of $10,000.

b. Allocation of Payments. Continuing with the example, if the debtor makes a $1,000 payment on the $12,000 obligation, then one must determine the extent to which the security interest remains a purchase-money security interest-$9,000 or $10,000. Subsection (e)(1) [subsection (5)(a)] expresses the overriding principle, applicable in cases other than consumer-goods transactions, for determining the extent to which a security interest is a purchase-money security interest under these circumstances: freedom of contract, as limited by principle of reasonableness. An unconscionable method of application, for example, is not a reasonable one and so would not be given effect under subsection (e)(1) [subsection (5)(a)]. In the absence of agreement, subsection (e)(2) [subsection (5)(b)] permits the obligor to determine how payments should be allocated. If the obligor fails to manifest its intention, obligations that are not secured will be paid first. (As used in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], the concept of "obligations that are not secured" means obligations for which the debtor has not created a security interest. This concept is different from and should not be confused with the concept of an "unsecured claim" as it appears in Bankruptcy Code Section 506(a).) The obligor may prefer this approach, because unsecured debt is likely to carry a higher interest rate than secured debt. A creditor who would prefer to be secured rather than unsecured also would prefer this approach.

After the unsecured debt is paid, payments are to be applied first toward the obligations secured by purchase-money security interests. In the event that there is more than one such obligation, payments first received are to be applied to obligations first incurred. See subsection (e)(3) [subsection (5)(c)]. Once these obligations are paid, there are no purchase-money security interests and no additional allocation rules are needed.

Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] buttresses the dual-status rule by making it clear that (in a transaction other than a consumer-goods transaction) cross-collateralization and renewals, refinancings, and restructurings do not cause a purchase-money security interest to lose its status as such. The statutory terms "renewed," "refinanced," and "restructured" are not defined. Whether the terms encompass a particular transaction depends upon whether, under the particular facts, the purchase-money character of the security interest fairly can be said to survive. Each term contemplates that an identifiable portion of the purchase-money obligation could be traced to the new obligation resulting from a renewal, refinancing, or restructuring.

c. Burden of Proof. As is the case when the extent of a security interest is in issue, under subsection (g) [subsection (7)] the secured party claiming a purchase-money security interest in a transaction other than a consumer-goods transaction has the burden of establishing whether the security interest retains its purchase-money status. This is so whether the determination is to be made following a renewal, refinancing, or restructuring or otherwise.

8. Consumer-Goods Transactions; Characterization Under Other Law. Under subsection (h) [subsection (8)], the limitation of subsections (e), (f), and (g) [subsections (5), (6), and (7)] to transactions other than consumer-goods transactions leaves to the court the determination of the proper rules in consumer-goods transactions. Subsection (h) [subsection (8)] also instructs the court not to draw any inference from this limitation as to the proper rules for consumer-goods transactions and leaves the court free to continue to apply established approaches to those transactions.

This section addresses only whether a security interest is a "purchase-money security interest" under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], primarily for purposes of perfection and priority. See, e.g., Sections 9-317, 9-324 [30-9A-317 and 30-9A-324]. In particular, its adoption of the dual-status rule, allocation of payments rules, and burden of proof standards for non-consumer-goods transactions is not intended to affect or influence characterizations under other statutes. Whether a security interest is a "purchase-money security interest" under other law is determined by that law. For example, decisions under Bankruptcy Code Section 522(f) have applied both the dual-status and the transformation rules. The Bankruptcy Code does not expressly adopt the state law definition of "purchase-money security interest." Where federal law does not defer to this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not, and could not, determine a question of federal law.

30-9A-104. Control of deposit account.

Official Comments

1. Source. New; derived from Section 8-106 [30-8-116].

2. Why "Control" Matters. This section explains the concept of "control" of a deposit account. "Control" under this section may serve two functions. First, "control . . . pursuant to the debtor's agreement" may substitute for an authenticated security agreement as an element of attachment. See Section 9-203(b)(3)(D) [30-9A-203(2)(c)(iv)]. Second, when a deposit account is taken as original collateral, the only method of perfection is obtaining control under this section. See Section 9-312(b)(1) [30-9A-312(2)(a)].

3. Requirements for "Control." This section derives from Section 8-106 [30-8-116] of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], which defines "control" of securities and certain other investment property. Under subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)], the bank with which the deposit account is maintained has control. The effect of this provision is to afford the bank automatic perfection. No other form of public notice is necessary; all actual and potential creditors of the debtor are always on notice that the bank with which the debtor's deposit account is maintained may assert a claim against the deposit account.

Under subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)], a secured party may obtain control by obtaining the bank's authenticated agreement that it will comply with the secured party's instructions without further consent by the debtor. The analogous provision in Section 8-106 [30-8-116] does not require that the agreement be authenticated. An agreement to comply with the secured party's instructions suffices for "control" of a deposit account under this section even if the bank's agreement is subject to specified conditions, e.g., that the secured party's instructions are accompanied by a certification that the debtor is in default. (Of course, if the condition is the debtor's further consent, the statute explicitly provides that the agreement would not confer control.) See revised Section 8-106 [30-8-116], Comment 7.

Under subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)], a secured party may obtain control by becoming the bank's "customer," as defined in Section 4-104 [30-4-104]. As the customer, the secured party would enjoy the right (but not necessarily the exclusive right) to withdraw funds from, or close, the deposit account. See Sections 4-401(a), 4-403(a) [30-4-401(1), 30-4-403(1)].

Although the arrangements giving rise to control may themselves prevent, or may enable the secured party at its discretion to prevent, the debtor from reaching the funds on deposit, subsection (b) [subsection (2)] makes clear that the debtor's ability to reach the funds is not inconsistent with "control."

Perfection by control is not available for bank accounts evidenced by an instrument (e.g., certain certificates of deposit), which by definition are "instruments" and not "deposit accounts." See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (defining "deposit account" and "instrument").

30-9A-105. Control of electronic chattel paper.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. "Control" of Electronic Chattel Paper. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] covers security interests in "electronic chattel paper," a new term defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. This section governs how "control" of electronic chattel paper may be obtained. A secured party's control of electronic chattel paper (i) may substitute for an authenticated security agreement for purposes of attachment under Section 9-203 [30-9A-203], (ii) is a method of perfection under Section 9-314 [30-9A-314], and (iii) is a condition for obtaining special, non-temporal priority under Section 9-330 [30-9A-330]. Because electronic chattel paper cannot be transferred, assigned, or possessed in the same manner as tangible chattel paper, a special definition of control is necessary. In descriptive terms, this section provides that control of electronic chattel paper is the functional equivalent of possession of "tangible chattel paper" (a term also defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]).

3. "Authoritative Copy" of Electronic Chattel Paper. One requirement for establishing control is that a particular copy be an "authoritative copy. "Although other copies may exist, they must be distinguished from the authoritative copy. This may be achieved, for example, through the methods of authentication that are used or by business practices involving the marking of any additional copies. When tangible chattel paper is converted to electronic chattel paper, in order to establish that a copy of the electronic chattel paper is the authoritative copy it may be necessary to show that the tangible chattel paper no longer exists or has been permanently marked to indicate that it is not the authoritative copy.

4. Development of Control Systems. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] leaves to the marketplace the development of systems and procedures, through a combination of suitable technologies and business practices, for dealing with control of electronic chattel paper in a commercial context. However, achieving control under this section requires more than the agreement of interested persons that the elements of control are satisfied. For example, paragraph (4) [subsection (4)] contemplates that control requires that it be a physical impossibility (or sufficiently unlikely or implausible so as to approach practical impossibility) to add or change an identified assignee without the participation of the secured party (or its authorized representative). It would not be enough for the assignor merely to agree that it will not change the identified assignee without the assignee-secured party's consent. However, the standards applied to determine whether a party is in control of electronic chattel paper should not be more stringent than the standards now applied to determine whether a party is in possession of tangible chattel paper. Control of electronic chattel paper contemplates systems or procedures such that the secured party must take some action (either directly or through its designated custodian) to effect a change or addition to the authoritative copy. But just as a secured party does not lose possession of tangible chattel paper merely by virtue of the possibility that a person acting on its behalf could wrongfully redeliver the chattel paper to the debtor, so control of electronic chattel paper would not be defeated by the possibility that the secured party's interest could be subverted by the wrongful conduct of a person (such as a custodian) acting on its behalf.

Systems that evolve for control of electronic chattel paper may or may not involve a third party custodian of the relevant records. However, this section and the concept of control of electronic chattel paper are not based on the same concepts as are control of deposit accounts (Section 9-104 [30-9A-104]), security entitlements, a type of investment property (Section 9-106 [30-9A-106]), and letter-of-credit rights (Section 9-107 [30-9A-107]). The rules for control of that collateral are based on existing market practices and legal and regulatory regimes for institutions such as banks and securities intermediaries. Analogous practices for electronic chattel paper are developing nonetheless. The flexible approach adopted by this section, moreover, should not impede the development of these practices and, eventually, legal and regulatory regimes, which may become analogous to those for, e.g., investment property.

3. "Control" of Commodity Contracts. This section, as did former Section 9-115(1)(e) [30-9-115(1)(e), now repealed, see 30-9A-106], contains provisions relating to control of commodity contracts which are analogous to those in Section 8-106 [30-8-116] for other types of investment property.

4. Securities Accounts and Commodity Accounts. For drafting convenience, control with respect to a securities account or commodity account is defined in terms of obtaining control over the security entitlements or commodity contracts. Of course, an agreement that provides that (without further consent of the debtor) the securities intermediary or commodity intermediary will honor instructions from the secured party concerning a securities account or commodity account described as such is sufficient. Such an agreement necessarily implies that the intermediary will honor instructions concerning all security entitlements or commodity contracts carried in the account and thus affords the secured party control of all the security entitlements or commodity contracts.

30-9A-107. Control of letter-of-credit right.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. "Control" of Letter-of-Credit Right. Whether a secured party has control of a letter-of-credit right may determine the secured party's priority as against competing secured parties. See Section 9-329 [30-9A-329]. This section provides that a secured party acquires control of a letter-of-credit right by receiving an assignment if the secured party obtains the consent of the issuer or any nominated person, such as a confirmer or negotiating bank, under Section 5-114 [30-5-134] or other applicable law or practice. Because both issuers and nominated persons may give or be obligated to give value under a letter of credit, this section contemplates that a secured party obtains control of a letter-of-credit right with respect to the issuer or a particular nominated person only to the extent that the issuer or that nominated person consents to the assignment. For example, if a secured party obtains control to the extent of an issuer's obligation but fails to obtain the consent of a nominated person, the secured party does not have control to the extent that the nominated person gives value. In many cases the person or persons who will give value under a letter of credit will be clear from its terms. In other cases, prudence may suggest obtaining consent from more than one person. The details of the consenting issuer's or nominated person's duties to pay or otherwise render performance to the secured party are left to the agreement of the parties.

3. "Proceeds of a Letter of Credit." Section 5-114 [30-5-134] follows traditional banking terminology by referring to a letter of credit beneficiary's assignment of its right to receive payment thereunder as an assignment of the "proceeds of a letter of credit." However, as the seller of goods can assign its right to receive payment (an "account") before it has been earned by delivering the goods to the buyer, so the beneficiary of a letter of credit can assign its contingent right to payment before the letter of credit has been honored. See Section 5-114(b) [30-5-134(2)]. If the assignment creates a security interest, the security interest can be perfected at the time it is created. An assignment of, including the creation of a security interest in, a letter-of-credit right is an assignment of a present interest.

4. "Transfer" vs. "Assignment." Letter-of-credit law and practice distinguish the "transfer" of a letter of credit from an "assignment." Under a transfer, the transferee itself becomes the beneficiary and acquires the right to draw. Whether a new, substitute credit is issued or the issuer advises the transferee of its status as such, the transfer constitutes a novation under which the transferee is the new, substituted beneficiary (but only to the extent of the transfer, in the case of a partial transfer).

Section 5-114(e) [30-5-134(5)] provides that the rights of a transferee beneficiary or nominated person are independent of the beneficiary's assignment of the proceeds of a letter of credit and are superior to the assignee's right to the proceeds. For this reason, transfer does not appear in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] as a means of control or perfection. Section 9-109(c)(4) [30-9A-109(3)(d)] recognizes the independent and superior rights of a transferee beneficiary under Section 5-114(e) [30-5-134(5)]; this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not apply to the rights of a transferee beneficiary or nominated person to the extent that those rights are independent and superior under Section 5-114 [30-5-134].

5. Supporting Obligation: Automatic Attachment and Perfection. A letter-of-credit right is a type of "supporting obligation," as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. Under Sections 9-203 and 9-308 [30-9A-203 and 30-9A-308], a security interest in a letter-of-credit right automatically attaches and is automatically perfected if the security interest in the supported obligation is a perfected security interest. However, unless the secured party has control of the letter-of-credit right or itself becomes a transferee beneficiary, it cannot obtain any rights against the issuer or a nominated person under Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]. Consequently, as a practical matter, the secured party's rights would be limited to its ability to locate and identify proceeds distributed by the issuer or nominated person under the letter of credit.

30-9A-108. Sufficiency of description.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Sections 9-110, 9-115(3) [30-9-110, 30-9-115(3), both now repealed].

2. General Rules. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] retains substantially the same formulation as former Section 9-110 [30-9-110, now repealed]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] expands upon subsection (a) [subsection (1)] by indicating a variety of ways in which a description might reasonably identify collateral. Whereas a provision similar to subsection (b) [subsection (2)] was applicable only to investment property under former Section 9-115(3) [30-9-115(3), now repealed], subsection (b) [subsection (2)] applies to all types of collateral, subject to the limitation in subsection (d) [subsection (4)]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is subject to subsection (c) [subsection (3)], which follows prevailing case law and adopts the view that an "all assets" or "all personal property" description for purposes of a security agreement is not sufficient. Note, however, that under Section 9-504 [30-9A-504], a financing statement sufficiently indicates the collateral if it "covers all assets or all personal property."

The purpose of requiring a description of collateral in a security agreement under Section 9-203 [30-9A-203] is evidentiary. The test of sufficiency of a description under this section, as under former Section 9-110 [30-9-110, now repealed], is that the description do the job assigned to it: make possible the identification of the collateral described. This section rejects any requirement that a description is insufficient unless it is exact and detailed (the so-called "serial number" test).

3. After-Acquired Collateral. Much litigation has arisen over whether a description in a security agreement is sufficient to include after-acquired collateral if the agreement does not explicitly so provide. This question is one of contract interpretation and is not susceptible to a statutory rule (other than a rule to the effect that it is a question of contract interpretation). Accordingly, this section contains no reference to descriptions of after-acquired collateral.

4. Investment Property. Under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], the use of the wrong Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] terminology does not render a description invalid (e.g., a security agreement intended to cover a debtor's "security entitlements" is sufficient if it refers to the debtor's "securities"). Note also that given the broad definition of "securities account" in Section 8-501 [30-8-501], a security interest in a securities account also includes all other rights of the debtor against the securities intermediary arising out of the securities account. For example, a security interest in a securities account would include credit balances due to the debtor from the securities intermediary, whether or not they are proceeds of a security entitlement. Moreover, describing collateral as a securities account is a simple way of describing all of the security entitlements carried in the account.

5. Consumer Investment Property; Commercial Tort Claims. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] requires greater specificity of description in order to prevent debtors from inadvertently encumbering certain property. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] requires that a description by defined "type" of collateral alone of a commercial tort claim or, in a consumer transaction, of a security entitlement, securities account, or commodity account, is not sufficient. For example, "all existing and after-acquired investment property" or "all existing and after-acquired security entitlements," without more, would be insufficient in a consumer transaction to describe a security entitlement, securities account, or commodity account. The reference to "only by type" in subsection (e) [subsection (5)] means that a description is sufficient if it satisfies subsection (a) [subsection (1)] and contains a descriptive component beyond the "type" alone. Moreover, if the collateral consists of a securities account or commodity account, a description of the account is sufficient to cover all existing and future security entitlements or commodity contracts carried in the account. See Section 9-203(h), (i) [30-9A-203(8) and (9)].

Under Section 9-204 [30-9A-204], an after-acquired collateral clause in a security agreement will not reach future commercial tort claims. It follows that when an effective security agreement covering a commercial tort claim is entered into the claim already will exist. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] does not require a description to be specific. For example, a description such as "all tort claims arising out of the explosion of debtor's factory" would suffice, even if the exact amount of the claim, the theory on which it may be based, and the identity of the tortfeasor(s) are not described. (Indeed, those facts may not be known at the time.)

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Statement of Location in Security Agreement — Limiting Factor: A security agreement in livestock and their progeny which contained an after-acquired property clause and which described the livestock as being located "20 miles East of Jordan on premises owned by: James J. Murnion" is limited to livestock located on the described premises. This security agreement did not give the secured party a prior perfected security interest in the debtor's cattle that were purchased with a later loan from another bank and pastured in another location. First Nat'l Bank of Glasgow v. First Sec. Bank of Mont., 222 M 118, 721 P2d 1270, 43 St. Rep. 1105 (1986).

Generally Worded After-Acquired Property Security Interest: Security interest covered all goods used in rental business, including but not limited to machinery, equipment, and inventory held for sale or rent "existing or hereafter acquired". Lower court's conclusion that a general description of items covered was insufficient and that trailers, hoppers, mixer, and loader used by renters to make, haul, and pour cement were not covered was erroneous. Further, the conclusion that there could be no security interest because those items were not financed by the holder of the security interest was also erroneous. Taylor Rental Corp. v. Ted Godwin Leasing, Inc., 209 M 124, 681 P2d 691, 41 St. Rep. 594 (1984).

30-9A-109. Scope.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Sections 9-102, 9-104 [30-9-102, 30-9-104, both now repealed].

2. Basic Scope Provision. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] derives from former Section 9-102(1) and (2) [30-9-102(1) and (2), now repealed]. These subsections have been combined and shortened. No change in meaning is intended. Under subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)], all consensual security interests in personal property and fixtures are covered by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], except for transactions excluded by subsections (c) and (d) [subsections (3) and (4)]. As to which transactions give rise to a "security interest," the definition of that term in Section 1-201 [30-1-201] must be consulted. When a security interest is created, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] applies regardless of the form of the transaction or the name that parties have given to it.

3. Agricultural Liens. Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] is new. It expands the scope of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] to cover agricultural liens, as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102].

4. Sales of Accounts, Chattel Paper, Payment Intangibles, Promissory Notes, and Other Receivables. Under subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)], as under former Section 9-102 [30-9-102, now repealed], this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] applies to sales of accounts and chattel paper. This approach generally has been successful in avoiding difficult problems of distinguishing between transactions in which a receivable secures an obligation and those in which the receivable has been sold outright. In many commercial financing transactions the distinction is blurred.

Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)] expands the scope of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] by including the sale of a "payment intangible" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] as "a general intangible under which the account debtor's principal obligation is a monetary obligation") and a "promissory note" (also defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]). To a considerable extent, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] affords these transactions treatment identical to that given sales of accounts and chattel paper. In some respects, however, sales of payment intangibles and promissory notes are treated differently from sales of other receivables. See, e.g., Sections 9-309 [30-9A-309] (automatic perfection upon attachment), 9-408 [30-9A-408] (effect of restrictions on assignment). By virtue of the expanded definition of "account" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]), this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] now covers sales of (and other security interests in) "health-care-insurance receivables" (also defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]). Although this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] occasionally distinguishes between outright sales of receivables and sales that secure an obligation, neither this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] nor the definition of "security interest" (Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)]) delineates how a particular transaction is to be classified. That issue is left to the courts.

5. Transfer of Ownership in Sales of Receivables. A "sale" of an account, chattel paper, a promissory note, or a payment intangible includes a sale of a right in the receivable, such as a sale of a participation interest. The term also includes the sale of an enforcement right. For example, a "[p]erson entitled to enforce" a negotiable promissory note (Section 3-301 [30-3-301]) may sell its ownership rights in the instrument. See Section 3-203 [30-3-203], Comment 1 ("Ownership rights in instruments may be determined by principles of the law of property, independent of Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3], which do not depend upon whether the instrument was transferred under Section 3-203 [30-3-203]."). Also, the right under Section 3-309 [30-3-309] to enforce a lost, destroyed, or stolen negotiable promissory note may be sold to a purchaser who could enforce that right by causing the seller to provide the proof required under that section. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] rejects decisions reaching a contrary result, e.g., Dennis Joslin Co. v. Robinson Broadcasting, 977 F. Supp. 491 (D.D.C. 1997).

Nothing in this section or any other provision of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] prevents the transfer of full and complete ownership of an account, chattel paper, an instrument, or a payment intangible in a transaction of sale. However, as mentioned in Comment 4, neither this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] nor the definition of "security interest" in Section 1-201 [30-1-201] provides rules for distinguishing sales transactions from those that create a security interest securing an obligation. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] applies to both types of transactions. The principal effect of this coverage is to apply this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] perfection and priority rules to these sales transactions. Use of terminology such as "security interest," "debtor," and "collateral" is merely a drafting convention adopted to reach this end, and its use has no relevance to distinguishing sales from other transactions. See PEB Commentary No. 14.

Following a debtor's outright sale and transfer of ownership of a receivable, the debtor-seller retains no legal or equitable rights in the receivable that has been sold. See Section 9-318(a) [30-9A-318(1)]. This is so whether or not the buyer's security interest is perfected. (A security interest arising from the sale of a promissory note or payment intangible is perfected upon attachment without further action. See Section 9-309 [30-9A-309].) However, if the buyer's interest in accounts or chattel paper is unperfected, a subsequent lien creditor, perfected secured party, or qualified buyer can reach the sold receivable and achieve priority over (or take free of) the buyer's unperfected security interest under Section 9-317 [30-9A-317]. This is so not because the seller of a receivable retains rights in the property sold; it does not. Nor is this so because the seller of a receivable is a "debtor" and the buyer of a receivable is a "secured party" under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] (they are). It is so for the simple reason that Sections 9-318(b), 9-317, and 9-322 [30-9A-318(2), 30-9A-317, and 30-9A-322] make it so, as did former Sections 9-301 and 9-312 [30-9-301 and 30-9-312, both now repealed, see 30-9A-317, 30-9A-322, 30-9A-323, and 30-9A-324]. Because the buyer's security interest is unperfected, for purposes of determining the rights of creditors of and purchasers for value from the debtor-seller, under Section 9-318(b) [30-9A-318(2)] the debtor-seller is deemed to have the rights and title it sold. Section 9-317 [30-9A-317] subjects the buyer's unperfected interest in accounts and chattel paper to that of the debtor-seller's lien creditor and other persons who qualify under that section.

6. Consignments. Subsection (a)(4) [subsection (1)(d)] is new. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] applies to every "consignment." The term, defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102], includes many but not all "true" consignments (i.e., bailments for the purpose of sale). If a transaction is a "sale or return," as defined in revised Section 2-326 [30-2-326], it is not a "consignment." In a "sale or return" transaction, the buyer becomes the owner of the goods, and the seller may obtain an enforceable security interest in the goods only by satisfying the requirements of Section 9-203 [30-9A-203].

Under common law, creditors of a bailee were unable to reach the interest of the bailor (in the case of a consignment, the consignor-owner). Like former Section 2-326 [30-2-326] and former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] changes the common-law result; however, it does so in a different manner. For purposes of determining the rights and interests of third-party creditors of, and purchasers of the goods from, the consignee, but not for other purposes, such as remedies of the consignor, the consignee is deemed to acquire under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] whatever rights and title the consignor had or had power to transfer. See Section 9-319 [30-9A-319]. The interest of a consignor is defined to be a security interest under revised Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)], more specifically, a purchase-money security interest in the consignee's inventory. See Section 9-103(d) [30-9A-103(4)]. Thus, the rules pertaining to lien creditors, buyers, and attachment, perfection, and priority of competing security interests apply to consigned goods. The relationship between the consignor and consignee is left to other law. Consignors also have no duties under Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. See Section 9-601(g) [30-9A-601(7)].

Sometimes parties characterize transactions that secure an obligation (other than the bailee's obligation to returned bailed goods) as "consignments." These transactions are not "consignments" as contemplated by Section 9-109(a)(4) [30-9A-109(1)(d)]. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] applies also to these transactions, by virtue of Section 9-109(a)(1) [30-9A-109(1)(a)]. They create a security interest within the meaning of the first sentence of Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)].

This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not apply to bailments for sale that fall outside the definition of "consignment" in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] and that do not create a security interest that secures an obligation.

7. Security Interest in Obligation Secured by Non-Article 9 [non-Title 30, chapter 9A] Transaction. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is unchanged in substance from former Section 9-102(3) [30-9-102(3), now repealed]. The following example provides an illustration.

Example 1: O borrows $10,000 from M and secures its repayment obligation, evidenced by a promissory note, by granting to M a mortgage on O's land. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not apply to the creation of the real-property mortgage. However, if M sells the promissory note to X or gives a security interest in the note to secure M's own obligation to X, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] applies to the security interest thereby created in favor of X. The security interest in the promissory note is covered by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] even though the note is secured by a real-property mortgage. Also, X's security interest in the note gives X an attached security interest in the mortgage lien that secures the note and, if the security interest in the note is perfected, the security interest in the mortgage lien likewise is perfected. See Sections 9-203, 9-308 [30-9A-203 and 30-9A-308]. It also follows from subsection (b) [subsection (2)] that an attempt to obtain or perfect a security interest in a secured obligation by complying with non-Article 9 [non-Title 30, chapter 9A] law, as by an assignment of record of a real-property mortgage, would be ineffective. Finally, it is implicit from subsection (b) [subsection (2)] that one cannot obtain a security interest in a lien, such as a mortgage on real property, that is not also coupled with an equally effective security interest in the secured obligation. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] rejects cases such as In re Maryville Savings & Loan Corp., 743 F.2d 413 (6th Cir. 1984), clarified on reconsideration, 760 F.2d 119 (1985).

8. Federal Preemption. Former Section 9-104(a) [30-9-104(1), now repealed] excluded from Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] "a security interest subject to any statute of the United States, to the extent that such statute governs the rights of parties to and third parties affected by transactions in particular types of property." Some (erroneously) read the former section to suggest that Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] sometimes deferred to federal law even when federal law did not preempt Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. Subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a)] recognizes explicitly that this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] defers to federal law only when and to the extent that it must-i.e., when federal law preempts it.

9. Governmental Debtors. Former Section 9-104(e) [30-9-104(5), now repealed] excluded transfers by governmental debtors. It has been revised and replaced by the exclusions in new paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (c) [subsections (3)(b) and (3)(c)]. These paragraphs reflect the view that Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] should apply to security interests created by a State, foreign country, or a "governmental unit" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]) of either except to the extent that another statute governs the issue in question. Under paragraph (2) [subsection (3)(b)], this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] defers to all statutes of the forum State. (A forum cannot determine whether it should consult the choice-of-law rules in the forum's UCC unless it first determines that its UCC applies to the transaction before it.) Paragraph (3) [subsection (3)(c)] defers to statutes of another State or a foreign country only to the extent that those statutes contain rules applicable specifically to security interests created by the governmental unit in question.

Example 2: A New Jersey state commission creates a security interest in favor of a New York bank. The validity of the security interest is litigated in New York. The relevant security agreement provides that it is governed by New York law. To the extent that a New Jersey statute contains rules peculiar to creation of security interests by governmental units generally, to creation of security interests by state commissions, or to creation of security interests by this particular state commission, then that law will govern. On the other hand, to the extent that New Jersey law provides that security interests created by governmental units, state commissions, or this state commission are governed by the law generally applicable to secured transactions (i.e., New Jersey's Article 9), then New York's Article 9 will govern.

Example 3: An airline that is an instrumentality of a foreign country creates a security interest in favor of a New York bank. The analysis used in the previous example would apply here. That is, if the matter is litigated in New York, New York law would govern except to the extent that the foreign country enacted a statute applicable to security interests created by governmental units generally or by the airline specifically.

The fact that New York law applies does not necessarily mean that perfection is accomplished by filing in New York. Rather, it means that the court should apply New York's Article 9, including its choice-of-law provisions. Under New York's Section 9-301, perfection is governed by the law of the jurisdiction in which the debtor is located. Section 9-307 [30-9A-307] determines the debtor's location for choice-of-law purposes.

If a transaction does not bear an appropriate relation to the forum State, then that State's Article 9 will not apply, regardless of whether the transaction would be excluded by paragraph (3) [subsection (3)(c)].

Example 4: A Belgian governmental unit grants a security interest in its equipment to a Swiss secured party. The equipment is located in Belgium. A dispute arises and, for some reason, an action is brought in a New Mexico state court. Inasmuch as the transaction bears no "appropriate relation" to New Mexico, New Mexico's UCC, including its Article 9, is inapplicable. See Section 1-105(1) [30-1-105(1)]. New Mexico's Section 9-109(c) on excluded transactions should not come into play. Even if the parties agreed that New Mexico law would govern, the parties' agreement would not be effective because the transaction does not bear a "reasonable relation" to New Mexico. See Section 1-105(1) [30-1-105(1)].

Conversely, Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] will come into play only if the litigation arises in a UCC jurisdiction or if a foreign choice-of-law rule leads a foreign court to apply the law of a UCC jurisdiction. For example, if issues concerning a security interest granted by a foreign airline to a New York bank are litigated overseas, the court may be bound to apply the law of the debtor's jurisdiction and not New York's Article 9.

10. Certain Statutory and Common-Law Liens; Interests in Real Property. With few exceptions (nonconsensual agricultural liens being one), this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] applies only to consensual security interests in personal property. Following former Section 9-104(b) and (j) [30-9-104(2) and (10), now repealed], paragraphs (1) and (11) of subsection (d) [subsections (4)(a) and (4)(k)] exclude landlord's liens and leases and most other interests in or liens on real property. These exclusions generally reiterate the limitations on coverage (i.e., "by contract," "in personal property and fixtures") made explicit in subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)]. Similarly, most jurisdictions provide special liens to suppliers of many types of services and materials, either by statute or by common law. With the exception of agricultural liens, it is not necessary for this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] to provide general codification of this lien structure, which is determined in large part by local conditions and which is far removed from ordinary commercial financing. As under former Section 9-104(c) [30-9-104(3), now repealed], subsection (d)(2) [subsection (4)(b)] excludes these suppliers' liens (other than agricultural liens) from this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. However, Section 9-333 [30-9A-333)] provides a rule for determining priorities between certain possessory suppliers' liens and security interests covered by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A].

11. Wage and Similar Claims. As under former Section 9-104(d) [30-9-104(4), now repealed], subsection (d)(3) [subsection (4)(c)] excludes assignments of claims for wages and the like from this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. These assignments present important social issues that other law addresses. The Federal Trade Commission has ruled that, with some exceptions, the taking of an assignment of wages or other earnings is an unfair act or practice under the Federal Trade Commission Act. See 16 C.F.R. Part 444. State statutes also may regulate such assignments.

12. Certain Sales and Assignments of Receivables; Judgments. In general this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] covers security interests in (including sales of) accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, and promissory notes. Paragraphs (4), (5), (6), and (7) of subsection (d) [subsections (4)(d), (4)(e), (4)(f), and (4)(g)] exclude from the Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] certain sales and assignments of receivables that, by their nature, do not concern commercial financing transactions. These paragraphs add to the exclusions in former Section 9-104(f) [30-9-104(6), now repealed] analogous sales and assignments of payment intangibles and promissory notes. For similar reasons, subsection (d)(9) [subsection (4)(i)] retains the exclusion of assignments of judgments under former Section 9-104(h) [30-9-104(8), now repealed] (other than judgments taken on a right to payment that itself was collateral under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]).

13. Insurance. Subsection (d)(8) [subsection (4)(h)] narrows somewhat the broad exclusion of interests in insurance policies under former Section 9-104(g) [30-9-104(7), now repealed]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] now covers assignments by or to a health-care provider of "health-care-insurance receivables" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]).

14. Set-Off. Subsection (d)(10) [subsection (4)(j)] adds two exceptions to the general exclusion of set-off rights from Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] under former Section 9-104(i) [30-9-104(9), now repealed]. The first takes account of new Section 9-340 [30-9A-340], which regulates the effectiveness of a set-off against a deposit account that stands as collateral. The second recognizes Section 9-404 [30-9A-404], which affords the obligor on an account, chattel paper, or general intangible the right to raise claims and defenses against an assignee (secured party).

15. Tort Claims. Subsection (d)(12) [subsection (4)(l)] narrows somewhat the broad exclusion of transfers of tort claims under former Section 9-104(k) [30-9-104(11), now repealed]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] now applies to assignments of "commercial tort claims" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]) as well as to security interests in tort claims that constitute proceeds of other collateral (e.g., a right to payment for negligent destruction of the debtor's inventory). Note that once a claim arising in tort has been settled and reduced to a contractual obligation to pay (as in, but not limited to, a structured settlement) the right to payment becomes a payment intangible and ceases to be a claim arising in tort.

This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] contains two special rules governing creation of a security interest in tort claims. First, a description of collateral in a security agreement as "all tort claims" is insufficient to meet the requirement for attachment. See Section 9-108(e) [30-9A-108(5)]. Second, no security interest attaches under an after-acquired property clause to a tort claim. See Section 9-204(b) [30-9A-204(2)]. In addition, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not determine whom the tortfeasor must pay to discharge its obligation. Inasmuch as a tortfeasor is not an "account debtor," the rules governing waiver of defenses and discharge of an obligation by an obligor (Sections 9-403, 9-404, 9-405, and 9-406) [30-9A-403, 30-9A-404, 30-9A-405, and 30-9A-406] are inapplicable to tort-claim collateral.

16. Deposit Accounts. Except in consumer transactions, deposit accounts may be taken as original collateral under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Under former Section 9-104(l) [30-9-104(12), now repealed], deposit accounts were excluded as original collateral, leaving security interests in deposit accounts to be governed by the common law. The common law is nonuniform, often difficult to discover and comprehend, and frequently costly to implement. As a consequence, debtors who wished to use deposit accounts as collateral sometimes were precluded from doing so as a practical matter. By excluding deposit accounts from the Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] scope as original collateral in consumer transactions, subsection (d)(13) [subsection (4)(m)] leaves those transactions to law other than this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. However, in both consumer and non-consumer transactions, sections 9-315 and 9-322 [30-9A-315 and 30-9A-322] apply to deposit accounts as proceeds and with respect to priorities in proceeds.

This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] contains several safeguards to protect debtors against inadvertently encumbering deposit accounts and to reduce the likelihood that a secured party will realize a windfall from a debtor's deposit accounts. For example, because "deposit account" is a separate type of collateral, a security agreement covering general intangibles will not adequately describe deposit accounts. Rather, a security agreement must reasonably identify the deposit accounts that are the subject of a security interest, e.g., by using the term "deposit accounts." See Section 9-108 [30-9A-108]. To perfect a security interest in a deposit account as original collateral, a secured party (other than the bank with which the deposit account is maintained) must obtain "control" of the account either by obtaining the bank's authenticated agreement or by becoming the bank's customer with respect to the deposit account. See Sections 9-312(b)(1), 9-104 [30-9A-312(2)(a) and 30-9A-104]. Either of these steps requires the debtor's consent.

This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] also contains new rules that determine which State's law governs perfection and priority of a security interest in a deposit account (Section 9-304 [30-9A-304]), priority of conflicting security interests in and set-off rights against a deposit account (Sections 9-327, 9-340 [30-9A-327 and 30-9A-340]), the rights of transferees of funds from an encumbered deposit account (Section 9-332 [30-9A-332]), the obligations of the bank (Section 9-341 [30-9A-341]), enforcement of security interests in a deposit account (Section 9-607(c) [30-9A-607(3)]), and the duty of a secured party to terminate control of a deposit account (Section 9-208(b) [30-9A-208(2)]).

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Inadequate Notice of Assignment — Escrow Agent Not Liable for Failure to Disburse Funds to Party With No Escrow Rights: Brandts invested in a condominium development corporation, loaning $20,000 to the corporation president. The promissory note exchanged for the loan provided that Brandts would be repaid with interest upon sale of a condominium to a family trust. Sande acted as escrow agent for the closing of the real estate sale and purchase transaction. The corporation president had instructed the title company to repay Brandts upon closing, but later rescinded that instruction, so funds from the purchase of the condominium were disbursed to the corporation and to various creditors instead of to Brandts. When the corporation was later sold, Brandts signed an agreement releasing and discharging their claims against the corporation. Nearly 2 years later, Brandts sued Sande and the title company for negligently and wrongfully applying $20,000 from the escrow account. The District Court summarily dismissed the suit and ordered sanctions against Brandts for filing a frivolous complaint. The court determined that there was neither a valid assignment nor legal notice of an assignment of Brandts' interest in the funds from the closing, so Sande owed no legal duty to Brandts. However, Brandts never asserted an irrevocable interest in the closing proceeds either prior to or during the time that the funds were in Sande's possession, nor did they execute a written assignment to ensure that the repayment instruction would not be rescinded. Under Montana law, an escrow agent or other account debtor must have adequate notice of an assignment before an assignee can hold the agent liable for wrongful payment. The promissory note did not reasonably identify the rights assigned and was thus ineffective. Brandts did not dispute that they were not a party to the escrow agreement, and because Sande had no notice of an assignment of the closing proceeds, he was not liable under an assignment theory. Sande simply fulfilled his fiduciary duty by strictly following the instructions of the principles to the escrow account, which did not assign any funds to Brandts. Summary dismissal was affirmed on grounds that Sande owed no legal duty to Brandts. Brandt v. Sande, 2000 MT 98, 299 M 256, 1 P3d 929, 57 St. Rep. 400 (2000), distinguishing Merchants & Miners Nat'l Bank v. Barnes, 18 M 335, 45 P 218 (1896).

30-9A-110. Security interests arising under chapter 2 or 2A.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-113 [30-9-113, now repealed].

2. Background. Former Section 9-113 [30-9-113, now repealed], from which this section derives, referred generally to security interests "arising solely under the Article on Sales (Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2]) or the Article on Leases (Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A])." Views differed as to the precise scope of that section. In contrast, Section 9-110 [30-9A-110] specifies the security interests to which it applies.

3. Security Interests Under Articles 2 and 2A [Title 30, chapters 2 and 2A]. Section 2-505 [30-2-505] explains how a seller of goods may reserve a security interest in them. Section 2-401 [30-2-401] indicates that a reservation of title by the seller of goods, despite delivery to the buyer, is limited to reservation of a security interest. As did former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9 , now repealed], this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] governs a security interest arising solely under one of those sections; however, until the buyer obtains possession of the goods, the security interest is enforceable even in the absence of a security agreement, filing is not necessary to perfect the security interest, and the seller-secured party's rights on the buyer's default are governed by Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2].

Sections 2-711(3) and 2A-508(5) [30-2-711(3) and 30-2A-508(5)] create a security interest in favor of a buyer or lessee in possession of goods that were rightfully rejected or as to which acceptance was justifiably revoked. As did former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] governs a security interest arising solely under one of those sections; however, until the seller or lessor obtains possession of the goods, the security interest is enforceable even in the absence of a security agreement, filing is not necessary to perfect the security interest, and the secured party's (buyer's or lessee's) rights on the debtor's (seller's or lessor's) default are governed by Article 2 or 2A [Title 30, chapter 2 or 2A], as the case may be.

4. Priority. This section adds to former Section 9-113 [30-9-113, now repealed] a priority rule. Until the debtor obtains possession of the goods, a security interest arising under one of the specified sections of Article 2 or 2A [Title 30, chapter 2 or 2A] has priority over conflicting security interests created by the debtor. Thus, a security interest arising under Section 2-401 or 2-505 [30-2-401 or 30-2-505] has priority over a conflicting security interest in the buyer's after-acquired goods, even if the goods in question are inventory. Arguably, the same result would obtain under Section 9-322 [30-9A-322], but even if it would not, a purchase-money-like priority is appropriate. Similarly, a security interest under Section 2-711(3) or 2A-508(5) [30-2-711(3) or 30-2A-508(5)] has priority over security interests claimed by the seller's or lessor's secured lender. This result is appropriate, inasmuch as the payments giving rise to the debt secured by the Article 2 or 2A [Title 30, chapter 2 or 2A] security interest are likely to be included among the lender's proceeds.

Example: Seller owns equipment subject to a security interest created by Seller in favor of Lender. Buyer pays for the equipment, accepts the goods, and then justifiably revokes acceptance. As long as Seller does not recover possession of the equipment, Buyer's security interest under Section 2-711(3) [30-2-711(3)] is senior to that of Lender.

In the event that a security interest referred to in this section conflicts with a security interest that is created by a person other than the debtor, Section 9-325 [30-9A-325] applies. Thus, if Lender's security interest in the example was created not by Seller but by the person from whom Seller acquired the goods, Section 9-325 [30-9A-325] would govern.

5. Relationship to Other Rights and Remedies Under Articles 2 and 2A [Title 30, chapters 2 and 2A]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not specifically address the conflict between (i) a security interest created by a buyer or lessee and (ii) the seller's or lessor's right to withhold delivery under Section 2-702(1), 2-703(a), or 2A-525 [30-2-702(1), 30-2-703(1), or 30-2A-525], the seller's or lessor's right to stop delivery under Section 2-705 or 2A-526 [30-2-705 or 30-2A-526], or the seller's right to reclaim under Section 2-507(2) or 2-702(2) [30-2-507(2) or 30-2-702(2)]. These conflicts are governed by the first sentence of Section 2-403(1) [30-2-403(1)], under which the buyer's secured party obtains no greater rights in the goods than the buyer had or had power to convey, or Section 2A-307(1) [30-2A-307(1)], under which creditors of the lessee take subject to the lease contract.

Part 2
Effectiveness of Security Agreement — Attachment of Security Interest — Rights of Parties to Security Agreement

Part Compiler's Comments

Saving Clause: Section 169, Ch. 305, L. 1999, provided: "(1) Except as otherwise provided in [sections 164 through 169] [sections 162 through 167—30-9A-703 through 30-9A-706, 30-9A-708, and 30-9A-709], [this act] applies to a transaction or lien within its scope, even if the transaction or lien was entered into or created before [this act] takes effect.

(2) Except as otherwise provided in subsection (3) and [sections 164 through 169] [sections 162 through 167—30-9A-703 through 30-9A-706, 30-9A-708, and 30-9A-709]:

(a) transactions and liens that were not governed by [former chapter 9, now repealed] were validly entered into or created before [this act] takes effect and would be subject to [this act] if they had been entered into or created after [this act] takes effect, and the rights, duties, and interests flowing from those transactions and liens remain valid after [this act] takes effect; and

(b) the transactions and liens may be terminated, completed, consummated, or enforced as required or permitted by [this act] or by the law that otherwise would apply if [this act] did not take effect.

(3) [This act] does not affect an action, case, or proceeding commenced before [this act] takes effect."

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Sections 9-201, 9-203(4) [30-9-201, 30-9-203(4), both now repealed].

2. Effectiveness of Security Agreement. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that a security agreement is generally effective. With certain exceptions, a security agreement is effective between the debtor and secured party and is likewise effective against third parties. Note that "security agreement" is used here (and elsewhere in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]) as it is defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]: "an agreement that creates or provides for a security interest." It follows that subsection (a) [subsection (1)] does not provide that every term or provision contained in a record that contains a security agreement or that is so labeled is effective. Properly read, former Section 9-201 [30-9-201, now repealed] was to the same effect. Exceptions to the general rule of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] arise where there is an overriding provision in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] or any other Article [chapter] of the UCC. For example, Section 9-317 [30-9A-317] subordinates unperfected security interests to lien creditors and certain buyers, and several provisions in Part 3 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 3] subordinate some security interests to other security interests and interests of purchasers.

3. Law, Statutes, and Regulations Applicable to Certain Transactions. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] makes clear that certain transactions, although subject to this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], also are subject to other applicable laws relating to consumers or specified in that subsection. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that the other law is controlling in the event of a conflict, and that a violation of other law does not ipso facto constitute a violation of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides that this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not validate violations under or extend the application of the other applicable laws.

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM TRUST RECEIPTS ACT

Validity of Trust Receipt Transactions: One of the purposes of the Uniform Trust Receipts Act, sections 65-201 through 65-219, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), is to make bipartite trust receipt transactions as valid as tripartite trust transactions. Keating v. Univ. Underwriters Ins. Co., 133 M 89, 320 P2d 351 (1958).

30-9A-202. Title to collateral immaterial.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-202 [30-9-202, now repealed].

2. Title Immaterial. The rights and duties of parties to a secured transaction and affected third parties are provided in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] without reference to the location of "title" to the collateral. For example, the characteristics of a security interest that secures the purchase price of goods are the same whether the secured party appears to have retained title or the debtor appears to have obtained title and then conveyed title or a lien to the secured party.

3. When Title Matters.

a. Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. This section explicitly acknowledges two circumstances in which the effect of certain Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] provisions turns on ownership (title). First, in some respects sales of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, and promissory notes receive special treatment. See, e.g., Sections 9-207(a), 9-210(b), 9-615(e) [30-9A-207(1), 30-9A-210(2), and 30-9A-615(5)]. Buyers of receivables under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] were treated specially, as well. See, e.g., former Section 9-502(2) [30-9-502(2), now repealed, see 30-9A-608]. Second, the remedies of a consignor under a true consignment and, for the most part, the remedies of a buyer of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes are determined by other law and not by Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. See Section 9-601(g) [30-9A-601(7)].

b. Under Other Law. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not determine which line of interpretation (e.g., title theory or lien theory, retained title or conveyed title) should be followed in cases in which the applicability of another rule of law depends upon who has title. If, for example, a revenue law imposes a tax on the "legal" owner of goods or if a corporation law makes a vote of the stockholders prerequisite to a corporation "giving" a security interest but not if it acquires property "subject" to a security interest, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not attempt to define whether the secured party is a "legal" owner or whether the transaction "gives" a security interest for the purpose of such laws. Other rules of law or the agreement of the parties determines the location and source of title for those purposes.

30-9A-203. Attachment and enforcement of security interest — proceeds — supporting obligations — formal requisites.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Sections 9-203, 9-115(2), (6) [30-9-203, 30-9-115(2), (6), both now repealed, see 30-9A-308, 30-9A-313, and this section].

2. Creation, Attachment, and Enforceability. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] states the general rule that a security interest attaches to collateral only when it becomes enforceable against the debtor. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] specifies the circumstances under which a security interest becomes enforceable. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] states three basic prerequisites to the existence of a security interest: value (paragraph (1) [subsection (2)(a)]), rights or power to transfer rights in collateral (paragraph (2) [subsection (2)(b)]), and agreement plus satisfaction of an evidentiary requirement (paragraph (3) [subsection (2)(c)]). When all of these elements exist, a security interest becomes enforceable between the parties and attaches under subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] identifies certain exceptions to the general rule of subsection (b) [subsection (2)].

3. Security Agreement; Authentication. Under subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)], enforceability requires the debtor's security agreement and compliance with an evidentiary requirement in the nature of a Statute of Frauds. Paragraph (3)(A) [subsection (2)(c)(i)] represents the most basic of the evidentiary alternatives, under which the debtor must authenticate a security agreement that provides a description of the collateral. Under Section 9-102 [30-9A-102], a "security agreement" is "an agreement that creates or provides for a security interest." Neither that definition nor the requirement of paragraph (3)(A) [subsection (2)(c)(i)] rejects the deeply rooted doctrine that a bill of sale, although absolute in form, may be shown in fact to have been given as security. Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], as under prior law, a debtor may show by parol evidence that a transfer purporting to be absolute was in fact for security. Similarly, a self-styled "lease" may serve as a security agreement if the agreement creates a security interest. See Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)] (distinguishing security interest from lease).

4. Possession, Delivery, or Control Pursuant to Security Agreement. The other alternatives in subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)] dispense with the requirement of an authenticated security agreement and provide alternative evidentiary tests. Under paragraph (3)(B) [subsection (2)(c)(ii)], the secured party's possession substitutes for the debtor's authentication under paragraph (3)(A) [subsection (2)(c)(i)] if the secured party's possession is "pursuant to the debtor's security agreement." That phrase refers to the debtor's agreement to the secured party's possession for the purpose of creating a security interest. The phrase should not be confused with the phrase "debtor has authenticated a security agreement," used in paragraph (3)(A) [subsection (2)(c)(i)], which contemplates the debtor's authentication of a record. In the unlikely event that possession is obtained without the debtor's agreement, possession would not suffice as a substitute for an authenticated security agreement. However, once the security interest has become enforceable and has attached, it is not impaired by the fact that the secured party's possession is maintained without the agreement of a subsequent debtor (e.g., a transferee). Possession as contemplated by Section 9-313 [30-9A-313] is possession for purposes of subsection (b)(3)(B) [subsection (2)(c)(ii)], even though it may not constitute possession "pursuant to the debtor's agreement" and consequently might not serve as a substitute for an authenticated security agreement under subsection (b)(3)(A) [subsection (2)(c)(i)]. Subsection (b)(3)(C) [subsection (2)(c)(iii)] provides that delivery of a certificated security to the secured party under Section 8-301 [30-8-331] pursuant to the debtor's security agreement is sufficient as a substitute for an authenticated security agreement. Similarly, under subsection (b)(3)(D) [subsection (2)(c)(iv)], control of investment property, a deposit account, electronic chattel paper, or a letter-of-credit right satisfies the evidentiary test if control is pursuant to the debtor's security agreement.

5. Collateral Covered by Other Statute or Treaty. One evidentiary purpose of the formal requisites stated in subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is to minimize the possibility of future disputes as to the terms of a security agreement (e.g., as to the property that stands as collateral for the obligation secured). One should distinguish the evidentiary functions of the formal requisites of attachment and enforceability (such as the requirement that a security agreement contain a description of the collateral) from the more limited goals of "notice filing" for financing statements under Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5], explained in Section 9-502 [30-9A-502], Comment 2. When perfection is achieved by compliance with the requirements of a statute or treaty described in Section 9-311(a) [30-9A-311(1)], such as a federal recording act or a certificate-of-title statute, the manner of describing the collateral in a registry imposed by the statute or treaty may or may not be adequate for purposes of this section and Section 9-108 [30-9A-108]. However, the description contained in the security agreement, not the description in a public registry or on a certificate of title, controls for purposes of this section.

6. Debtor's Rights; Debtor's Power to Transfer Rights. Subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)] conditions attachment on the debtor's having "rights in the collateral or the power to transfer rights in the collateral to a secured party." A debtor's limited rights in collateral, short of full ownership, are sufficient for a security interest to attach. However, in accordance with basic personal property conveyancing principles, the baseline rule is that a security interest attaches only to whatever rights a debtor may have, broad or limited as those rights may be.

Certain exceptions to the baseline rule enable a debtor to transfer, and a security interest to attach to, greater rights than the debtor has. See Part 3, Subpart 3 [30-9A-317 through 30-9A-339] (priority rules). The phrase, "or the power to transfer rights in the collateral to a secured party," accommodates those exceptions. In some cases, a debtor may have power to transfer another person's rights only to a class of transferees that excludes secured parties. See, e.g., Section 2-403(2) [30-2-403(2)] (giving certain merchants power to transfer an entruster's rights to a buyer in ordinary course of business). Under those circumstances, the debtor would not have the power to create a security interest in the other person's rights, and the condition in subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(B)] would not be satisfied.

7. New Debtors. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] makes clear that the enforceability requirements of subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)] are met when a new debtor becomes bound under an original debtor's security agreement. If a new debtor becomes bound as debtor by a security agreement entered into by another person, the security agreement satisfies the requirement of subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)] as to the existing and after-acquired property of the new debtor to the extent the property is described in the agreement.

Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] explains when a new debtor becomes bound. Persons who become bound under paragraph (2) [subsection (4)(b)] are limited to those who both become primarily liable for the original debtor's obligations and succeed to (or acquire) its assets. Thus, the paragraph [subsection] excludes sureties and other secondary obligors as well as persons who become obligated through veil piercing and other non-successorship doctrines. In many cases, paragraph (2) [subsection (4)(b)] will exclude successors to the assets and liabilities of a division of a debtor. See also Section 9-508 [30-9A-508], Comment 3.

8. Supporting Obligations. Under subsection (f) [subsection (6)], a security interest in a "supporting obligation" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]) automatically follows from a security interest in the underlying, supported collateral. This result was implicit under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. Implicit in subsection (f) [subsection (6)] is the principle that the secured party's interest in a supporting obligation extends to the supporting obligation only to the extent that it supports the collateral in which the secured party has a security interest. Complex issues may arise, however, if a supporting obligation supports many separate obligations of a particular account debtor and if the supported obligations are separately assigned as security to several secured parties. The problems may be exacerbated if a supporting obligation is limited to an aggregate amount that is less than the aggregate amount of the obligations it supports. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not contain provisions dealing with competing claims to a limited supporting obligation. As under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], the law of suretyship and the agreements of the parties will control.

9. Collateral Follows Right to Payment or Performance. Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] codifies the common-law rule that a transfer of an obligation secured by a security interest or other lien on personal or real property also transfers the security interest or lien. See Restatement (3d), Property (Mortgages) §5.4(a) (1997). See also Section 9-308(e) [30-9A-308(5)] (analogous rule for perfection).

10. Investment Property. Subsections (h) and (i) [subsections (8) and (9)] make clear that attachment of a security interest in a securities account or commodity account is also attachment in security entitlements or commodity contracts carried in the accounts.

DECISIONS UNDER U.C.C.
PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Generally Worded After-Acquired Property Security Interest: Security interest covered all goods used in rental business, including but not limited to machinery, equipment, and inventory held for sale or rent "existing or hereafter acquired". Lower court's conclusion that a general description of items covered was insufficient and that trailers, hoppers, mixer, and loader used by renters to make, haul, and pour cement were not covered was erroneous. Further, the conclusion that there could be no security interest because those items were not financed by the holder of the security interest was also erroneous. Taylor Rental Corp. v. Ted Godwin Leasing, Inc., 209 M 124, 681 P2d 691, 41 St. Rep. 594 (1984).

Novation of Lease — New Lessee's Obligation Not Affected by His Ownership Rights: Franchisor took possession of franchise after franchisee indicated a desire to sell the franchise. To make the franchise more attractive to prospective purchasers, franchisor agreed with Godwin, who had leased equipment to the franchise, to make the rental payments on the equipment if Godwin would forgo repossession of the equipment. In a proceeding involving right to possession of the equipment and recovery of rental payments, although franchisor claimed a right under the Uniform Commercial Code to possession of the equipment under its security agreement with franchisee, the lower court correctly found franchisor liable for rent. That franchisor may have been entitled to possession did not preclude it from making a binding agreement with Godwin to take over franchisee's rental payments. Taylor Rental Corp. v. Ted Godwin Leasing, Inc., 209 M 124, 681 P2d 691, 41 St. Rep. 594 (1984).

Foreclosure by Secured Party Who Is Also Escrow Agent: Plaintiff bought a photography business and executed a promissory note with defendant. As collateral he assigned stock in the business. Plaintiff sold the business to Wolfe. Wolfe was to make payments to defendant to discharge his obligations, and these payments were to be directly applied to plaintiff's obligation under the promissory note. Defendant was escrow agent. Plaintiff later signed a financing statement granting defendant a security interest in the stock held in escrow. The defendant filed the security agreement. Wolfe became delinquent in his payments, and defendant notified plaintiff his payments were therefore delinquent. A later letter was sent by certified mail to the same address advising plaintiff the stock would be sold and applied to plaintiff's past-due loan. At the sale Wolfe bought the stock for the amount due on plaintiff's note. Plaintiff claimed defendant had breached its fiduciary duty by foreclosing on the stock. The security interest became binding (attached) before the parties entered the escrow agreement. The security interest continued in the collateral notwithstanding the sale to Wolfe. Upon default defendant acted within its statutory rights to foreclose on the collateral to satisfy plaintiff's obligation. The escrow arrangement did not prevent defendant as a secured party from exercising its rights to foreclose on collateral on which the debtor defaulted. Dulan v. Mont. Nat'l Bank of Roundup, 203 M 177, 661 P2d 28, 40 St. Rep. 376 (1983), followed in Weldon v. First Citizens Bank of Billings, 259 M 305, 856 P2d 225, 50 St. Rep. 807 (1993).

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM TRUST RECEIPTS ACT

Object of Trust Receipt Transactions: A cardinal object of trust receipt transactions is to enable the borrower to sell the goods in order to pay the lender, but the transactions never have for their object the vesting of ownership in the dealer. Keating v. Univ. Underwriters Ins. Co., 133 M 89, 320 P2d 351 (1958).

Type of Trust Receipt Transactions: When the financier advances funds for the purchase of the chattel, purchases it and receives title to it from the manufacturer, and delivers possession to the dealer, who gives his trust receipt to the financier, it is a tripartite or true orthodox trust receipt transaction, and where the dealer has title and gives his receipt to the financier it is a bipartite trust receipt transaction. Keating v. Univ. Underwriters Ins. Co., 133 M 89, 320 P2d 351 (1958).

30-9A-204. After acquired property — future advances.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-204 [30-9-204, now repealed].

2. After-Acquired Property; Continuing General Lien. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] makes clear that a security interest arising by virtue of an after-acquired property clause is no less valid than a security interest in collateral in which the debtor has rights at the time value is given. A security interest in after-acquired property is not merely an "equitable" interest; no further action by the secured party-such as a supplemental agreement covering the new collateral-is required. This section adopts the principle of a "continuing general lien" or "floating lien." It validates a security interest in the debtor's existing and (upon acquisition) future assets, even though the debtor has liberty to use or dispose of collateral without being required to account for proceeds or substitute new collateral. See Section 9-205 [30-9A-205]. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)], together with subsection (c) [subsection (3)], also validates "cross-collateral" clauses under which collateral acquired at any time secures advances whenever made.

3. After-Acquired Consumer Goods. Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] makes ineffective an after-acquired property clause covering consumer goods (defined in Section 9-109

[30-9A-109]), except as accessions (see Section 9-335 [30-9A-335]), acquired more than ten days after the secured party gives value. Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] is unchanged in substance from the corresponding provision in former Section 9-204(2) [30-9-204(2), now repealed].

4. Commercial Tort Claims. Subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)] provides that an after-acquired property clause in a security agreement does not reach future commercial tort claims. In order for a security interest in a tort claim to attach, the claim must be in existence when the security agreement is authenticated. In addition, the security agreement must describe the tort claim with greater specificity than simply "all tort claims." See Section 9-108(e) [30-9A-108(5)].

5. Future Advances; Obligations Secured. Under subsection (c) [subsection (3)] collateral may secure future as well as past or present advances if the security agreement so provides. This is in line with the policy of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] toward security interests in after-acquired property under subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. Indeed, the parties are free to agree that a security interest secures any obligation whatsoever. Determining the obligations secured by collateral is solely a matter of construing the parties' agreement under applicable law. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] rejects the holdings of cases decided under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] that applied other tests, such as whether a future advance or other subsequently incurred obligation was of the same or a similar type or class as earlier advances and obligations secured by the collateral.

6. Sales of Receivables. Subsections (a) and (c) [subsections (1) and (3)] expressly validate after-acquired property and future advance clauses not only when the transaction is for security purposes but also when the transaction is the sale of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes.. This result was implicit under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed].

7. Financing Statements. The effect of after-acquired property and future advance clauses as components of a security agreement should not be confused with the requirements applicable to financing statements under this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] system of perfection by notice filing. The references to after-acquired property clauses and future advance clauses in this section are limited to security agreements. There is no need to refer to after-acquired property or future advances or other obligations secured in a financing statement. See Section 9-502 [30-9A-502], Comment 2.

Joint Tenancy Auto Title — Effect on Default: Prior to the 1983 amendment to 30-9-204 (now repealed, see this section), when defendant borrowed from plaintiff on auto collateral registered in his "and/or" another's name, the plaintiff bank was entitled to sell the auto upon defendant's default and receive one-half of the proceeds even though the bank's security interest was unperfected at the time of defendant's fraudulent assignment of his interest to his sister without value. The joint tenancy interest of the defendant was severed upon his default, and the bank became tenant in common with the holder of the remaining interest in the auto. First Westside Nat'l Bank v. 2. Validity of Unrestricted "Floating Lien." This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] expressly validates the "floating lien" on shifting collateral. See Sections 9-201, 9-204 [30-9A-201 and 30-9A-204] and Comment 2. This section provides that a security interest is not invalid or fraudulent by reason of the debtor's liberty to dispose of the collateral without being required to account to the secured party for proceeds or substitute new collateral. As did former Section 9-205 [30-9-205, now repealed], this section repeals the rule of Benedict v. Ratner, 268 U.S. 353 (1925), and other cases which held such arrangements void as a matter of law because the debtor was given unfettered dominion or control over collateral. The Benedict rule did not effectively discourage or eliminate security transactions in inventory and receivables. Instead, it forced financing arrangements to be self-liquidating. Although this section repeals Benedict, the filing and other perfection requirements (see Part 3, Subpart 2 [30-9A-308 through 30-9A-316], and Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5]) provide for public notice that overcomes any potential misleading effects of a debtor's use and control of collateral. Moreover, nothing in this section prevents the debtor and secured party from agreeing to procedures by which the secured party polices or monitors collateral or to restrictions on the debtor's dominion. However, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] leaves these matters to agreement based on business considerations, not on legal requirements.

3. Possessory Security Interests. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] makes clear that this section does not relax the requirements for perfection by possession under Section 9-315 [30-9A-315]. If a secured party allows the debtor access to and control over collateral its security interest may be or become unperfected.

4. Permissible Freedom for Debtor to Enforce Collateral. Former Section 9-205 [30-9-205, now repealed] referred to a debtor's "liberty . . to collect or compromise accounts or chattel paper." This section recognizes the broader rights of a debtor to "enforce," as well as to "collect" and "compromise" collateral. This section's reference to collecting, compromising, and enforcing "collateral" instead of "accounts or chattel paper" contemplates the many other types of collateral that a debtor may wish to "collect, compromise, or enforce": e.g., deposit accounts, documents, general intangibles, instruments, investment property, and letter-of-credit rights.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former 9-116 [30-9-116, now repealed].

2. Codification of "Broker's Lien." Depending upon a securities intermediary's arrangements with its entitlement holders, the securities intermediary may treat the entitlement holder as entitled to financial assets before the entitlement holder has actually made payment for them. For example, many brokers permit retail customers to pay for financial assets by check. The broker may not receive final payment of the check until several days after the broker has credited the customer's securities account for the financial assets. Thus, the customer will have acquired a security entitlement prior to payment. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that, in such circumstances, the securities intermediary has a security interest in the entitlement holder's security entitlement. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] the security interest secures the customer's obligation to pay for the financial asset in question. Subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] codify and adapt to the indirect holding system the so-called "broker's lien," which has long been recognized. See Restatement, Security §12.

3. Financial Assets Delivered Against Payment. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] creates a security interest in favor of persons who deliver certificated securities or other financial assets in physical form, such as money market instruments, if the agreed payment is not received. In some arrangements for settlement of transactions in physical financial assets, the seller's securities custodian will deliver physical certificates to the buyer's securities custodian and receive a time-stamped delivery receipt. The buyer's securities custodian will examine the certificate to ensure that it is in good order, and that the delivery matches a trade in which the buyer has instructed the seller to deliver to that custodian. If all is in order, the receiving custodian will settle with the delivering custodian through whatever funds settlement system has been agreed upon or is used by custom and usage in that market. The understanding of the trade, however, is that the delivery is conditioned upon payment, so that if payment is not made for any reason, the security will be returned to the deliverer. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] clarifies the rights of persons making deliveries in such circumstances. It provides the person making delivery with a security interest in the securities or other financial assets; under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], the security interest secures the seller's right to receive payment for the delivery. Section 8-301 [30-8-331] specifies when delivery of a certificated security occurs; that section should be applied as well to other financial assets as well for purposes of this section.

4. Automatic Attachment and Perfection. Subsections (a) and (c) [subsections (1) and (3)] refer to attachment of a security interest. Attachment under this section has the same incidents (enforceability, right to proceeds, etc.) as attachment under Section 9-203 [30-9A-203]. This section overrides the general attachment rules in Section 9-203 [30-9A-203]. See Section 9-203(c) [30-9A-203(3)]. A securities intermediary's security interest under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is perfected by control without further action. See Section 8-106 [30-8-116] (control); 9-314 [30-9A-314] (perfection). Security interests arising under subsection (c) [subsection (3)] are automatically perfected. See Section 9-309(9) [30-9A-309(9)].

30-9A-207. Rights and duties of secured party having possession or control of collateral.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-207 [30-9-207, now repealed].

2. Duty of Care for Collateral in Secured Party's Possession. Like former section 9-207 [30-9-207, now repealed], subsection (a) [subsection (1)] imposes a duty of care, similar to that imposed on a pledgee at common law, on a secured party in possession of collateral. See Restatement, Security §§17, 18. In many cases a secured party in possession of collateral may satisfy this duty by notifying the debtor of action that should be taken and allowing the debtor to take the action itself. If the secured party itself takes action, its reasonable expenses may be added to the secured obligation. The revised definitions of "collateral," "debtor," and "secured party" in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] make this section applicable to collateral subject to an agricultural lien if the collateral is in the lienholder's possession. Under Section 1-102 [30-1-102] the duty to exercise reasonable care may not be disclaimed by agreement, although under that section the parties remain free to determine by agreement standards that are not manifestly unreasonable as to what constitutes reasonable care. Unless otherwise agreed, for a secured party in possession of chattel paper or an instrument, reasonable care includes the preservation of rights against prior parties. The secured party's right to have instruments or documents indorsed or transferred to it or its order is dealt with in the relevant sections of Articles 3, 7, and 8 [Title 30, chapters 3, 7, and 8]. See Sections 3-201, 7-506, 8-304(d) [30-3-210, 30-7-506, 30-8-115].

3. Specific Rules When Secured Party in Possession or Control of Collateral. Subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)] provide rules following common-law precedents which apply unless the parties otherwise agree. The rules in subsection (b) [subsection (2)] apply to typical issues that may arise while a secured party is in possession of collateral, including expenses, insurance, and taxes, risk of loss or damage, identifiable and fungible collateral, and use or operation of collateral. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] contains rules that apply in certain circumstances that may arise when a secured party is in either possession or control of collateral. These circumstances include the secured party's receiving proceeds from the collateral and the secured party's creation of a security interest in the collateral.

4. Applicability Following Default. This section applies when the secured party has possession of collateral either before or after default. See Sections 9-601(b), 9-609 [30-9A-601(2) and 30-9A-609]. Subsection (b)(4)(C) [subsection (2)(d)(iii)] limits agreements concerning the use or operation of collateral to collateral other than consumer goods. Under Section 9-602(1) [30-9A-602(1)], a debtor cannot waive or vary that limitation.

5. "Repledges" and Right of Redemption. Subsection (c)(3) [subsection (3)(c)] eliminates the qualification in former Section 9-207 [30-9-207, now repealed] to the effect that the terms of a "repledge" may not "impair" a debtor's "right to redeem" collateral. The change is primarily for clarification. There is no basis on which to draw from subsection (c)(3) [subsection (3)(c)] any inference concerning the debtor's right to redeem the collateral. The debtor enjoys that right under Section 9-621 [30-9A-621]; this section need not address it. For example, if the collateral is a negotiable note that the secured party (SP-1) repledges to SP-2, nothing in this section suggests that the debtor (D) does not retain the right to redeem the note upon payment to SP-1 of all obligations secured by the note. But, as explained below, the debtor's unimpaired right to redeem as against the debtor's original secured party nevertheless may not be enforceable as against the new secured party.

In resolving questions that arise from the creation of a security interest by SP-1, one must take care to distinguish D's rights against SP-1 from D's rights against SP-2. Once D discharges the secured obligation, D becomes entitled to the note; SP-1 has no legal basis upon which to withhold it. If, as a practical matter, SP-1 is unable to return the note because SP-2 holds it as collateral for SP-1's unpaid debt, then SP-1 is liable to D under the law of conversion.

Whether SP-2 would be liable to D depends on the relative priority of SP-2's security interest and D's interest. By permitting SP-1 to create a security interest in the collateral (repledge), subsection (c)(3) [subsection (3)(c)] provides a statutory power for SP-1 to give SP-2 a security interest (subject, of course, to any agreement by SP-1 not to give a security interest). In the vast majority of cases where repledge rights are significant, the security interest of the second secured party, SP-2 in the example, will be senior to the debtor's interest. By virtue of the debtor's consent or applicable legal rules, SP-2 typically would cut off D's rights in investment property or be immune from D's claims. See Sections 9-331, 3-306 [30-9A-331 and 30-9A-306] (holder in due course), 8-303 [30-8-332] (protected purchaser), 8-502 [30-8-502] (acquisition of a security entitlement), 8-503(e) [30-8-503(5)] (action by entitlement holder). Moreover, the expectations and business practices in some markets, such as the securities markets, are such that D's consent to SP-2's taking free of D's rights inheres in D's creation of SP-1's security interest which gives rise to SP-1's power under this section. In these situations, D would have no right to recover the collateral or recover damages from SP-2. Nevertheless, D would have a damage claim against SP-1 if SP-1 had given a security interest to SP-2 in breach of its agreement with D. Moreover, if SP-2's security interest secures an amount that is less than the amount secured by SP-1's security interest (granted by D), then D's exercise of its right to redeem would provide value sufficient to discharge SP-1's obligations to SP-2.

For the most part this section does not change the law under former Section 9-207 [30-9-207, now repealed], although eliminating the reference to the debtor's right of redemption may alter the secured party's right to repledge in one respect. Former Section 9-207 [30-9-207, now repealed] could have been read to limit the secured party's statutory right to repledge collateral to repledge transactions in which the collateral did not secure a greater obligation than that of the original debtor. Inasmuch as this is a matter normally dealt with by agreement between the debtor and secured party, any change would appear to have little practical effect.

6. "Repledges" of Investment Property. The following example will aid the discussion of "repledges" of investment property.

Example. Debtor grants Alpha Bank a security interest in a security entitlement that includes 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock that Debtor holds through an account with Able & Co. Alpha does not have an account with Able. Alpha uses Beta Bank as its securities custodian. Debtor instructs Able to transfer the shares to Beta, for the account of Alpha, and Able does so. Beta then credits Alpha's account. Alpha has control of the security entitlement for the 1000 shares under Section 8-106(d) [30-8-116(4)]. (These are the facts of Example 2, Section 8-106 [30-8-116], Comment 4.) Although, as between Debtor and Alpha, Debtor may have become the beneficial owner of the new securities entitlement with Beta, Beta has agreed to act on Alpha's entitlement orders because, as between Beta and Alpha, Alpha has become the entitlement holder.

Next, Alpha grants Gamma Bank a security interest in the security entitlement with Beta that includes the 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock. In order to afford Gamma control of the entitlement, Alpha instructs Beta to transfer the stock to Gamma's custodian, Delta Bank, which credits Gamma's account for 1000 shares. At this point Gamma holds its securities entitlement for its benefit as well as that of its debtor, Alpha. Alpha's derivative rights also are for the benefit of Debtor.

In many, probably most, situations and at any particular point in time, it will be impossible for Debtor or Alpha to "trace" Alpha's "repledge" to any particular securities entitlement or financial asset of Gamma or anyone else. Debtor would retain, of course, a right to redeem the collateral from Alpha upon satisfaction of the secured obligation. However, in the absence of a traceable interest, Debtor would retain only a personal claim against Alpha in the event Alpha failed to restore the security entitlement to Debtor. Moreover, even in the unlikely event that Debtor could trace a property interest, in the context of the financial markets, normally the operation of this section, Debtor's explicit agreement to permit Alpha to create a senior security interest, or legal rules permitting Gamma to cut off Debtor's rights or become immune from Debtor's claims would effectively subordinate Debtor's interest to the holder of a security interest created by Alpha. And, under the shelter principle, all subsequent transferees would obtain interests to which Debtor's interest also would be subordinate.

7. Buyers of Chattel Paper and Other Receivables; Consignors. This section has been revised to reflect the fact that a seller of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes retains no interest in the collateral and so is not disadvantaged by the secured party's noncompliance with the requirements of this section. Accordingly, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides that subsection (a) [subsection (1)] applies only to security interests that secure an obligation and to sales of receivables in which the buyer has recourse against the debtor. (Of course, a buyer of accounts or payment intangibles could not have "possession" of original collateral, but might have possession of proceeds, such as promissory notes or checks.) The meaning of "recourse" in this respect is limited to recourse arising out of the account debtor's failure to pay or other default.

Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] makes subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)] inapplicable to buyers of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes and consignors. Of course, there is no reason to believe that a buyer of receivables or a consignor could not, for example, create a security interest or otherwise transfer an interest in the collateral, regardless of who has possession of the collateral. However, this section leaves the rights of those owners to law other than Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A].

30-9A-208. Additional duties of secured party having control of collateral.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Scope and Purpose. This section imposes duties on a secured party who has control of a deposit account, electronic chattel paper, investment property, or a letter-of-credit right. The duty to terminate the secured party's control is analogous to the duty to file a termination statement, imposed by Section 9-513 [30-9A-513]. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1)], it applies only when there is no outstanding secured obligation and the secured party is not committed to give value. The requirements of this section can be varied by agreement under Section 1-102(3) [30-1-102(3)]. For example, a debtor could by contract agree that the secured party may release its control of investment property under subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] more than three days following demand. Also, duties under this section should not be read to conflict with the terms of the collateral itself. For example, if the collateral is a time deposit account, subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)] should not require a secured party with control to make an early withdrawal of the funds (assuming that were possible) in order to pay them over to the debtor or put them in an account in the debtor's name.

3. Remedy for Failure to Relinquish Control. If a secured party fails to comply with the requirements of subsection (b) [subsection (2)], the debtor has the remedy set forth in Section 9-625(e) [30-9A-625(5)]. This remedy is identical to that applicable to failure to provide or file a termination statement under Section 9-513 [30-9A-513].

4. Duty to Relinquish Possession. Although Section 9-207 [30-9A-207] addresses directly the duties of a secured party in possession of collateral, that section does not require the secured party to relinquish possession when the secured party ceases to hold a security interest.

Under common law, absent agreement to the contrary, the failure to relinquish possession of collateral upon satisfaction of the secured obligation would constitute a conversion. Inasmuch as problems apparently have not surfaced in the absence of statutory duties under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] and the common-law duty appears to have been sufficient, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not impose a statutory duty to relinquish possession.

1. Source. New.

2. Scope and Purpose. Like Sections 9-208 and 9-513 [30-9A-208 and 30-9A-513], which require a secured party to relinquish control of collateral and to file or provide a termination statement for a financing statement, this section requires a secured party to free up collateral when there no longer is any outstanding secured obligation or any commitment to give value in the future. This section addresses the case in which account debtors have been notified to pay a secured party to whom the receivables have been assigned. It requires the secured party (assignee) to inform the account debtors that they no longer are obligated to make payment to the secured party. See subsection (b) [subsection (2)]. It does not apply to account debtors whose obligations on an account, chattel paper, or payment intangible have been sold. See subsection (c) [subsection (3)].

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Inadequate Notice of Assignment — Escrow Agent Not Liable for Failure to Disburse Funds to Party With No Escrow Rights: Brandts invested in a condominium development corporation, loaning $20,000 to the corporation president. The promissory note exchanged for the loan provided that Brandts would be repaid with interest upon sale of a condominium to a family trust. Sande acted as escrow agent for the closing of the real estate sale and purchase transaction. The corporation president had instructed the title company to repay Brandts upon closing, but later rescinded that instruction, so funds from the purchase of the condominium were disbursed to the corporation and to various creditors instead of to Brandts. When the corporation was later sold, Brandts signed an agreement releasing and discharging their claims against the corporation. Nearly 2 years later, Brandts sued Sande and the title company for negligently and wrongfully applying $20,000 from the escrow account. The District Court summarily dismissed the suit and ordered sanctions against Brandts for filing a frivolous complaint. The court determined that there was neither a valid assignment nor legal notice of an assignment of Brandts' interest in the funds from the closing, so Sande owed no legal duty to Brandts. However, Brandts never asserted an irrevocable interest in the closing proceeds either prior to or during the time that the funds were in Sande's possession, nor did they execute a written assignment to ensure that the repayment instruction would not be rescinded. Under Montana law, an escrow agent or other account debtor must have adequate notice of an assignment before an assignee can hold the agent liable for wrongful payment. The promissory note did not reasonably identify the rights assigned and was thus ineffective. Brandts did not dispute that they were not a party to the escrow agreement, and because Sande had no notice of an assignment of the closing proceeds, he was not liable under an assignment theory. Sande simply fulfilled his fiduciary duty by strictly following the instructions of the principles to the escrow account, which did not assign any funds to Brandts. Summary dismissal was affirmed on grounds that Sande owed no legal duty to Brandts. Brandt v. Sande, 2000 MT 98, 299 M 256, 1 P3d 929, 57 St. Rep. 400 (2000), distinguishing Merchants & Miners Nat'l Bank v. Barnes, 18 M 335, 45 P 218 (1896).

30-9A-210. Request for accounting — request regarding list of collateral or statement of account.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-208 [30-9-208, now repealed].

2. Scope and Purpose. This section provides a procedure whereby a debtor may obtain from a secured party information about the secured obligation and the collateral in which the secured party may claim a security interest. It clarifies and resolves some of the issues that arose under former Section 9-208 [30-9-208, now repealed] and makes information concerning the secured indebtedness readily available to debtors, both before and after default. It applies to agricultural lien transactions (see the definitions of "debtor," "secured party," and "collateral" in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]), but generally not to sales of receivables. See subsection (b) [subsection (2)].

3. Requests by Debtors Only. A financing statement filed under Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5] may disclose only that a secured party may have a security interest in specified types of collateral. In most cases the financing statement will contain no indication of the obligation (if any) secured, whether any security interest actually exists, or the particular property subject to a security interest. Because creditors of and prospective purchasers from a debtor may have legitimate needs for more detailed information, it is necessary to provide a procedure under which the secured party will be required to provide information. On the other hand, the secured party should not be under a duty to disclose any details of the debtor's financial affairs to any casual inquirer or competitor who may inquire. For this reason, this section gives the right to request information to the debtor only. The debtor may submit a request in connection with negotiations with subsequent creditors and purchasers, as well as for the purpose of determining the status of its credit relationship or demonstrating which of its assets are free of a security interest.

4. Permitted Types of Requests for Information. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] contemplates that a debtor may request three types of information by submitting three types of "requests" to the secured party. First, the debtor may request the secured party to prepare and send an "accounting" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]). Second, the debtor may submit to the secured party a list of collateral for the secured party's approval or correction. Third, the debtor may submit to the secured party for its approval or correction a statement of the aggregate amount of unpaid secured obligations. Inasmuch as a secured party may have numerous transactions and relationships with a debtor, each request must identify the relevant transactions or relationships. Subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)] require the secured party to respond to a request within 14 days following receipt of the request.

5. Recipients Claiming No Interest in the Transaction. A debtor may be unaware that a creditor with whom it has dealt has assigned its security interest or the secured obligation. Subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)] impose upon recipients of requests under this section the duty to inform the debtor that they claim no interest in the collateral or secured obligation, respectively, and to inform the debtor of the name and mailing address of any known assignee or successor. As under subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)], a response to a request under subsection (d) or (e) [subsection (4) or (5)] is due 14 days following receipt.

6. Waiver; Remedy for Failure to Comply. The debtor's rights under this section may not be waived or varied. See Section 9-602(2) [30-9A-602(2)]. Section 9-625(e) [30-9A-625(5)] sets forth the remedy for noncompliance with the requirements of this section.

7. Limitation on Free Responses to Requests. Under subsection (f) [subsection (6)], during a six-month period a debtor is entitled to receive from the secured party one free response to a request. The debtor is not entitled to a free response to each type of request (i.e., three free responses) during a six-month period.

2. Scope of This Subpart [30-9A-301 through 30-9A-307]. Part 3, Subpart 1 (Sections 9-301 through 9-307 [30-9A-301 through 30-9A-307]) contains choice-of-law rules similar to those of former Section 9-103 [30-9-103, now repealed]. Former Section 9-103 [30-9-103, now repealed] generally addresses which State's law governs "perfection and the effect of perfection or non-perfection of" security interests. See, e.g., former Section 9-103(1)(b) [30-9-103(1)(b), now repealed]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] follows the broader and more precise formulation in former Section 9-103(6)(b) [30-9-103(6)(b), now repealed], which was revised in connection with the promulgation of Revised Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] in 1994: "perfection, the effect of perfection or non-perfection, and the priority of" security interests. Priority, in this context, subsumes all of the rules in Part 3 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 3], including "cut off" or "take free" rules such as Sections 9-317(b), (c), and (d), 9-320(a), (b), and (d), and 9-332 [30-9A-317(2), (3), and (4), 30-9A-320(1), (2), and (4), and 30-9A-332]. This subpart [30-9A-301 through 30-9A-307] does not address choice of law for other purposes. For example, the law applicable to issues such as attachment, validity, characterization (e.g., true lease or security interest), and enforcement is governed by the rules in Section 1-105 [30-1-105]; that governing law typically is specified in the same agreement that contains the security agreement. And, another jurisdiction's law may govern other third-party matters addressed in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. See Section 9-401 [30-9A-401], Comment 3.

3. Scope of Referral. In designating the jurisdiction whose law governs, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] directs the court to apply only the substantive ("local") law of a particular jurisdiction and not its choice-of-law rules.

Example 1: Litigation over the priority of a security interest in accounts arises in State X. State X has adopted the official text of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], which provides that priority is determined by the local law of the jurisdiction in which the debtor is located. See Section 9-301(1) [30-9A-301(1)]. The debtor is located in State Y. Even if State Y has retained former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] or enacted a nonuniform choice-of-law rule (e.g., one that provides that perfection is governed by the law of State Z), a State X court should look only to the substantive law of State Y and disregard State Y's choice-of-law rule. State Y's substantive law (e.g., its Section 9-501 [30-9A-501]) provides that financing statements should be filed in a filing office in State Y. Note, however, that if the identical perfection issue were to be litigated in State Y, the court would look to State Y's former Section 9-103 [30-9-103, now repealed] or nonuniform 9-301 [30-9A-301] and conclude that a filing in State Y is ineffective.

Example 2: In the preceding Example, assume that State X has adopted the official text of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], and State Y has adopted a nonuniform Section 9-301(1) [30-9A-301(1)] under which perfection is governed by the whole law of State X, including its choice-of-law rules. If litigation occurs in State X, the court should look to the substantive law of State Y, which provides that financing statements are to be filed in a filing office in State Y. If litigation occurs in State Y, the court should look to the law of State X, whose choice-of-law rule requires that the court apply the substantive law of State Y. Thus, regardless of the jurisdiction in which the litigation arises, the financing statement should be filed in State Y.

4. Law Governing Perfection: General Rule. Paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] contains the general rule: the law governing perfection of security interests in both tangible and intangible collateral, whether perfected by filing or automatically, is the law of the jurisdiction of the debtor's location, as determined under Section 9-307 [30-9A-307].

Paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] substantially simplifies the choice-of-law rules. Former Section 9-103 [30-9-103, now repealed] contained different choice-of-law rules for different types of collateral. Under Section 9-301(1) [30-9A-301(1)], the law of a single jurisdiction governs perfection with respect to most types of collateral, both tangible and intangible. Paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] eliminates the need for former Section 9-103(1)(c) [30-9-103(1)(c), now repealed], which concerned purchase-money security interests in tangible collateral that is intended to move from one jurisdiction to the other. It is likely to reduce the frequency of cases in which the governing law changes after a financing statement is properly filed. (Presumably, debtors change their own location less frequently than they change the location of their collateral.) The approach taken in paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] also eliminates some difficult priority issues and the need to distinguish between "mobile" and "ordinary" goods, and it reduces the number of filing offices in which secured parties must file or search when collateral is located in several jurisdictions.

5. Law Governing Perfection: Exceptions. The general rule is subject to several exceptions. It does not apply to goods covered by a certificate of title (see Section 9-303 [30-9A-303]), deposit accounts (see Section 9-304 [30-9A-304]), investment property (see Section 9-305 [30-9A-305]), or letter-of-credit rights (see Section 9-306 [30-9A-306]). Nor does it apply to possessory security interests, i.e., security interests that the secured party has perfected by taking possession of the collateral (see paragraph (2) [subsection (2)]), security interests perfected by filing a fixture filing (see paragraph (3)(A) [subsection (3)(a)]), security interests in timber to be cut (paragraph (3)(B) [subsection (3)(b)]), or security interests in as-extracted collateral (see paragraph (4) [subsection (4)]).

a. Possessory Security Interests. Paragraph (2) [subsection (2)] applies to possessory security interests and provides that perfection is governed by the local law of the jurisdiction in which the collateral is located. This is the rule of former Section 9-103(1)(b) [30-9-103(1)(b), now repealed], except paragraph (2) [subsection (2)] eliminates the troublesome "last event" test of former law.

The distinction between nonpossessory and possessory security interests creates the potential for the same jurisdiction to apply two different choice-of-law rules to determine perfection in the same collateral. For example, were a secured party in possession of an instrument or document to relinquish possession in reliance on temporary perfection, the applicable law immediately would change from that of the location of the collateral to that of the location of the debtor. The applicability of two different choice-of-law rules for perfection is unlikely to lead to any material practical problems. The perfection rules of one Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] jurisdiction are likely to be identical to those of another. Moreover, under paragraph (3) [subsection (3)], the relative priority of competing security interests in tangible collateral is resolved by reference to the law of the jurisdiction in which the collateral is located, regardless of how the security interests are perfected.

b. Fixtures. Application of the general rule in paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] to perfection of a security interest in fixtures would yield strange results. For example, perfection of a security interest in fixtures located in Arizona and owned by a Delaware corporation would be governed by the law of Delaware. Although Delaware law would send one to a filing office in Arizona for the place to file a financing statement as a fixture filing, see Section 9-501 [30-9A-501], Delaware law would not take account of local, nonuniform, real-property filing and recording requirements that Arizona law might impose. For this reason, paragraph (3)(A) [subsection (3)(a)] contains a special rule for security interests perfected by a fixture filing; the law of the jurisdiction in which the fixtures are located governs perfection, including the formal requisites of a fixture filing. Under paragraph (3)(C) [subsection (3)(c)], the same law governs priority. Fixtures are "goods" as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102].

c. Timber to Be Cut. Application of the general rule in paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] to perfection of a security interest in timber to be cut would yield undesirable results analogous to those described with respect to fixtures. Paragraph (3)(B) [subsection (3)(b)] adopts a similar solution: perfection is governed by the law of the jurisdiction in which the timber is located. As with fixtures, under paragraph (3)(C) [subsection (3)(c)], the same law governs priority. Timber to be cut also is "goods" as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102].

Paragraph (3)(B) [subsection (3)(b)] applies only to "timber to be cut," not to timber that has been cut. Consequently, once the timber is cut, the general choice-of-law rule in paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] becomes applicable. To ensure continued perfection, a secured party should file in both the jurisdiction in which the timber to be cut is located and in the state where the debtor is located. The former filing would be with the office in which a real property mortgage would be filed, and the latter would be a central filing. See Section 9-501 [30-9A-501].

d. As-Extracted Collateral. Paragraph (4) [subsection (4)] adopts the rule of former Section 9-103(5) [subsection 30-9A-103(5)] with respect to certain security interests in minerals and related accounts. Like security interests in fixtures perfected by filing a fixture filing, security interests in minerals that are as-extracted collateral are perfected by filing in the office designated for the filing or recording of a mortgage on the real property. For the same reasons, the law governing perfection and priority is the law of the jurisdiction in which the wellhead or minehead is located.

6. Change in Law Governing Perfection. When the debtor changes its location to another jurisdiction, the jurisdiction whose law governs perfection under paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] changes, as well. Similarly, the law governing perfection of a possessory security interest in collateral under paragraph (2) [subsection (2)] changes when the collateral is removed to another jurisdiction. Nevertheless, these changes will not result in an immediate loss of perfection. See Section 9-316(a), (b) [30-9A-316(1) and (2).

7. Law Governing Effect of Perfection and Priority: Goods, Documents, Instruments, Money, Negotiable Documents, and Tangible Chattel Paper. Under former Section 9-103 [30-9-103, now repealed], the law of a single jurisdiction governed both questions of perfection and those of priority. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] generally adopts that approach. See paragraph (1) [subsection (1)]. But the approach may create problems if the debtor and collateral are located in different jurisdictions. For example, assume a security interest in equipment located in Pennsylvania is perfected by filing in Illinois, where the debtor is located. If the law of the jurisdiction in which the debtor is located were to govern priority, then the priority of an execution lien on goods located in Pennsylvania would be governed by rules enacted by the Illinois legislature.

To address this problem, paragraph (3)(C) [subsection (3)(a)] divorces questions of perfection from questions of "the effect of perfection or nonperfection and the priority of a security interest." Under paragraph (3)(C) [subsection (3)(a)], the rights of competing claimants to tangible collateral are resolved by reference to the law of the jurisdiction in which the collateral is located. A similar bifurcation applied to security interests in investment property under former Section 9-103(6) [30-9-103(6), now repealed]. See Section 9-305 [30-9A-305].

Paragraph (3)(C) [subsection (3)(a)] applies the law of the situs to determine priority only with respect to goods (including fixtures), instruments, money, negotiable documents, and tangible chattel paper. Compare former Section 9-103(1) [30-9-103(1), now repealed], which applied the law of the location of the collateral to documents, instruments, and "ordinary" (as opposed to "mobile") goods. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not distinguish among types of goods. The ordinary/mobile goods distinction appears to address concerns about where to file and search, rather than concerns about priority. There is no reason to preserve this distinction under the bifurcated approach.

Particularly serious confusion may arise when the choice-of-law rules of a given jurisdiction result in each of two competing security interests in the same collateral being governed by a different priority rule. The potential for this confusion existed under former Section 9-103(4) [30-9-103(4), now repealed] with respect to chattel paper: Perfection by possession was governed by the law of the location of the paper, whereas perfection by filing was governed by the law of the location of the debtor. Consider the mess that would have been created if the language or interpretation of former Section 9-308 [30-9-308, now repealed, see 30-9A-330] were to differ in the two relevant States, or if one of the relevant jurisdictions (e.g., a foreign country) had not adopted Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. The potential for confusion could have been exacerbated when a secured party perfected both by taking possession in the State where the collateral is located (State A) and by filing in the State where the debtor is located (State B)-a common practice for some chattel paper financers. By providing that the law of the jurisdiction in which the collateral is located governs priority, paragraph (3) [subsection (3)] substantially diminishes this problem.

8. Non-U.S. Debtors. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] applies the same choice-of-law rules to all debtors, foreign and domestic. For example, it adopts the bifurcated approach for determining the law applicable to security interests in goods and other tangible collateral. See Comment 5.a., above. The Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] contains a new rule specifying the location of non-U.S. debtors for purposes of this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 3]. The rule appears in Section 9-307 [30-9A-307] and is explained in the Reporters' Comments following that section. Former Section 9-103(3)(c) [30-9-103(3)(c), now repealed], which contained a special choice-of-law rule governing security interests created by debtors located in a non-U.S. jurisdiction, proved unsatisfactory and was deleted.

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Purchase by Lessee Does Not Make Lessor a Buyer: Paccar leased trucks to MPT. MPT entered into an agreement to buy tires from Les Schwab on credit. When MPT defaulted on its purchase agreement, Paccar argued that it had a superior interest to Les Schwab in the tires on the basis that Paccar purchased the tires as a buyer, not in the ordinary course of business. The Supreme Court held that Paccar was not a buyer in that it had never given any money to Les Schwab and title had never passed to Paccar nor had it taken delivery. Paccar Financial Corp. v. 30-9A-302. Law governing perfection and priority of agricultural liens.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Agricultural Liens. This section provides choice-of-law rules for agricultural liens on farm products. Perfection, the effect of perfection or nonperfection, and priority all are governed by the law of the jurisdiction in which the farm products are located. Other choice-of-law rules, including Section 1-105 [30-1-105], determine which jurisdiction's law governs other matters, such as the secured party's rights on default. See Section 9-301 [30-9A-301], Comment 2. Inasmuch as no agricultural lien on proceeds arises under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], this section does not expressly apply to proceeds of agricultural liens. However, if another statute creates an agricultural lien on proceeds, it may be appropriate for courts to apply the choice-of-law rule in this section to determine priority in the proceeds.

30-9A-303. Law governing perfection and priority of security interests in goods covered by a certificate of title.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-103(2)(a), (b) [30-9-103(2)(a), (2)(b), now repealed], substantially revised.

2. Scope of This Section. This section applies to "goods covered by a certificate of title." The new definition of "certificate of title" in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] makes clear that this section applies not only to certificate-of-title statutes under which perfection occurs upon notation of the security interest on the certificate but also to those that contemplate notation but provide that perfection is achieved by another method, e.g., delivery of designated documents to an official. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)], which is new, makes clear that this section applies to certificates of a jurisdiction having no other contacts with the goods or the debtor. This result comports with most of the reported cases on the subject and with contemporary business practices in the trucking industry.

3. Law Governing Perfection and Priority. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] is the basic choice-of-law rule for goods covered by a certificate of title. Perfection and priority of a security interest are governed by the law of the jurisdiction under whose certificate of title the goods are covered from the time the goods become covered by the certificate of title until the goods cease to be covered by the certificate of title.

Normally, under the law of the relevant jurisdiction, the perfection step would consist of compliance with that jurisdiction's certificate-of-title statute and a resulting notation of the security interest on the certificate of title. See Section 9-311(b) [30-9A-311(2)]. In the typical case of an automobile or over-the-road truck, a person who wishes to take a security interest in the vehicle can ascertain whether it is subject to any security interests by looking at the certificate of title. But certificates of title cover certain types of goods in some States but not in others. A secured party who does not realize this may extend credit and attempt to perfect by filing in the jurisdiction in which the debtor is located. If the goods had been titled in another jurisdiction, the lender would be unperfected.

Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] explains when goods become covered by a certificate of title and when they cease to be covered. Goods may become covered by a certificate of title, even though no certificate of title has issued. Former Section 9-103(2)(b) [30-9-103(2)(b), now repealed] provided that the law of the jurisdiction issuing the certificate ceases to apply upon "surrender" of the certificate. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] eliminates the concept of "surrender." However, if the certificate is surrendered in conjunction with an appropriate application for a certificate to be issued by another jurisdiction, the law of the original jurisdiction ceases to apply because the goods became covered subsequently by a certificate of title from another jurisdiction. Alternatively, the law of the original jurisdiction ceases to apply when the certificate "ceases to be effective" under the law of that jurisdiction. Given the diversity in certificate-of-title statutes, the term "effective" is not defined.

4. Continued Perfection. The fact that the law of one State ceases to apply under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] does not mean that a security interest perfected under that law becomes unperfected automatically. In most cases, the security interest will remain perfected. See Section 9-316(d), (e) [30-9A-316(4) and (5)]. Moreover, a perfected security interest may be subject to defeat by certain buyers and secured parties. See Section 9-337 [30-9A-337].

5. Inventory. Compliance with a certificate-of-title statute generally is not the method of perfecting security interests in inventory. Section 9-311(d) [30-9A-311(4)] provides that a security interest created in inventory held by a person in the business of selling or leasing goods of that kind is subject to the normal filing rules; compliance with a certificate-of-title statute is not necessary or effective to perfect the security interest. Most certificate-of-title statutes are in accord.

The following example explains the subtle relationship between this rule and the choice-of-law rules in Section 9-303 [30-9A-303] and former Section 9-103(2) [30-9-103(2), now repealed]:

Example: Goods are located in State A and covered by a certificate of title issued under the law of State A. The State A certificate of title is "clean"; it does not reflect a security interest. Owner takes the goods to State B and sells (trades in) the goods to Dealer, who is located (within the meaning of Section 9-307 [30-9A-307]) in State B. As is customary, Dealer retains the duly assigned State A certificate of title pending resale of the goods. Dealer's inventory financer, SP, obtains a security interest in the goods under its after-acquired property clause.

Under Section 9-311(d) [30-9A-311(4)] of both State A and State B, Dealer's inventory financer, SP, must perfect by filing instead of complying with a certificate-of-title statute. If Section 9-303 [30-9A-303] were read to provide that the law applicable to perfection of SP's security interest is that of State A, because the goods are covered by a State A certificate, then SP would be required to file in State A under State A's Section 9-501 [30-9A-501]. That result would be anomalous, to say the least, since the principle underlying Section 9-311(d) [30-9A-311(4)] is that the inventory should be treated as ordinary goods.

Section 9-303 [30-9A-303] (and former Section 9-103(2) [30-9-103(2), now repealed, see 30-9A-316, 30-9A-337, and this section]) should be read as providing that the law of State B, not State A, applies. A court looking to the forum's Section 9-303(a) [30-9A-303(1)] would find that Section 9-303 [30-9A-303] applies only if two conditions are met: (i) the goods are covered by the certificate as explained in Section 9-303(b) [30-9A-303(2)], i.e., application had been made for a State (here, State A) to issue a certificate of title covering the goods and (ii) the certificate is a "certificate of title" as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102], i.e., "a statute provides for the security interest in question to be indicated on the certificate as a condition or result of the security interest's obtaining priority over the rights of a lien creditor." Stated otherwise, Section 9-303 [30-9A-303] applies only when compliance with a certificate-of-title statute, and not filing, is the appropriate method of perfection. Under the law of State A, for purposes of perfecting SP's security interest in the dealer's inventory, the proper method of perfection is filing-not compliance with State A's certificate-of-title statute. For that reason, the goods are not covered by a "certificate of title," and the second condition is not met. Thus, Section 9-303 [30-9A-303] does not apply to the goods. Instead, Section 9-301 [30-9A-301] applies, and the applicable law is that of State B, where the debtor (dealer) is located.

6. External Constraints on This Section. The need to coordinate Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] with a variety of nonuniform certificate-of-title statutes, the need to provide rules to take account of situations in which multiple certificates of title are outstanding with respect to particular goods, and the need to govern the transition from perfection by filing in one jurisdiction to perfection by notation in another all create pressure for a detailed and complex set of rules. In an effort to minimize complexity, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not attempt to coordinate Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] with the entire array of certificate-of-title statutes. In particular, Sections 9-303, 9-311, and 9-316(d) and (e) [30-9A-303, 30-9A-311, and 30-9A-316(4) and (5)] assume that the certificate-of-title statutes to which they apply do not have relation-back provisions (i.e., provisions under which perfection is deemed to occur at a time earlier than when the perfection steps actually are taken). A Legislative Note to Section 9-311 [30-9A-311] recommends the elimination of relation-back provisions in certificate-of-title statutes affecting perfection of security interests.

Ideally, at any given time, only one certificate of title is outstanding with respect to particular goods. In fact, however, sometimes more than one jurisdiction issues more than one certificate of title with respect to the same goods. This situation results from defects in certificate-of-title laws and the interstate coordination of those laws, not from deficiencies in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. As long as the possibility of multiple certificates of title remains, the potential for innocent parties to suffer losses will continue. At best, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] can identify clearly which innocent parties will bear the losses in familiar fact patterns.

Case Notes

Failure to Demonstrate That Equitable Interest in Cattle Sold Displaced Perfected Security Interest in Cattle as After-Acquired Property: Bellanger obtained loans from the Daniels-Sheridan Federal Credit Union to finance a ranching operation, securing the loans with several promissory notes securing an interest in the cattle on the ranch. Bellanger subsequently defaulted on the loans, and the credit union initiated an action to enforce the promissory notes pursuant to the Uniform Commercial Code (U.C.C.). The case broadened to encompass disputes over proceeds from the sale of the cattle to include Smith, the owner of the auction company where Bellanger customarily sold cattle, whom the credit union alleged had an inferior security interest in some of the cattle that Smith had sold to Bellanger. The credit union pointed out that Smith had only an unperfected security interest because he failed to perfect a security interest pursuant to the U.C.C. Smith contended that Bellanger had obtained only a leasehold interest in the cattle and that the credit union thus had no security interest in those cattle. The cattle were subsequently seized and sold for $79,012.27, and the District Court split the proceeds, with $45,467.94 paid to the credit union and a judgment for the remainder owed on the promissory notes, and $33,544.33 paid to Smith. The credit union appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The District Court erred in equitably subordinating the credit union's prior perfected security interest to Smith's unperfected security interest. The Supreme Court held that Smith's transaction with Bellanger was a sale, not a lease or bailment, and as such, the hierarchy of priorities for security interests set forth in Article 9 of the U.C.C. (now Title 30, ch. 9A) applied in the credit union's favor. Smith failed to demonstrate that any equitable interest that he had in the cattle displaced the credit union's perfected security interest in the cattle as an after-acquired property of Bellanger, so an equitable carve-out from the U.C.C. principles of hierarchy priority was not justified. Official Comments

1. Source. New; derived from Section 8-110(e) [30-8-120(5)] and former Section 9-103(6) [30-9-103(6), now repealed, see 30-9A-305, 30-9A-306, and this section].

2. Deposit Accounts. Under this section, the law of the "bank's jurisdiction" governs perfection and priority of a security interest in deposit accounts. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] contains rules for determining the "bank's jurisdiction." The substance of these rules is substantially similar to that of the rules determining the "security intermediary's jurisdiction" under former Section 8-110(e) [30-8-120(5)], except that subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] provides more flexibility than the analogous provision in former Section 8-110(e)(1) [30-8-120(5)(a)]. Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] permits the parties to choose the law of one jurisdiction to govern perfection and priority of security interests and a different governing law for other purposes. The parties' choice is effective, even if the jurisdiction whose law is chosen bears no relationship to the parties or the transaction. Section 8-110(e)(1) [30-8-120(5)(a)] has been conformed to subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] of this section, and Section 9-305(b)(1) [30-9A-305(2)(a)], concerning a commodity intermediary's jurisdiction, makes a similar departure from former Section 9-103(6)(e)(i) [30-9-103(6)(e)(i), now repealed].

3. Change in Law Governing Perfection. When the bank's jurisdiction changes, the jurisdiction whose law governs perfection under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] changes, as well. Nevertheless, the change will not result in an immediate loss of perfection. See Section 9-316(f), (g) [30-9A-316(6) and (7)].

2. Investment Property: General Rules. This section specifies choice-of-law rules for perfection and priority of security interests in investment property. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] covers security interests in certificated securities. Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] covers security interests in uncertificated securities. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)] covers security interests in security entitlements and securities accounts. Subsection (a)(4) [subsection (1)(d)] covers security interests in commodity contracts and commodity accounts. The approach of each of these paragraphs is essentially the same. They identify the jurisdiction's law that governs questions of perfection and priority by using the same principles that Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] uses to determine other questions concerning that form of investment property. Thus, for certificated securities, the law of the jurisdiction in which the certificate is located governs. Cf. Section 8-110(c) [30-8-120(3)]. For uncertificated securities, the law of the issuer's jurisdiction governs. Cf. Section 8-110(a) [30-8-120(1)]. For security entitlements and securities accounts, the law of the securities intermediary's jurisdiction governs. Cf. Section 8-110(b) [30-8-120(2)]. For commodity contracts and commodity accounts, the law of the commodity intermediary's jurisdiction governs. Because commodity contracts and commodity accounts are not governed by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8], subsection (b) [subsection (2)] contains rules that specify the commodity intermediary's jurisdiction. These are analogous to the rules in Section 8-110(e) [30-8-120(5)] specifying a securities intermediary's jurisdiction. Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] affords the parties greater flexibility than did former Section 9-103(6)(3) [30-9-103(6)(c), now repealed]. See also Section 9-304(b) [30-9A-304(2)] (bank's jurisdiction); Revised Section 8-110(e)(1) [30-8-120(5)(a)] (securities intermediary's jurisdiction).

3. Investment Property: Exceptions. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] establishes an exception to the general rules set out in subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. It provides that perfection of a security interest by filing, automatic perfection of a security interest in investment property created by a debtor who is a broker or securities intermediary (see Section 9-309(10) [30-9A-309(10)]), and automatic perfection of a security interest in a commodity contract or commodity account of a debtor who is a commodity intermediary (see Section 9-309(11) [30-9A-309(11)]) are governed by the law of the jurisdiction in which the debtor is located, as determined under Section 9-307 [30-9A-307].

4. Examples: The following examples illustrate the rules in this section:

Example 1: A customer residing in New Jersey maintains a securities account with Able & Co. The agreement between the customer and Able specifies that it is governed by Pennsylvania law but expressly provides that the law of California is Able's jurisdiction for purposes of the Uniform Commercial Code. Through the account the customer holds securities of a Massachusetts corporation, which Able holds through a clearing corporation located in New York. The customer obtains a margin loan from Able. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)] provides that California law-the law of the securities intermediary's jurisdiction-governs perfection and priority of the security interest, even if California has no other relationship to the parties or the transaction.

Example 2: A customer residing in New Jersey maintains a securities account with Able & Co. The agreement between the customer and Able specifies that it is governed by Pennsylvania law. Through the account the customer holds securities of a Massachusetts corporation, which Able holds through a clearing corporation located in New York. The customer obtains a loan from a lender located in Illinois. The lender takes a security interest and perfects by obtaining an agreement among the debtor, itself, and Able, which satisfies the requirement of Section 8-106(d)(2) [30-8-120(5)(b)] to give the lender control. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)] provides that Pennsylvania law-the law of the securities intermediary's jurisdiction-governs perfection and priority of the security interest, even if Pennsylvania has no other relationship to the parties or the transaction.

Example 3: A customer residing in New Jersey maintains a securities account with Able & Co. The agreement between the customer and Able specifies that it is governed by Pennsylvania law. Through the account, the customer holds securities of a Massachusetts corporation, which Able holds through a clearing corporation located in New York. The customer borrows from SP-1, and SP-1 files a financing statement in New Jersey. Later, the customer obtains a loan from SP-2. SP-2 takes a security interest and perfects by obtaining an agreement among the debtor, itself, and Able, which satisfies the requirement of Section 8-106(d)(2) [30-8-120(5)(b)] to give the SP-2 control. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that perfection of SP-1's security interest by filing is governed by the location of the debtor, so the filing in New Jersey was appropriate. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)], however, provides that Pennsylvania law-the law of the securities intermediary's jurisdiction-governs all other questions of perfection and priority. Thus, Pennsylvania law governs perfection of SP-2's security interest, and Pennsylvania law also governs the priority of the security interests of SP-1 and SP-2.

5. Change in Law Governing Perfection. When the issuer's jurisdiction, the securities intermediary's jurisdiction, or commodity intermediary's jurisdiction changes, the jurisdiction whose law governs perfection under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] changes, as well. Similarly, the law governing perfection of a possessory security interest in a certificated security changes when the collateral is removed to another jurisdiction, see subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)], and the law governing perfection by filing changes when the debtor changes its location. See subsection (c) [subsection (3)]. Nevertheless, these changes will not result in an immediate loss of perfection. See Section 9-316 [30-9A-316].

30-9A-306. Law governing perfection and priority of security interests in letter-of-credit rights.

Official Comments

1. Source. New; derived in part from Section 8-110(e) [30-8-120(5)] and former Section 9-103(6) [30-9-103(6), now repealed, see 30-9A-304, 30-9A-305, and this section].

2. Sui Generis Treatment. This section governs the applicable law for perfection and priority of security interests in letter-of-credit rights, other than a security interest perfected only under Section 9-308(d) [30-9A-308(4)] (i.e., as a supporting obligation). The treatment differs substantially from that provided in Section 9-304 [30-9A-304] for deposit accounts. The basic rule is that the law of the issuer's or nominated person's (e.g., confirmer's) jurisdiction, derived from the terms of the letter of credit itself, controls perfection and priority, but only if the issuer's or nominated person's jurisdiction is a State, as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. If the issuer's or nominated person's jurisdiction is not a State, the baseline rule of Section 9-301 [30-9A-301] applies-perfection and priority are governed by the law of the debtor's location, determined under Section 9-307 [30-9A-307]. Export transactions typically involve a foreign issuer and a domestic nominated person, such as a confirmer, located in a State. The principal goal of this section is to reduce the likelihood that perfection and priority would be governed by the law of a foreign jurisdiction in a transaction that is essentially domestic from the standpoint of the debtor-beneficiary, its creditors, and a domestic nominated person.

3. Issuer's or Nominated Person's Jurisdiction. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] defers to the rules established under Section 5-116 [30-5-136] for determination of an issuer's or nominated person's jurisdiction.

Example: An Italian bank issues a letter of credit that is confirmed by a New York bank. The beneficiary is a Connecticut corporation. The letter of credit provides that the issuer's liability is governed by Italian law, and the confirmation provides that the confirmer's liability is governed by the law of New York. Under Sections 9-306(b) and 5-116(a) [30-9A-306(2) and 30-5-136(1)], Italy is the issuer's jurisdiction and New York is the confirmer's (nominated person's) jurisdiction. Because the confirmer's jurisdiction is a State, the law of New York governs perfection and priority of a security interest in the beneficiary's letter-of-credit right against the confirmer. See Section 9-306(a) [30-9A-306(1)]. However, because the issuer's jurisdiction is not a State, the law of that jurisdiction does not govern. See Section 9-306(a) [30-9A-306(1)]. Rather, the choice-of-law rule in Section 9-301(1) [30-9A-301(1)] applies to perfection and priority of a security interest in the beneficiary's letter-of-credit right against the issuer. Under that section, perfection and priority are governed by the law of the jurisdiction in which the debtor (beneficiary) is located. That jurisdiction is Connecticut. See Section 9-307 [30-9A-307].

4. Scope of this Section. This section specifies only the law governing perfection, the effect of perfection or nonperfection, and priority of security interests. Section 5-116 [30-5-136] specifies the law governing the liability of, and Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] (or other applicable law) deals with the rights and duties of, an issuer or nominated person. Perfection, nonperfection, and priority have no effect on those rights and duties.

5. Change in Law Governing Perfection. When the issuer's jurisdiction, or nominated person's jurisdiction changes, the jurisdiction whose law governs perfection under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] changes, as well. Nevertheless, this change will not result in an immediate loss of perfection. See Section 9-316(f), (g) [30-9A-316(6) and (7)].

30-9A-307. Location of debtor.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-103(3)(d) [30-9-103(3)(d), now repealed], substantially revised.

2. General Rules. As a general matter, the location of the debtor determines the jurisdiction whose law governs perfection of a security interest. See Sections 9-301(1), 9-305(c) [30-9A-301(1) and 30-9A-305(3)]. It also governs priority of a security interest in certain types of intangible collateral, such as accounts, electronic chattel paper, and general intangibles. This section determines the location of the debtor for choice-of-law purposes, but not for other purposes. See subsection (k) [subsection (11)].

Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] states the general rules: An individual debtor is deemed to be located at the individual's principal residence with respect to both personal and business assets. Any other debtor is deemed to be located at its place of business if it has only one, or at its chief executive office if it has more than one place of business.

As used in this section, a "place of business" means a place where the debtor conducts its affairs. See subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. Thus, every organization, even eleemosynary institutions and other organizations that do not conduct "for profit" business activities, has a "place of business." Under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], a person who ceases to exist, have a residence, or have a place of business continues to be located in the jurisdiction determined by subsection (b) [subsection (2)].

The term "chief executive office" is not defined in this Section or elsewhere in the Uniform Commercial Code. "Chief executive office" means the place from which the debtor manages the main part of its business operations or other affairs. This is the place where persons dealing with the debtor would normally look for credit information, and is the appropriate place for filing. With respect to most multi-state debtors, it will be simple to determine which of the debtor's offices is the "chief executive office." Even when a doubt arises, it would be rare that there could be more than two possibilities. A secured party in such a case may protect itself by perfecting under the law of each possible jurisdiction.

Similarly, the term "principal residence" is not defined. If the security interest in question is a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods which is perfected upon attachment, see Section 9-309(1) [30-9A-309(1)], the choice of law may make no difference. In other cases, when a doubt arises, prudence may dictate perfecting under the law of each jurisdiction that might be the debtor's "principal residence."

The general rule is subject to several exceptions, each of which is discussed below.

3. Non-U.S. Debtors. Under the general rules of this section, a non-U.S. debtor normally would be located in a foreign jurisdiction and, as a consequence, foreign law would govern perfection. When foreign law affords no public notice of security interests, the general rule yields unacceptable results.

Accordingly, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that the normal rules for determining the location of a debtor (i.e., the rules in subsection (b) [subsection (2)]) apply only if they yield a location that is "a jurisdiction whose law generally requires information concerning the existence of a nonpossessory security interest to be made generally available in a filing, recording, or registration system as a condition or result of the security interest's obtaining priority over the rights of a lien creditor with respect to the collateral." The phrase "generally requires" is meant to include legal regimes that generally require notice in a filing or recording system as a condition of perfecting nonpossessory security interests, but which permit perfection by another method (e.g., control, automatic perfection, temporary perfection) in limited circumstances. A jurisdiction that has adopted this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] or an earlier version of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] is such a jurisdiction. If the rules in subsection (b) [subsection (2)] yield a jurisdiction whose law does not generally require notice in a filing or registration system, the debtor is located in the District of Columbia.

Example 1: Debtor is an English corporation with 7 offices in the United States and its chief executive office in London, England. Debtor creates a security interest in its accounts. Under subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)], Debtor would be located in England. However, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that subsection (b) [subsection (2)] applies only if English law generally conditions perfection on giving public notice in a filing, recording, or registration system. Otherwise, Debtor is located in the District of Columbia. Under Section 9-301(1) [30-9A-301(1)], perfection, the effect of perfection, and priority are governed by the law of the jurisdiction of the debtor's location-here, England or the District of Columbia (depending on the content of English law).

Example 2: Debtor is an English corporation with 7 offices in the United States and its chief executive office in London, England. Debtor creates a security interest in equipment located in London. Under subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)] Debtor would be located in England. However, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that subsection (b) [subsection (2)] applies only if English law generally conditions perfection on giving public notice in a filing, recording, or registration system. Otherwise, Debtor is located in the District of Columbia. Under Section 9-301(1) [30-9A-301(1)], perfection is governed by the law of the jurisdiction of the debtor's location, whereas, under Section 9-301(3) [30-9A-301(3)], the law of the jurisdiction in which the collateral is located-here, England-governs priority.

The foregoing discussion assumes that each transaction bears an appropriate relation to the forum State. In the absence of an appropriate relation, the forum State's entire UCC, including the choice-of-law provisions in Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] (Sections 9-301 through 9-307 [30-9A-301 through 30-9A-307]), will not apply. See Section 9-109 [30-9A-109], Comment 9.

4. Registered Organizations Organized Under Law of a State. Under subsection (e) [subsection (5)], a registered organization (e.g., a corporation or limited partnership) organized under the law of a "State" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]) is located in its State of organization. Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] makes clear that events affecting the status of a registered organization, such as the dissolution of a corporation or revocation of its charter, do not affect its location for purposes of subsection (e) [subsection (5)]. However, certain of these events may result in, or be accompanied by, a transfer of collateral from the registered organization to another debtor. This section does not determine whether a transfer occurs, nor does it determine the legal consequences of any transfer.

Determining the registered organization-debtor's location by reference to the jurisdiction of organization could provide some important side benefits for the filing systems. A jurisdiction could structure its filing system so that it would be impossible to make a mistake in a registered organization-debtor's name on a financing statement. For example, a filer would be informed if a filed record designated an incorrect corporate name for the debtor. Linking filing to the jurisdiction of organization also could reduce pressure on the system imposed by transactions in which registered organizations cease to exist-as a consequence of merger or consolidation, for example. The jurisdiction of organization might prohibit such transactions unless steps were taken to ensure that existing filings were refiled against a successor or terminated by the secured party.

5. Registered Organizations Organized Under Law of United States; Branches and Agencies of Banks Not Organized Under Law of United States. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] specifies the location of a debtor that is a registered organization organized under the law of the United States. It defers to law of the United States, to the extent that that law determines, or authorizes the debtor to determine, the debtor's location. Thus, if the law of the United States designates a particular State as the debtor's location, that State is the debtor's location for purposes of this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] choice-of-law rules. Similarly, if the law of the United States authorizes the registered organization to designate its State of location, the State that the registered organization designates is the State in which it is located for purposes of this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] choice-of-law rules. In other cases, the debtor is located in the District of Columbia.

Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] also determines the location of branches and agencies of banks that are not organized under the law of the United States or a State. However, if all the branches and agencies of the bank are licensed only in one State, then they are located in that State. See subsection (i) [subsection (9)].

6. United States. To the extent that Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] governs (see Sections 1-105, 9-109(c) [30-1-105, 30-9A-109(3)]), the United States is located in the District of Columbia for purposes of this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] choice-of-law rules. See subsection (h) [subsection (8)].

7. Foreign Air Carriers. Subsection (j) [subsection (10)] follows former Section 9-103(3)(d) [30-9-103(3)(d), now repealed]. To the extent that it is applicable, the Convention on the International Recognition of Rights in Aircraft (Geneva Convention) supersedes state legislation on this subject, as set forth in Section 9-311(b) [30-9A-311(2)], but some nations are not parties to that Convention.

30-9A-308. When security interest or agricultural lien is perfected — continuity of perfection.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Sections 9-303, 9-115(2) [30-9-303, 30-9-115(2), both now repealed, see 30-9A-203 and this section].

2. General Rule. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] uses the term "attach" to describe the point at which property becomes subject to a security interest. The requisites for attachment are stated in Section 9-203 [30-9A-203]. When it attaches, a security interest may be either perfected or unperfected. "Perfected" means that the security interest has attached and the secured party has taken all the steps required by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] as specified in Sections 9-310 through 9-316 [30-9A-310 through 30-9A-316]. A perfected security interest may still be or become subordinate to other interests. See, e.g., Sections 9-320, 9-322 [30-9A-320 and 30-9A-322]. However, in general, after perfection the secured party is protected against creditors and transferees of the debtor and, in particular, against any representative of creditors in insolvency proceedings instituted by or against the debtor. See, e.g., Section 9-317 [30-9A-317].

Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] explains that the time of perfection is when the security interest has attached and any necessary steps for perfection, such as taking possession or filing, have been taken. The "except" clause refers to the perfection-upon-attachment rules appearing in Section 9-309 [30-9A-309]. It also reflects that other subsections of this section, e.g., subsection (d) [subsection (4)], contain automatic-perfection rules. If the steps for perfection have been taken in advance, as when the secured party files a financing statement before giving value or before the debtor acquires rights in the collateral, then the security interest is perfected when it attaches.

3. Agricultural Liens. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is new. It describes the elements of perfection of an agricultural lien.

4. Continuous Perfection. The following example illustrates the operation of subsection (c) [subsection (3)]:

Example 1: Debtor, an importer, creates a security interest in goods that it imports and the documents of title that cover the goods. The secured party, Bank, takes possession of a negotiable bill of lading covering certain imported goods and thereby perfects its security interest in the bill of lading and the goods. See Sections 9-313(a), 9-312(c)(1) [30-9A-313(1) and 30-9A-312(3)(a)].

Bank releases the bill of lading to the debtor for the purpose of procuring the goods from the carrier and selling them. Under Section 9-312(f) [30-9A-312(6)], Bank continues to have a perfected security interest in the document and goods for 20 days. Bank files a financing statement covering the collateral before the expiration of the 20-day period. Its security interest now continues perfected for as long as the filing is good.

If the successive stages of Bank's security interest succeed each other without an intervening gap, the security interest is "perfected continuously," and the date of perfection is when the security interest first became perfected (i.e., when Bank received possession of the bill of lading). If, however, there is a gap between stages-for example, if Bank does not file until after the expiration of the 20-day period specified in Section 9-312(f) [30-9A-312(6)] and leaves the collateral in the debtor's possession-then, the chain being broken, the perfection is no longer continuous. The date of perfection would now be the date of filing (after expiration of the 20-day period). Bank's security interest would be vulnerable to any interests arising during the gap period which under Section 9-317 [30-9A-317] take priority over an unperfected security interest.

5. Supporting Obligations. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] is new. It provides for automatic perfection of a security interest in a supporting obligation for collateral if the security interest in the collateral is perfected. This is unlikely to effect any change in the law prior to adoption of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A].

Example 2: Buyer is obligated to pay Debtor for goods sold. Buyer's president guarantees the obligation. Debtor creates a security interest in the right to payment (account) in favor of Lender. Under Section 9-203(f) [30-9A-203(6)], the security interest attaches to Debtor's rights under the guarantee (supporting obligation). Under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], perfection of the security interest in the account constitutes perfection of the security interest in Debtor's rights under the guarantee.

6. Rights to Payment Secured by Lien. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] is new. It deals with the situation in which a security interest is created in a right to payment that is secured by a security interest, mortgage, or other lien.

Example 3: Owner gives to Mortgagee a mortgage on Blackacre to secure a loan. Owner's obligation to pay is evidenced by a promissory note. In need of working capital, Mortgagee borrows from Financer and creates a security interest in the note in favor of Financer. Section 9-203(g) [30-9A-203(7)] adopts the traditional view that the mortgage follows the note; i.e., the transferee of the note acquires the mortgage, as well. This subsection adopts a similar principle: perfection of a security interest in the right to payment constitutes perfection of a security interest in the mortgage securing it.

An important consequence of the rules in Section 9-203(g) [30-9A-203(7)] and subsection (e) [subsection (5)] is that, by acquiring a perfected security interest in a mortgage (or other secured) note, the secured party acquires a security interest in the mortgage (or other lien) that is senior to the rights of a person who becomes a lien creditor of the mortgagee (Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] debtor). See Section 9-317(a)(2) [30-9A-317(1)(b)]. This result helps prevent the separation of the mortgage (or other lien) from the note.

Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], attachment and perfection of a security interest in a secured right to payment do not of themselves affect the obligation to pay. For example, if the obligation is evidenced by a negotiable note, then Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] dictates the person whom the maker must pay to discharge the note and any lien securing it. See Section 3-602 [30-3-601(2)]. If the right to payment is a payment intangible, then Section 9-406 [30-9A-406] determines whom the account debtor must pay.

Similarly, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not determine who has the power to release a mortgage of record. That issue is determined by real-property law.

7. Investment Property. Subsections (f) and (g) [subsections (6) and (7)] follow former Section 9-115(2) [30-9-115(2), now repealed, see 30-9A-203 and this section].

Case Notes

Failure to Demonstrate That Equitable Interest in Cattle Sold Displaced Perfected Security Interest in Cattle as After-Acquired Property: Bellanger obtained loans from the Daniels-Sheridan Federal Credit Union to finance a ranching operation, securing the loans with several promissory notes securing an interest in the cattle on the ranch. Bellanger subsequently defaulted on the loans, and the credit union initiated an action to enforce the promissory notes pursuant to the Uniform Commercial Code (U.C.C.). The case broadened to encompass disputes over proceeds from the sale of the cattle to include Smith, the owner of the auction company where Bellanger customarily sold cattle, whom the credit union alleged had an inferior security interest in some of the cattle that Smith had sold to Bellanger. The credit union pointed out that

Smith had only an unperfected security interest because he failed to perfect a security interest pursuant to the U.C.C. Smith contended that Bellanger had obtained only a leasehold interest in the cattle and that the credit union thus had no security interest in those cattle. The cattle were subsequently seized and sold for $79,012.27, and the District Court split the proceeds, with $45,467.94 paid to the credit union and a judgment for the remainder owed on the promissory notes, and $33,544.33 paid to Smith. The credit union appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The District Court erred in equitably subordinating the credit union's prior perfected security interest to Smith's unperfected security interest. The Supreme Court held that Smith's transaction with Bellanger was a sale, not a lease or bailment, and as such, the hierarchy of priorities for security interests set forth in Article 9 of the U.C.C. (now Title 30, ch. 9A) applied in the credit union's favor. Smith failed to demonstrate that any equitable interest that he had in the cattle displaced the credit union's perfected security interest in the cattle as an after-acquired property of Bellanger, so an equitable carve-out from the U.C.C. principles of hierarchy priority was not justified. 2. Automatic Perfection. This section contains the perfection-upon-attachment rules previously located in former Sections 9-302(1), 9-115(4)(c), (d), and 9-116 [30-9-302(1), 30-9-115(4)(c), (4)(d), 30-9-116, all now repealed]. Rather than continue to state the rule by indirection, this section explicitly provides for perfection upon attachment.

3. Purchase-Money Security Interest in Consumer Goods. Former Section 9-302(1)(d) [30-9-302(1)(d), now repealed] has been revised and appears here as paragraph (1) [subsection (1)]. No filing or other step is required to perfect a purchase-money security interest in consumer goods, other than goods, such as automobiles, that are subject to a statute or treaty described in Section 9-311(a) [30-9A-311(1)]. However, filing is required to perfect a non-purchase-money security interest in consumer goods and is necessary to prevent a buyer of consumer goods from taking free of a security interest under Section 9-320(b) [30-9A-320(2)]. A fixture filing is required for priority over conflicting interests in fixtures to the extent provided in Section 9-334 [30-9A-334].

4. Rights to Payment. Paragraph (2) [subsection (2)] expands upon former Section 9-302(1)(e) [30-9-302(1)(e), now repealed] by affording automatic perfection to certain assignments of payment intangibles as well as accounts. The purpose of paragraph (2) [subsection (2)] is to save from ex post facto invalidation casual or isolated assignments-assignments which no one would think of filing. Any person who regularly takes assignments of any debtor's accounts or payment intangibles should file. In this connection Section 9-109(d)(4) through (7) [30-9A-109(4)(d) through (4)(g)], which excludes certain transfers of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, and promissory notes from this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], should be consulted.

Paragraphs (3) and (4) [subsections (3) and (4)], which are new, afford automatic perfection to sales of payment intangibles and promissory notes, respectively. They reflect the practice under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. Under that Article [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], filing a financing statement did not affect the rights of a buyer of payment intangibles or promissory notes, inasmuch as the former Article [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] did not cover those sales. To the extent that the exception in paragraph (2) [subsection (2)] covers outright sales of payment intangibles, which automatically are perfected under paragraph (3) [subsection (3)], the exception is redundant.

5. Health-Care-Insurance Receivables. Paragraph (5) [subsection (5)] extends automatic perfection to assignments of health-care-insurance receivables if the assignment is made to the health-care provider that provided the health-care goods or services. The primary effect is that, when an individual assigns a right to payment under an insurance policy to the person who provided health-care goods or services, the provider has no need to file a financing statement against the individual. The normal filing requirements apply to other assignments of health-care-insurance receivables covered by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], e.g., assignments from the health-care provider to a financer.

6. Investment Property. Paragraph (9) [subsection (9)] replaces the last clause of former Section 9-116(2) [30-9-116(2), now repealed], concerning security interests that arise in the delivery of a financial asset.

Paragraphs (10) and (11) [subsections (10) and (11)] replace former Section 9-115(4)(c) and (d) [30-9-115(4)(c) and (4)(d), now repealed], concerning secured financing of securities and commodity firms and clearing corporations. The former sections indicated that, with respect to certain security interests created by a securities intermediary or commodity intermediary, "[t]he filing of a financing statement . . . has no effect for purposes of perfection or priority with respect to that security interest." No change in meaning is intended by the deletion of the quoted phrase.

Secured financing arrangements for securities firms are currently implemented in various ways. In some circumstances, lenders may require that the transactions be structured as "hard pledges," where the securities are transferred on the books of a clearing corporation from the debtor's account to the lender's account or to a special pledge account for the lender where they cannot be disposed of without the specific consent of the lender. In other circumstances, lenders are content with so-called "agreement to pledge" or "agreement to deliver" arrangements, where the debtor retains the positions in its own account, but reflects on its books that the positions have been hypothecated and promises that the securities will be transferred to the secured party's account on demand.

The perfection and priority rules of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] are designed to facilitate current secured financing arrangements for securities firms as well as to provide sufficient flexibility to accommodate new arrangements that develop in the future. Hard pledge arrangements are covered by the concept of control. See Sections 9-314, 9-106, 8-106 [30-9A-314, 30-9A-106, and 30-8-116]. Non-control secured financing arrangements for securities firms are covered by the automatic perfection rule of paragraph (10) [subsection (10)]. Before the 1994 revision of Articles 8 and 9 [Title 30, chapters 8 and 9A], agreement to pledge arrangements could be implemented under a provision that a security interest in securities given for new value under a written security agreement was perfected without filing or possession for a period of 21 days. Although the security interests were temporary in legal theory, the financing arrangements could, in practice, be continued indefinitely by rolling over the loans at least every 21 days. Accordingly, a knowledgeable creditor of a securities firm realizes that the firm's securities may be subject to security interests that are not discoverable from any public records. The automatic-perfection rule of paragraph (10) [subsection (10)] makes it unnecessary to engage in the purely formal practice of rolling over these arrangements every 21 days.

In some circumstances, a clearing corporation may be the debtor in a secured financing arrangement. For example, a clearing corporation that settles delivery-versus-payment transactions among its participants on a net, same-day basis relies on timely payments from all participants with net obligations due to the system. If a participant that is a net debtor were to default on its payment obligation, the clearing corporation would not receive some of the funds needed to settle with participants that are net creditors to the system. To complete end-of-day settlement after a payment default by a participant, a clearing corporation that settles on a net, same-day basis may need to draw on credit lines and pledge securities of the defaulting participant or other securities pledged by participants in the clearing corporation to secure such drawings. The clearing corporation may be the top-tier securities intermediary for the securities pledged, so that it would not be practical for the lender to obtain control. Even where the clearing corporation holds some types of securities through other intermediaries, however, the clearing corporation is unlikely to be able to complete the arrangements necessary to convey "control" over the securities to be pledged in time to complete settlement in a timely manner. However, the term "securities intermediary" is defined in Section 8-102(a)(14) [30-8-112(1)(n)] to include clearing corporations. Thus, the perfection rule of paragraph (10) [subsection (10)] applies to security interests in investment property granted by clearing corporations.

7. Beneficial Interests in Trusts. Under former Section 9-302(1)(c) [30-9-302(1)(c), now repealed, see 30-9A-310 and this section], filing was not required to perfect a security interest created by an assignment of a beneficial interest in a trust. Because beneficial interests in trusts are now used as collateral with greater frequency in commercial transactions, under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] filing is required to perfect a security interest in a beneficial interest.

8. Assignments for Benefit of Creditors. No filing or other action is required to perfect an assignment for the benefit of creditors. These assignments are not financing transactions, and the debtor ordinarily will not be engaging in further credit transactions.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-302(1), (2) [30-9-302(1), (2), now repealed].

2. General Rule. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] establishes a central Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] principle: Filing a financing statement is necessary for perfection of security interests and agricultural liens. However, filing is not necessary to perfect a security interest that is perfected by another permissible method, see subsection (b) [subsection (2)], nor does filing ordinarily perfect a security interest in a deposit account, letter-of-credit right, or money. See Section 9-312(b) [30-9A-312(2)]. Part 5 of the Article [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5] deals with the office in which to file, mechanics of filing, and operations of the filing office.

3. Exemptions from Filing. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] lists the security interests for which filing is not required as a condition of perfection, because they are perfected automatically upon attachment (subsections (b)(2) and (b)(9) [subsections (2)(b), and (2)(i)]) or upon the occurrence of another event (subsections (b)(1), (b)(5), and (b)(9) [subsections (2)(a), (2)(e), and (2)(i)]), because they are perfected under the law of another jurisdiction (subsection (b)(10) [subsection (2)(j)]), or because they are perfected by another method, such as by the secured party's taking possession or control (subsections (b)(3), (b)(4), (b)(5), (b)(6), (b)(7), and (b)(8) [subsections (2)(c), (2)(d), (2)(e), (2)(f), (2)(g), and (2)(h)]).

4. Assignments of Perfected Security Interests. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] concerns assignment of a perfected security interest or agricultural lien. It provides that no filing is necessary in connection with an assignment by a secured party to an assignee in order to maintain perfection as against creditors of and transferees from the original debtor.

Example 1: Buyer buys goods from Seller, who retains a security interest in them. After Seller perfects the security interest by filing, Seller assigns the perfected security interest to X. The security interest, in X's hands and without further steps on X's part, continues perfected against Buyer's transferees and creditors.

Example 2: Dealer creates a security interest in specific equipment in favor of Lender. After Lender perfects the security interest in the equipment by filing, Lender assigns the chattel paper (which includes the perfected security interest in Dealer's equipment) to X. The security interest in the equipment, in X's hands and without further steps on X's part, continues perfected against Dealer's transferees and creditors. However, regardless of whether Lender made the assignment to secure Lender's obligation to X or whether the assignment was an outright sale of the chattel paper, the assignment creates a security interest in the chattel paper in favor of X. Accordingly, X must take whatever steps may be required for perfection in order to be protected against Lender's transferees and creditors with respect to the chattel paper.

Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] applies not only to an assignment of a security interest perfected by filing but also to an assignment of a security interest perfected by a method other than by filing, such as by control or by possession. Although subsection (c) [subsection (3)] addresses explicitly only the absence of an additional filing requirement, the same result normally will follow in the case of an assignment of a security interest perfected by a method other than by filing. For example, as long as possession of collateral is maintained by an assignee or by the assignor or another person on behalf of the assignee, no further perfection steps need be taken on account of the assignment to continue perfection as against creditors and transferees of the original debtor. Of course, additional action may be required for perfection of the assignee's interest as against creditors and transferees of the assignor.

Similarly, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] applies to the assignment of a security interest perfected by compliance with a statute, regulation, or treaty under Section 9-311(b) [30-9A-311(2)], such as a certificate-of-title statute. Unless the statute expressly provides to the contrary, the security interest will remain perfected against creditors of and transferees from the original debtor, even if the assignee takes no action to cause the certificate of title to reflect the assignment or to cause its name to appear on the certificate of title. See PEB Commentary No. 12, which discusses this issue under former Section 9-302(3) [30-9-302(3), now repealed, see 30-9A-311]. Compliance with the statute is "equivalent to filing" under Section 9-311(b) [30-9A-311(2)].

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Business Equipment for Lease: A trencher held by a leasing business falls into none of the categories for which filing is not required. Since it is business equipment for lease, the perfection of a security interest in the trencher required filing with the Secretary of State. Between two rival security interests, one filed with the Secretary of State on June 19, 1978, and one filed initially with a County Clerk and Recorder on December 13, 1979, and subsequently filed with the Secretary of State on March 13, 1981, the former prevailed. 30-9A-311. Perfection of security interests in property subject to certain statutes, regulations, and treaties.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-302(3), (4) [30-9-302(3), (4), now repealed].

2. Federal Statutes, Regulations, and Treaties. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] exempts from the filing provisions of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] transactions as to which a system of filing-state or federal-has been established under federal law. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] makes clear that when such a system exists, perfection of a relevant security interest can be achieved only through compliance with that system (i.e., filing under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] is not a permissible alternative).

An example of the type of federal statute referred to in subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] is 49 U.S.C. §§44107-11, for civil aircraft of the United States. The Assignment of Claims Act of 1940, as amended, provides for notice to contracting and disbursing officers and to sureties on bonds but does not establish a national filing system and therefore is not within the scope of subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)]. An assignee of a claim against the United States may benefit from compliance with the Assignment of Claims Act. But regardless of whether the assignee complies with that Act, the assignee must file under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] in order to perfect its security interest against creditors and transferees of its assignor.

Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] provides explicitly that the filing requirement of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] defers only to federal statutes, regulations, or treaties whose requirements for a security interest's obtaining priority over the rights of a lien creditor preempt Section 9-310(a) [30-9A-310(1)]. The provision eschews reference to the term "perfection," inasmuch as Section 9-308 [30-9A-308] specifies the meaning of that term and a preemptive rule may use other terminology.

3. State Statutes. Subsections (a)(2) and (3) [subsections (1)(b) and (1)(c)] exempt from the filing requirements of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] transactions covered by State certificate-of-title statutes covering motor vehicles and the like. The description of certificate-of-title statutes in subsections (a)(2) and (a)(3) [subsection (1)(b) and (1)(c)] tracks the language of the definition of "certificate of title" in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. For a discussion of the operation of state certificate-of-title statutes in interstate contexts, see the Comments to Section 9-303 [30-9A-303].

Some states have enacted central filing statutes with respect to secured transactions in kinds of property that are of special importance in the local economy. Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] defers to these statutes with respect to filing for that property.

4. Inventory Covered by Certificate of Title. Under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], perfection of a security interest in the inventory of a dealer is governed by the normal perfection rules, even if the inventory is covered by a certificate of title. Under former Section 9-302(3) [30-9-302(3), now repealed], a secured party who financed a dealer may have needed to perfect by filing for goods held for sale and by compliance with a certificate-of-title statute for goods held for lease. In some cases, this may have required notation on thousands of certificates. The problem would have been compounded by the fact that dealers, particularly of automobiles, often do not know whether a particular item of inventory will be sold or leased. Under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], notation is both unnecessary and ineffective.

The filing and other perfection provisions of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] apply to goods covered by a certificate of title only "during any period in which collateral is inventory held for sale or lease or leased." If the debtor takes goods of this kind out of inventory and uses them, say, as equipment, a filed financing statement would not remain effective to perfect a security interest.

5. Compliance with Perfection Requirements of Other Statute. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] makes clear that compliance with the perfection requirements (i.e., the requirements for obtaining priority over a lien creditor), but not other requirements, of a statute, regulation, or treaty described in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is sufficient for perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Perfection of a security interest under such a statute, regulation, or treaty has all the consequences of perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A].

The interplay of this section with certain certificate-of-title statutes may create confusion and uncertainty. For example, statutes under which perfection does not occur until a certificate of title is issued will create a gap between the time that the goods are covered by the certificate under Section 9-303 [30-9A-303] and the time of perfection. If the gap is long enough, it may result in turning some unobjectionable transactions into avoidable preferences under Bankruptcy Code Section 547. (The preference risk arises if more than ten days (or 20 days, in the case of a purchase-money security interest) passes between the time a security interest attaches (or the debtor receives possession of the collateral, in the case of a purchase-money security interest) and the time it is perfected.) Accordingly, the Legislative Note to this section instructs the legislature to amend the applicable certificate-of-title statute to provide that perfection occurs upon receipt by the appropriate State official of a properly tendered application for a certificate of title on which the security interest is to be indicated.

Under some certificate-of-title statutes, including the Uniform Motor Vehicle Certificate of Title and Anti-Theft Act, perfection generally occurs upon delivery of specified documents to a state official but may, under certain circumstances, relate back to the time of attachment. This relation-back feature can create great difficulties for the application of the rules in Sections 9-303 and 9-311(b) [30-9A-303 and 30-9A-311(2)]. Accordingly, the Legislative Note also recommends to legislatures that they remove any relation-back provisions from certificate-of-title statutes affecting security interests.

6. Compliance with Perfection Requirements of Other Statute as Equivalent to Filing. Under Subsection (b) [subsection (2)], compliance with the perfection requirements (i.e., the requirements for obtaining priority over a lien creditor) of a statute, regulation, or treaty described in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] "is equivalent to the filing of a financing statement."

The quoted phrase appeared in former Section 9-302(3) [30-9-302(3), now repealed]. Its meaning was unclear, and many questions arose concerning the extent to which and manner in which Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] rules referring to "filing" were applicable to perfection by compliance with a certificate-of-title statute. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes a variety of approaches for applying Article 9's [Title 30, chapter 9A] filing rules to compliance with other statutes and treaties. First, as discussed above in Comment 5, it leaves the determination of some rules, such as the rule establishing time of perfection (Section 9-516(a) [30-9A-516(1)]), to the other statutes themselves. Second, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] explicitly applies some Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] filing rules to perfection under other statutes or treaties. See, e.g., Section 9-505 [30-9A-505]. Third, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] makes other Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] rules applicable to security interests perfected by compliance with another statute through the "equivalent to . . . filing" provision in the first sentence of Section 9-311(b) [30-9A-311(2)]. The third approach is reflected for the most part in occasional Comments explaining how particular rules apply when perfection is accomplished under Section 9-311(b) [30-9A-311(2)]. See, e.g., Section 9-310 [30-9A-310], Comment 4; Section 9-315 [30-9A-315], Comment 6; Section 9-317 [30-9A-317], Comment 8. The absence of a Comment indicating that a particular filing provision applies to perfection pursuant to Section 9-311(b) [30-9A-311(2)] does not mean the provision is inapplicable.

7. Perfection by Possession of Goods Covered by Certificate-of-Title Statute. A secured party who holds a security interest perfected under the law of State A in goods that subsequently are covered by a State B certificate of title may face a predicament. Ordinarily, the secured party will have four months under State B's Section 9-316(c) and (d) [30-9A-316(3) and (4)] in which to (re)perfect as against a purchaser of the goods by having its security interest noted on a State B certificate. This procedure is likely to require the cooperation of the debtor and any competing secured party whose security interest has been noted on the certificate. Comment 4(e) to former Section 9-103 [30-9-103, now repealed, see 30-9A-303 and 30-9A-337] observed that "that cooperation is not likely to be forthcoming from an owner who wrongfully procured the issuance of a new certificate not showing the out-of-state security interest, or from a local secured party finding himself in a priority contest with the out-of-state secured party." According to that Comment, "[t]he only solution for the out-of-state secured party under present certificate of title statutes seems to be to reperfect by possession, i.e., by repossessing the goods." But the "solution" may not have worked: Former Section 9-302(4) [30-9-302(4), now repealed] provided that a security interest in property subject to a certificate-of-title statute "can be perfected only by compliance therewith."

Sections 9-316(d) and (e), 9-311(c), and 9-313(b) [30-9A-316(4) and (5), 30-9A-311(3), and 30-9A-313(2)] of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] resolve the conflict by providing that a security interest that remains perfected solely by virtue of Section 9-316(e) [30-9A-316(5)] can be (re)perfected by the secured party's taking possession of the collateral. These sections contemplate only that taking possession of goods covered by a certificate of title will work as a method of perfection. None of these sections creates a right to take possession. Section 9-609 [30-9A-609] and the agreement of the parties define the secured party's right to take possession.

Compiler's Comments

2003 Amendment: Chapter 477 in (1)(b) substituted "certificate of title" for "certificate of ownership"; in (1)(c) near middle after "certificate" inserted "of title"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective January 1, 2004.

Applicability: Section 85(1), Ch. 477, L. 2003, provided that this section applies to motor vehicle certificates of title and registrations on or after January 1, 2004.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 179 near beginning of (4) after "collateral" inserted "subject to a statute specified in subsection (1)(b)", near middle after "selling" deleted "or leasing", and at end deleted "as debtor"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

30-9A-312. Perfection of security interests in chattel paper, deposit accounts, documents, goods covered by documents, instruments, investment property, letter-of-credit rights, and money — perfection by permissive filing — temporary perfection without filing or transfer of possession.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-304 [30-9-304, now repealed], with additions and some changes.

2. Instruments. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1)], a security interest in instruments may be perfected by filing. This rule represents an important change from former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], under which the secured party's taking possession of an instrument was the only method of achieving long-term perfection. The rule is likely to be particularly useful in transactions involving a large number of notes that a debtor uses as collateral but continues to collect from the makers. A security interest perfected by filing is subject to defeat by certain subsequent purchasers (including secured parties). Under Section 9-330(d) [30-9A-330(4)], purchasers for value who take possession of an instrument without knowledge that the purchase violates the rights of the secured party generally would achieve priority over a security interest in the instrument perfected by filing. In addition, Section 9-331 [30-9A-331] provides that filing a financing statement does not constitute notice that would preclude a subsequent purchaser from becoming a holder in due course and taking free of all claims under Section 3-306 [30-9A-306].

3. Chattel Paper; Negotiable Documents. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] further provides that filing is available as a method of perfection for security interests in chattel paper and negotiable documents. Tangible chattel paper is sometimes delivered to the assignee, and sometimes left in the hands of the assignor for collection. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] allows the assignee to perfect its security interest by filing in the latter case. Alternatively, the assignee may perfect by taking possession. See Section 9-313(a) [30-9A-313(1)]. An assignee of electronic chattel paper may perfect by taking control. See Sections 9-314(a), 9-105 [30-9A-314(1) and 30-9A-105]. The security interest of an assignee who takes possession or control may qualify for priority over a competing security interest perfected by filing. See Section 9-330 [30-9A-330].

Negotiable documents may be, and usually are, delivered to the secured party. The secured party's taking possession will suffice as a perfection step. See Section 9-313(a) [30-9A-313(1)]. However, as is the case with chattel paper, a security interest in a negotiable document may be perfected by filing.

4. Investment Property. A security interest in investment property, including certificated securities, uncertificated securities, security entitlements, and securities accounts, may be perfected by filing. However, security interests created by brokers, securities intermediaries, or commodity intermediaries are automatically perfected; filing is of no effect. See Section 9-309(10), (11) [30-9A-309(10) and (11)]. A security interest in all kinds of investment property also may be perfected by control, see Sections 9-314, 9-106 [30-9A-314 and 30-9A-106], and a security interest in a certificated security also may be perfected by the secured party's taking delivery under Section 8-301 [30-8-331]. See Section 9-313(a) [30-9A-313(1)]. A security interest perfected only by filing is subordinate to a conflicting security interest perfected by control or delivery. See Section 9-328(1), (5) [30-9A-328(1) and (5)]. Thus, although filing is a permissible method of perfection, a secured party who perfects by filing takes the risk that the debtor has granted or will grant a security interest in the same collateral to another party who obtains control. Also, perfection by filing would not give the secured party protection against other types of adverse claims, since the Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] adverse claim cut-off rules require control. See Section 8-510 [30-8-510].

5. Deposit Accounts. Under new subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)], the only method of perfecting a security interest in a deposit account as original collateral is by control. Filing is ineffective, except as provided in Section 9-315 [30-9A-315] with respect to proceeds. As explained in Section 9-104 [30-9A-104], "control" can arise as a result of an agreement among the secured party, debtor, and bank, whereby the bank agrees to comply with instructions of the secured party with respect to disposition of the funds on deposit, even though the debtor retains the right to direct disposition of the funds. Thus, subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] takes an intermediate position between certain non-UCC law, which conditions the effectiveness of a security interest on the secured party's enjoyment of such dominion and control over the deposit account that the debtor is unable to dispose of the funds, and the approach this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes to securities accounts, under which a secured party who is unable to reach the collateral without resort to judicial process may perfect by filing. By conditioning perfection on "control," rather than requiring the secured party to enjoy absolute dominion to the exclusion of the debtor, subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] permits perfection in a wide variety of transactions, including those in which the secured party actually relies on the deposit account in extending credit and maintains some meaningful dominion over it, but does not wish to deprive the debtor of access to the funds altogether.

6. Letter-of-Credit Rights. Letter-of-credit rights commonly are "supporting obligations," as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. Perfection as to the related account, chattel paper, document, general intangible, instrument, or investment property will perfect as to the letter-of-credit rights. See Section 9-308(d) [30-9A-308(4)]. Subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)] provides that, in other cases, a security interest in a letter-of-credit right may be perfected only by control. "Control," for these purposes, is explained in Section 9-107 [30-9A-107].

7. Goods Covered by Document of Title. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] applies to goods in the possession of a bailee who has issued a negotiable document covering the goods. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] applies to goods in the possession of a bailee who has issued a nonnegotiable document of title, including a document of title that is "non-negotiable" under Section 7-104 [30-7-104]. Section 9-313 [30-9A-313] governs perfection of a security interest in goods in the possession of a bailee who has not issued a document of title.

Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] clarifies the perfection and priority rules in former Section 9-304(2) [30-9-304(2), now repealed]. Consistently with the provisions of Article 7 [Title 30, chapter 7], subsection (c) [subsection (3)] takes the position that, as long as a negotiable document covering goods is outstanding, title to the goods is, so to say, locked up in the document. Accordingly, a security interest in goods covered by a negotiable document may be perfected by perfecting a security interest in the document. The security interest also may be perfected by another method, e.g., by filing. The priority rule in subsection (c) [subsection (3)] governs only priority between (i) a security interest in goods which is perfected by perfecting in the document and (ii) a security interest in the goods which becomes perfected by another method while the goods are covered by the document.

Example 1: While wheat is in a grain elevator and covered by a negotiable warehouse receipt, Debtor creates a security interest in the wheat in favor of SP-1 and SP-2. SP-1 perfects by filing a financing statement covering "wheat." Thereafter, SP-2 perfects by filing a financing statement describing the warehouse receipt. Subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a)] provides that SP-2's security interest is perfected. Subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)] provides that SP-2's security interest is senior to SP-1's.

Example 2: The facts are as in Example 1, but SP-1's security interest attached and was perfected before the goods were delivered to the grain elevator. Subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)] does not apply, because SP-1's security interest did not become perfected during the time that the wheat was in the possession of a bailee. Rather, the first-to-file-or-perfect priority rule applies. See Section 9-322 [30-9A-322].

A secured party may become "a holder to whom a negotiable document of title has been duly negotiated" under Section 7-501 [30-7-501]. If so, the secured party acquires the rights specified by Article 7 [Title 30, chapter 7]. Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not limit those rights, which may include the right to priority over an earlier-perfected security interest. See Section 9-331(a) [30-9A-331(1)].

Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] takes a different approach to the problem of goods covered by a nonnegotiable document. Here, title to the goods is not looked on as being locked up in the document, and the secured party may perfect its security interest directly in the goods by filing as to them. The subsection provides two other methods of perfection: issuance of the document in the secured party's name (as consignee of a straight bill of lading or the person to whom delivery would be made under a non-negotiable warehouse receipt) and receipt of notification of the secured party's interest by the bailee. Perfection under subsection (d) [subsection (4)] occurs when the bailee receives notification of the secured party's interest in the goods, regardless of who sends the notification. Receipt of notification is effective to perfect, regardless of whether the bailee responds. Unlike former Section 9-304(3) [30-9-304(3), now repealed], from which it derives, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] does not apply to goods in the possession of a bailee who has not issued a document of title. Section 9-313(c) [30-9A-313(3)] covers that case and provides that perfection by possession as to goods not covered by a document requires the bailee's acknowledgment.

8. Temporary Perfection Without Having First Otherwise Perfected. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] follows former Section 9-304(4) [30-9-304(4), now repealed] in giving perfected status to security interests in certificated securities, instruments, and negotiable documents for a short period (reduced from 21 to 20 days, which is the time period generally applicable in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]), although there has been no filing and the collateral is in the debtor's possession. The 20-day temporary perfection runs from the date of attachment. There is no limitation on the purpose for which the debtor is in possession, but the secured party must have given "new value" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]) under an authenticated security agreement.

9. Maintaining Perfection After Surrendering Possession. There are a variety of legitimate reasons-many of them are described in subsections (f) and (g) [subsections (6) and (7)]-why certain types of collateral must be released temporarily to a debtor. No useful purpose would be served by cluttering the files with records of such exceedingly short term transactions.

Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] affords the possibility of 20-day perfection in negotiable documents and goods in the possession of a bailee but not covered by a negotiable document. Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] provides for 20-day perfection in certificated securities and instruments. These subsections derive from former Section 9-305(5) [30-9-305(5), now repealed, see 30-9A-313]. However, the period of temporary perfection has been reduced from 21 to 20 days, which is the time period generally applicable in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], and "enforcement" has been added in subsection (g) [subsection (7)] as one of the special and limited purposes for which a secured party can release an instrument or certificated security to the debtor and still remain perfected. The period of temporary perfection runs from the date a secured party who already has a perfected security interest turns over the collateral to the debtor. There is no new value requirement, but the turnover must be for one or more of the purposes stated in subsection (f) or (g) [subsection (6) or (7)]. The 20-day period may be extended by perfecting as to the collateral by another method before the period expires. However, if the security interest is not perfected by another method until after the 20-day period expires, there will be a gap during which the security interest is unperfected.

Temporary perfection extends only to the negotiable document or goods under subsection (f) [subsection (6)] and only to the certificated security or instrument under subsection (g) [subsection (7)]. It does not extend to proceeds. If the collateral is sold, the security interest will continue in the proceeds for the period specified in Section 9-315 [30-9A-315].

Subsections (f) and (g) [subsections (6) and (7)] deal only with perfection. Other sections of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] govern the priority of a security interest in goods after surrender of the document covering them. In the case of a purchase-money security interest in inventory, priority may be conditioned upon giving notification to a prior inventory financer. See Section 9-324 [30-9A-324].

Case Notes

Failure to Demonstrate That Equitable Interest in Cattle Sold Displaced Perfected Security Interest in Cattle as After-Acquired Property: Bellanger obtained loans from the Daniels-Sheridan Federal Credit Union to finance a ranching operation, securing the loans with several promissory notes securing an interest in the cattle on the ranch. Bellanger subsequently defaulted on the loans, and the credit union initiated an action to enforce the promissory notes pursuant to the Uniform Commercial Code (U.C.C.). The case broadened to encompass disputes over proceeds from the sale of the cattle to include Smith, the owner of the auction company where Bellanger customarily sold cattle, whom the credit union alleged had an inferior security interest in some of the cattle that Smith had sold to Bellanger. The credit union pointed out that Smith had only an unperfected security interest because he failed to perfect a security interest pursuant to the U.C.C. Smith contended that Bellanger had obtained only a leasehold interest in the cattle and that the credit union thus had no security interest in those cattle. The cattle were subsequently seized and sold for $79,012.27, and the District Court split the proceeds, with $45,467.94 paid to the credit union and a judgment for the remainder owed on the promissory notes, and $33,544.33 paid to Smith. The credit union appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The District Court erred in equitably subordinating the credit union's prior perfected security interest to Smith's unperfected security interest. The Supreme Court held that Smith's transaction with Bellanger was a sale, not a lease or bailment, and as such, the hierarchy of priorities for security interests set forth in Article 9 of the U.C.C. (now Title 30, ch. 9A) applied in the credit union's favor. Smith failed to demonstrate that any equitable interest that he had in the cattle displaced the credit union's perfected security interest in the cattle as an after-acquired property of Bellanger, so an equitable carve-out from the U.C.C. principles of hierarchy priority was not justified. 30-9A-313. When possession by or delivery to secured party perfects security interest without filing.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Sections 9-305, 9-115(6) [30-9-305, 30-9-115(6), both now repealed].

2. Perfection by Possession. As under the common law of pledge, no filing is required by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] to perfect a security interest if the secured party takes possession of the collateral. See Section 9-310(b)(6) [30-9A-310(2)(f)].

This section permits a security interest to be perfected by the taking of possession only when the collateral is goods, instruments, negotiable documents, money, or tangible chattel paper.

Accounts, commercial tort claims, deposit accounts, investment property, letter-of-credit rights, letters of credit, and oil, gas, or other minerals before extraction are excluded. (But see Comment 6, below, regarding certificated securities.) A security interest in accounts and payment intangibles-property not ordinarily represented by any writing whose delivery operates to transfer the right to payment-may under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] be perfected only by filing. This rule would not be affected by the fact that a security agreement or other record described the assignment of such collateral as a "pledge." Section 9-309(2) [30-9A-309(2)] exempts from filing certain assignments of accounts or payment intangibles which are out of the ordinary course of financing. These exempted assignments are perfected when they attach. Similarly, under Section 9-309(3) [30-9A-309(3)], sales of payment intangibles are automatically perfected.

3. "Possession." This section does not define "possession." In determining whether a particular person has possession, the principles of agency apply. For example, if the collateral clearly is in possession of an agent of the secured party for the purposes of possessing on behalf of the secured party, and if the agent is not also an agent of the debtor, the secured party has taken actual possession without the need to rely on a third-party acknowledgment. See subsection (c) [subsection (3)] and Comments 4 and 8. However, if the agent is an agent of both the secured party and the debtor, prudence might suggest that the secured party obtain the agent's acknowledgment in order to ensure perfection by possession. The debtor cannot qualify as an agent for the secured party for purposes of the secured party's taking possession. And, under appropriate circumstances, a court may determine that a third person in possession is so closely connected to or controlled by the debtor that the debtor has retained effective possession, even though the third person may have agreed to take possession on behalf of the secured party. If so, the third person's taking possession would not constitute the secured party's taking possession and would not be sufficient for perfection. See also Section 9-205(b) [30-9A-205(2)]. In a typical escrow arrangement, where the escrowee holds possession of collateral as agent for both the secured party and the debtor, the debtor's relationship to the escrowee is not such as to constitute retention of possession by the debtor.

4. Goods in Possession of Third Party: Perfection. Former Section 9-305 [30-9-305, now repealed] permitted perfection of a security interest by notification to a bailee in possession of collateral. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] distinguishes between goods in the possession of a bailee who has issued a document of title covering the goods and goods in the possession of a third party who has not issued a document. Section 9-312(c) or (d) [30-9A-312(3) or (4)] applies to the former, depending on whether the document is negotiable. Section 9-313(c) [30-9A-313(3)] applies to the latter. It provides a method of perfection by possession when the collateral is possessed by a third person who is not the secured party's agent.

Notification of a third person does not suffice to perfect under Section 9-313(c) [30-9A-313(3)]. Rather, perfection does not occur unless the third person authenticates an acknowledgment that it holds possession of the collateral for the secured party's benefit. Compare Section 9-312(d) [30-9A-312(4)], under which receipt of notification of the security party's interest by a bailee holding goods covered by a nonnegotiable document is sufficient to perfect, even if the bailee does not acknowledge receipt of the notification. A third person may acknowledge that it will hold for the secured party's benefit goods to be received in the future. Under these circumstances, perfection by possession occurs when the third person obtains possession of the goods.

Under subsection (c) [subsection (3)], acknowledgment of notification by a "lessee . . . in . . . ordinary course of . . . business" (defined in Section 2A-103 [30-2A-103]) does not suffice for possession. The section thus rejects the reasoning of In re Atlantic Systems, Inc., 135 B.R. 463 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1992) (holding that notification to debtor-lessor's lessee sufficed to perfect security interest in leased goods). See Steven O. Weise, Perfection by Possession: The Need for an Objective Test, 29 Idaho Law Rev. 705 (1992-93) (arguing that lessee's possession in ordinary course of debtor-lessor's business does not provide adequate public notice of possible security interest in leased goods). Inclusion of a per se rule concerning lessees is not meant to preclude a court, under appropriate circumstances, from determining that a third person is so closely connected to or controlled by the debtor that the debtor has retained effective possession. If so, the third person's acknowledgment would not be sufficient for perfection.

5. No Relation Back. Former Section 9-305 [30-9-305, now repealed] provided that a security interest is perfected by possession from the time possession is taken "without a relation back." As the Comment to former Section 9-305 [30-9-305, now repealed] observed, the relation-back theory, under which the taking of possession was deemed to relate back to the date of the original security agreement, has had little vitality since the 1938 revision of the Federal Bankruptcy Act. The theory is inconsistent with former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] and with this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. See Section 9-313(d) [30-9A-313(4)]. Accordingly, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] deletes the quoted phrase as unnecessary. Where a pledge transaction is contemplated, perfection dates only from the time possession is taken, although a security interest may attach, unperfected. The only exceptions to this rule are the short, 20-day periods of perfection provided in Section 9-312(e), (f), and (g) [30-9A-312(5), (6), and (7)], during which a debtor may have possession of specified collateral in which there is a perfected security interest.

6. Certificated Securities. The second sentence of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] reflects the traditional rule for perfection of a security interest in certificated securities. Compare Section 9-115(6) [30-9-115(6), now repealed] (1994 Official Text); Sections 8-321, 8-313(1)(a) [both now repealed] (1978 Official Text); Section 9-305 [30-9-305, now repealed] (1972 Official Text). It has been modified to refer to "delivery" under Section 8-301 [30-8-331]. Corresponding changes appear in Section 9-203(b) [30-9A-203(2)].

Subsections (e), (f), and (g) [subsections (5), (6), and (7)], which are new, apply to a person in possession of security certificates or holding security certificates for the secured party's benefit under Section 8-301 [30-8-331]. For delivery to occur when a person other than a secured party holds possession for the secured party, the person may not be a securities intermediary.

Under subsection (e) [subsection (5)], a possessory security interest in a certificated security remains perfected until the debtor obtains possession of the security certificate. This rule is analogous to that of Section 9-314(c) [30-9A-314(3)], which deals with perfection of security interests in investment property by control. See Section 9-314 [30-9A-314], Comment 3.

7. Goods Covered by Certificate of Title. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is necessary to effect changes to the choice-of-law rules governing goods covered by a certificate of title. These changes are described in the Comments to Section 9-311 [30-9A-311]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)], like subsection (a) [subsection (1)], does not create a right to take possession. Rather, it indicates the circumstances under which the secured party's taking possession of goods covered by a certificate of title is effective to perfect a security interest in the goods: the goods become covered by a certificate of title issued by this State at a time when the security interest is perfected by any method under the law of another jurisdiction.

8. Goods in Possession of Third Party: No Duty to Acknowledge; Consequences of Acknowledgment. Subsections (f) and (g) [subsections (6) and (7)] are new and address matters as to which former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] was silent. They derive in part from Section 8-106(g) [30-8-116(7)]. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] provides that a person in possession of collateral is not required to acknowledge that it holds for a secured party. Subsection (g)(1) [subsection (7)(a)] provides that an acknowledgment is effective even if wrongful as to the debtor. Subsection (g)(2) [subsection (7)(b)] makes clear that an acknowledgment does not give rise to any duties or responsibilities under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Arrangements involving the possession of goods are hardly standardized. They include bailments for services to be performed on the goods (such as repair or processing), for use (leases), as security (pledges), for carriage, and for storage. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] leaves to the agreement of the parties and to any other applicable law the imposition of duties and responsibilities upon a person who acknowledges under subsection (c) [subsection (3)]. For example, by acknowledging, a third party does not become obliged to act on the secured party's direction or to remain in possession of the collateral unless it agrees to do so or other law so provides.

9. Delivery to Third Party by Secured Party. New subsections (h) and (i) [subsections (8) and (9)] address the practice of mortgage warehouse lenders. These lenders typically send mortgage notes to prospective purchasers under cover of letters advising the prospective purchasers that the lenders hold security interests in the notes. These lenders relied on notification to maintain perfection under former 9-305 [30-9-305, now repealed]. Requiring them to obtain authenticated acknowledgments from each prospective purchaser under subsection (c) [subsection (3)] could be unduly burdensome and disruptive of established practices. Under subsection (h) [subsection (8)], when a secured party in possession itself delivers the collateral to a third party, instructions to the third party would be sufficient to maintain perfection by possession; an acknowledgment would not be necessary. Under subsection (i) [subsection (9)], the secured party does not relinquish possession by making a delivery under subsection (h) [subsection (8)], even if the delivery violates the rights of the debtor. That subsection also makes clear that a person to whom collateral is delivered under subsection (h) [subsection (8)] does not owe any duty to the secured party and is not required to confirm the delivery to another person unless the person otherwise agrees or law other than this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] provides otherwise.

30-9A-314. Perfection by control.

Official Comments

1. Source. Substantially new; derived in part from former Section 9-115(4) [30-9-115(4), now repealed].

2. Control. This section provides for perfection by control with respect to investment property, deposit accounts, letter-of-credit rights, and electronic chattel paper. For explanations of how a secured party takes control of these types of collateral, see Sections 9-104 through 9-107 [30-9A-104 through 30-9A-107]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] explains when a security interest is perfected by control and how long a security interest remains perfected by control. Like Section 9-313(d) [30-9A-313(4)] and for the same reasons, subsection (b) [subsection (2)] makes no reference to the doctrine of "relation back." See Section 9-313 [30-9A-313], Comment 5.

3. Investment Property. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides a special rule for investment property. Once a secured party has control, its security interest remains perfected by control until the secured party ceases to have control and the debtor receives possession of collateral that is a certificated security, becomes the registered owner of collateral that is an uncertificated security, or becomes the entitlement holder of collateral that is a security entitlement. The result is particularly important in the "repledge" context. See Section 9-207 [30-9A-207], Comment 5.

In a transaction in which a secured party who has control grants a security interest in investment property or sells outright the investment property, by virtue of the debtor's consent or applicable legal rules, a purchaser from the secured party typically will cut off the debtor's rights in the investment property or be immune from the debtor's claims. See Section 9-207 [30-9A-207], Comments 5 and 6. If the investment property is a security, the debtor normally would retain no interest in the security following the purchase from the secured party, and a claim of the debtor against the secured party for redemption (Section 9-623) [30-9A-623] or otherwise with respect to the security would be a purely personal claim. If the investment property transferred by the secured party is a financial asset in which the debtor had a security entitlement credited to a securities account maintained with the secured party as a securities intermediary, the debtor's claim against the secured party could arise as a part of its securities account notwithstanding its personal nature. (This claim would be analogous to a "credit balance" in the securities account, which is a component of the securities account even though it is a personal claim against the intermediary.) In the case in which the debtor may retain an interest in investment property notwithstanding a repledge or sale by the secured party, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] makes clear that the security interest will remain perfected by control.

30-9A-315. Secured party's rights on disposition of collateral and in proceeds.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-306 [30-9-306, now repealed].

2. Continuation of Security Interest or Agricultural Lien Following Disposition of Collateral. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)], which derives from former Section 9-306(2) [30-9-306(2), now repealed], contains the general rule that a security interest survives disposition of the collateral. In these cases, the secured party may repossess the collateral from the transferee or, in an appropriate case, maintain an action for conversion. The secured party may claim both any proceeds and the original collateral but, of course, may have only one satisfaction.

In many cases, a purchaser or other transferee of collateral will take free of a security interest, and the secured party's only right will be to proceeds. For example, the general rule does not apply, and a security interest does not continue in collateral, if the secured party authorized the disposition, in the agreement that contains the security agreement or otherwise. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] adopts the view of PEB Commentary No. 3 and makes explicit that the authorized disposition to which it refers is an authorized disposition "free of" the security interest or agricultural lien. The secured party's right to proceeds under this section or under the express terms of an agreement does not in itself constitute an authorization of disposition. The change in language from former Section 9-306(2) [30-9-306(2), now repealed] is not intended to address the frequently litigated situation in which the effectiveness of the secured party's consent to a disposition is conditioned upon the secured party's receipt of the proceeds. In that situation, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] leaves the determination of authorization to the courts, as under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed].

This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] contains several provisions under which a transferee takes free of a security interest or agricultural lien. For example, Section 9-317 [30-9A-317] states when transferees take free of unperfected security interests; Sections 9-320 and 9-321 [30-9A-320 and 30-9A-321] on goods, 9-321 [30-9A-321] on general intangibles, 9-330 [30-9A-330] on chattel paper and instruments, and 9-331 [30-9A-331] on negotiable instruments, negotiable documents, and securities state when purchasers of such collateral take free of a security interest, even though perfected and even though the disposition was not authorized. Section 9-332 [30-9A-332] enables most transferees (including non-purchasers) of funds from a deposit account and most transferees of money to take free of a perfected security interest in the deposit account or money.

Likewise, the general rule that a security interest survives disposition does not apply if the secured party entrusts goods collateral to a merchant who deals in goods of that kind and the merchant sells the collateral to a buyer in ordinary course of business. Section 2-403(2) [30-2-403 (2)] gives the merchant the power to transfer all the secured party's rights to the buyer, even if the sale is wrongful as against the secured party. Thus, under subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)], an entrusting secured party runs the same risk as any other entruster.

3. Secured Party's Right to Identifiable Proceeds. Under subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)], which derives from former Section 9-306(2) [30-9-306(2), now repealed], a security interest attaches to any identifiable "proceeds," as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. See also Section 9-203(f) [30-9A-203(6)]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is new. It indicates when proceeds commingled with other property are identifiable proceeds and permits the use of whatever methods of tracing other law permits with respect to the type of property involved. Among the "equitable principles" whose use other law may permit is the "lowest intermediate balance rule." See Restatement (2d), Trusts §202.

4. Automatic Perfection in Proceeds: General Rule. Under subsection (c) [subsection (3)], a security interest in proceeds is a perfected security interest if the security interest in the original collateral was perfected. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] extends the period of automatic perfection in proceeds from 10 days to 20 days. Generally, a security interest in proceeds becomes unperfected on the 21st day after the security interest attaches to the proceeds. See subsection (d) [subsection (4)]. The loss of perfected status under subsection (d) [subsection 4] is prospective only. Compare, e.g., Section 9-515(c) [30-9A-515 (3)] (deeming security interest unperfected retroactively).

5. Automatic Perfection in Proceeds: Proceeds Acquired with Cash Proceeds. Subsection (d)(1) [subsection (4)(a)] derives from former Section 9-306(3)(a) [30-9-306(3)(a), now repealed]. It carries forward the basic rule that a security interest in proceeds remains perfected beyond the period of automatic perfection if a filed financing statement covers the original collateral (e.g., inventory) and the proceeds are collateral in which a security interest may be perfected by filing in the office where the financing statement has been filed (e.g., equipment). A different rule applies if the proceeds are acquired with cash proceeds, as is the case if the original collateral (inventory) is sold for cash (cash proceeds) that is used to purchase equipment (proceeds). Under these circumstances, the security interest in the equipment proceeds remains perfected only if the description in the filed financing indicates the type of property constituting the proceeds (e.g., "equipment").

This section reaches the same result but takes a different approach. It recognizes that the treatment of proceeds acquired with cash proceeds under former Section 9-306(3)(a) [30-9-306(3)(a), now repealed] essentially was superfluous. In the example, had the filing covered "equipment" as well as "inventory," the security interest in the proceeds would have been perfected under the usual rules governing after-acquired equipment (see former Sections 9-302, 9-303) [30-9-302, 30-9-303, both now repealed, see 30-9A-308 through 30-9A-311]; paragraph (3)(a) [subsection (3)(a)] added only an exception to the general rule. Subsection (d)(1)(C) [subsection (4)(a)(iii)] of this section takes a more direct approach. It makes the general rule of continued perfection inapplicable to proceeds acquired with cash proceeds, leaving perfection of a security interest in those proceeds to the generally applicable perfection rules under subsection (d)(3) [subsection (4)(c)].

Example 1: Lender perfects a security interest in Debtor's inventory by filing a financing statement covering "inventory." Debtor sells the inventory and deposits the buyer's check into a deposit account. Debtor draws a check on the deposit account and uses it to pay for equipment. Under the "lowest intermediate balance rule," which is a permitted method of tracing in the relevant jurisdiction, see Comment 3, the funds used to pay for the equipment were identifiable proceeds of the inventory. Because the proceeds (equipment) were acquired with cash proceeds (deposit account), subsection (d)(1) [subsection (4)(a)] does not extend perfection beyond the 20-day automatic period.

Example 2: Lender perfects a security interest in Debtor's inventory by filing a financing statement covering "all debtor's property." As in Example 1, Debtor sells the inventory, deposits the buyer's check into a deposit account, draws a check on the deposit account, and uses the check to pay for equipment. Under the "lowest intermediate balance rule," which is a permitted method of tracing in the relevant jurisdiction, see Comment 3, the funds used to pay for the equipment were identifiable proceeds of the inventory. Because the proceeds (equipment) were acquired with cash proceeds (deposit account), subsection (d)(1) [subsection (4)(a)] does not extend perfection beyond the 20-day automatic period. However, because the financing statement is sufficient to perfect a security interest in debtor's equipment, under subsection (d)(3) [subsection (4)(c)] the security interest in the equipment proceeds remains perfected beyond the 20-day period.

6. Automatic Perfection in Proceeds: Lapse or Termination of Financing Statement During 20-Day Period; Perfection Under Other Statute or Treaty. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] provides that a security interest in proceeds perfected under subsection (d)(1) [subsection (4)(a)] ceases to be perfected when the financing statement covering the original collateral lapses or is terminated. If the lapse or termination occurs before the 21st day after the security interest attaches, however, the security interest in the proceeds remains perfected until the 21st day. Section 9-311(b) [30-9A-311(2)] provides that compliance with the perfection requirements of a statute or treaty described in Section 9-311(a) [30-9A-311(1)] "is equivalent to the filing of a financing statement." It follows that collateral subject to a security interest perfected by such compliance under Section 9-311(b) [30-9A-311(2)] is covered by a "filed financing statement" within the meaning of Section 9-315(d) and (e) [30-9A-315(4) and (5)].

7. Automatic Perfection in Proceeds: Continuation of Perfection in Cash Proceeds. Former Section 9-306(3)(b) [30-9-306(3)(b), now repealed] provided that if a filed financing statement covered original collateral, a security interest in identifiable cash proceeds of the collateral remained perfected beyond the ten-day period of automatic perfection. Former Section 9-306(3)(c) [not adopted in Montana] contained a similar rule with respect to identifiable cash proceeds of investment property. Subsection (d)(2) [subsection (4)(b)] extends the benefits of former Sections 9-306(3)(b) and (3)(c) [30-9-306(3)(b), now repealed] to identifiable cash proceeds of all types of original collateral in which a security interest is perfected by any method. Under subsection (d)(2) [subsection (4)(b)], if the security interest in the original collateral was perfected, a security interest in identifiable cash proceeds will remain perfected indefinitely, regardless of whether the security interest in the original collateral remains perfected. In many cases, however, a purchaser or other transferee of the cash proceeds will take free of the perfected security interest. See, e.g., Sections 9-330(d) [30-9A-330(4)] (purchaser of check), 9-331 [30-9A-331] (holder in due course of check), 9-332 [30-9A-332] (transferee of money or funds from a deposit account).

8. Insolvency Proceedings; Returned and Repossessed Goods. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] deletes former Section 9-306(4) [30-9-306(4), now repealed], which dealt with proceeds in insolvency proceedings. Except as otherwise provided by the Bankruptcy Code, the debtor's entering into bankruptcy does not affect a secured party's right to proceeds.

This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] also deletes former Section 9-306(5) [30-9-306(5), now repealed], which dealt with returned and repossessed goods. Section 9-330 [30-9A-330], Comments 9 to 11 explain and clarify the application of priority rules to returned and repossessed goods as proceeds of chattel paper.

9. Proceeds of Collateral Subject to Agricultural Lien. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not determine whether a lien extends to proceeds of farm products encumbered by an agricultural lien. If, however, the proceeds are themselves farm products on which an "agricultural lien" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]) arises under other law, then the agricultural-lien provisions of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] apply to the agricultural lien on the proceeds in the same way in which they would apply had the farm products not been proceeds.

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED AFTER 1999 REVISION

Failure to Demonstrate That Equitable Interest in Cattle Sold Displaced Perfected Security Interest in Cattle as After-Acquired Property: Bellanger obtained loans from the Daniels-Sheridan Federal Credit Union to finance a ranching operation, securing the loans with several promissory notes securing an interest in the cattle on the ranch. Bellanger subsequently defaulted on the loans, and the credit union initiated an action to enforce the promissory notes pursuant to the Uniform Commercial Code (U.C.C.). The case broadened to encompass disputes over proceeds from the sale of the cattle to include Smith, the owner of the auction company where Bellanger customarily sold cattle, whom the credit union alleged had an inferior security interest in some of the cattle that Smith had sold to Bellanger. The credit union pointed out that Smith had only an unperfected security interest because he failed to perfect a security interest pursuant to the U.C.C. Smith contended that Bellanger had obtained only a leasehold interest in the cattle and that the credit union thus had no security interest in those cattle. The cattle were subsequently seized and sold for $79,012.27, and the District Court split the proceeds, with $45,467.94 paid to the credit union and a judgment for the remainder owed on the promissory notes, and $33,544.33 paid to Smith. The credit union appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The District Court erred in equitably subordinating the credit union's prior perfected security interest to Smith's unperfected security interest. The Supreme Court held that Smith's transaction with Bellanger was a sale, not a lease or bailment, and as such, the hierarchy of priorities for security interests set forth in Article 9 of the U.C.C. (now Title 30, ch. 9A) applied in the credit union's favor. Smith failed to demonstrate that any equitable interest that he had in the cattle displaced the credit union's perfected security interest in the cattle as an after-acquired property of Bellanger, so an equitable carve-out from the U.C.C. principles of hierarchy priority was not justified. CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Giving Payoff Figure Not Considered Consent to Sale of Collateral or Extinguishment of Security Interest: A debtor contacted a lending bank to obtain a loan payoff figure, informing the bank that the loan would be paid from proceeds of the sale of collateral. Merely cooperating by giving a payoff figure did not constitute the bank's acquiescence in the sale of the collateral or extinguishment of the bank's security interest. Am. Fed. S&L Ass'n v. Madison Valley Properties, Inc., 1998 MT 93, 288 M 365, 958 P2d 57, 55 St. Rep. 366 (1998).

Promisor's Death — Bank Allowed to Offset Deposits and Credit to Promissory Notes: Promissory notes provided that if promisor died, bank could declare, without notice, the notes to be due and owing. The bank could then, without notice, offset against the notes' balances any balance standing to the deceased's credit. The proceeds from a cattle sale were not "standing to the deceased's credit" at the time of his death. However, since that money was derived directly from the sale of collateral, it also became collateral for the promissory notes. The bank's actions were supported by its security interest in proceeds from the cattle sale and its adherence to the terms of the promissory notes and the articles of co-partnership of promisor's business. NW. Bank of Lewistown v. Estate of Coppedge, 219 M 473, 713 P2d 523, 43 St. Rep. 102 (1986).

Foreclosure by Secured Party Who Is Also Escrow Agent: Plaintiff bought a photography business and executed a promissory note with defendant. As collateral he assigned stock in the business. Plaintiff sold the business to Wolfe. Wolfe was to make payments to defendant to discharge his obligations, and these payments were to be directly applied to plaintiff's obligation under the promissory note. Defendant was escrow agent. Plaintiff later signed a financing statement granting defendant a security interest in the stock held in escrow. The defendant filed the security agreement. Wolfe became delinquent in his payments, and defendant notified plaintiff his payments were therefore delinquent. A later letter was sent by certified mail to the same address advising plaintiff the stock would be sold and applied to plaintiff's past-due loan. At the sale Wolfe bought the stock for the amount due on plaintiff's note. Plaintiff claimed defendant had breached its fiduciary duty by foreclosing on the stock. The security interest became binding before the parties entered the escrow agreement. The security interest continued in the collateral notwithstanding the sale to Wolfe. Upon default defendant acted within its statutory rights to foreclose on the collateral to satisfy plaintiff's obligation. The escrow arrangement did not prevent defendant as a secured party from exercising its rights to foreclose on collateral on which the debtor defaulted. Dulan v. Mont. Nat'l Bank of Roundup, 203 M 177, 661 P2d 28, 40 St. Rep. 376 (1983), followed in Weldon v. First Citizens Bank of Billings, 259 M 305, 856 P2d 225, 50 St. Rep. 807 (1993).

Security Interest in Inventory — Subsidiary Corporation Transfers to Parent Corporation: A subsidiary corporation owed money to plaintiff under a contract by which plaintiff sold his business and took a security interest in the subsidiary's inventory to cover the balance due on the purchase price. The subsidiary's parent corporation later guaranteed a bank's loan to the subsidiary. The subsidiary defaulted on the loan, the parent paid it upon request of the bank, and the parent took over from the bank a security interest in the subsidiary's inventory, which the bank was given upon granting the loan. This security interest, both in the hands of the bank and in the hands of the parent, was secondary to plaintiff's security interest, which plaintiff had perfected. The subsidiary corporation then sold its entire inventory and placed the proceeds of the sale in the parent corporation's account. The argument that the parent corporation was not liable to plaintiff for the remainder of the purchase price of plaintiff's business because plaintiff knew of and did not object to the sale of the inventory by the subsidiary and thus waived his security interest could not stand. The parent corporation was simply a secured creditor of the subsidiary with a security interest inferior to plaintiff's. Whether or not plaintiff waived his security interest in the subsidiary's inventory has no bearing on plaintiff's right to the proceeds of the sale by the subsidiary of the subsidiary's inventory, as against competing creditors such as the parent corporation. The plaintiff had priority, to the extent of his security interest, in the proceeds of the sale of the inventory whether or not he consented to the sale. Any consent by plaintiff to the sale affected only his rights as against the purchaser of the inventory, barring him from obtaining possession from the purchaser. As against the parent corporation, the plaintiff's security interest took precedence over the parent corporation's security interest. The same person owned the parent and the subsidiary, and the parent had in fact liquidated the subsidiary and deposited the proceeds in the parent's account. This was very close to a fraudulent transaction in that plaintiff's security interest was violated. Therefore, the parent corporation was secondarily liable to the plaintiff for the balance due on the purchase of his business, the subsidiary being primarily liable. Rudio v. Yellowstone Merchandising Corp., 200 M 537, 652 P2d 1163, 39 St. Rep. 1923 (1982).

Res Judicata: Bankruptcy court's rulings that bankrupt did not exchange collateral within 12 months of petition in bankruptcy and that bankrupt did not hold legal title to property received in exchange did not preclude holder of security interest in the collateral from attempting to trace the collateral, and the holder was not liable for malicious prosecution even though it was later held that the security interest was unperfected because filed in the wrong office. 3-D Lumber Co. v. Belgrade St. Bank, 157 M 481, 487 P2d 1136 (1971).

Unperfected Security Interest: Section 30-9-306(2) (section now repealed, see this section) did not apply and holder of security interest was not allowed to trace the proceeds of collateral exchanged, where the security interest had not been perfected because it had been filed in the wrong office. Belgrade St. Bank v. Elder, 157 M 1, 482 P2d 135 (1971).

Application of Proceeds: Where debtor's liquor license had been purchased with advances from bank under security agreement, proceeds from sale of such license were to be applied first to notes secured by such security agreement, then to note secured by an attachment, and finally to other obligations, since sale contract provided that all proceeds were to be placed in escrow with bank to whom all debts were owed. Gallatin Trust & Sav. Bank v. Darrah, 153 M 228, 456 P2d 288 (1969).

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-103(1)(d), (2)(b), (3)(e) [30-9-103(1)(d), (2)(b), (3)(e), now repealed], as modified.

2. Continued Perfection. This section deals with continued perfection of security interests that have been perfected under the law of another jurisdiction. The fact that the law of a particular jurisdiction ceases to govern perfection under Sections 9-301 through 9-307 [30-9A-301 through 30-9A-307] does not necessarily mean that a security interest perfected under that law automatically becomes unperfected. To the contrary: This section generally provides that a security interest perfected under the law of one jurisdiction remains perfected for a fixed period of time (four months or one year, depending on the circumstances), even though the jurisdiction whose law governs perfection changes. However, cessation of perfection under the law of the original jurisdiction cuts short the fixed period. The four-month and one-year periods are long enough for a secured party to discover in most cases that the law of a different jurisdiction governs perfection and to reperfect (typically by filing) under the law of that jurisdiction. If a secured party properly reperfects a security interest before it becomes unperfected under subsection (a) [subsection (1)], then the security interest remains perfected continuously thereafter. See subsection (b) [subsection (2)].

Example 1: Debtor is a general partnership whose chief executive office is in Pennsylvania. Lender perfects a security interest in Debtor's equipment by filing in Pennsylvania on May 15, 2002. On April 1, 2005, without Lender's knowledge, Debtor moves its chief executive office to New Jersey. Lender's security interest remains perfected for four months after the move. See subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)].

Example 2: Debtor is a general partnership whose chief executive office is in Pennsylvania. Lender perfects a security interest in Debtor's equipment by filing in Pennsylvania on May 15, 2002. On April 1, 2007, without Lender's knowledge, Debtor moves its chief executive office to New Jersey. Lender's security interest remains perfected only through May 14, 2007, when the effectiveness of the filed financing statement lapses. See subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)]. Although, under these facts, Lender would have only a short period of time to discover that Debtor had relocated and to reperfect under New Jersey law, Lender could have protected itself by filing a continuation statement in Pennsylvania before Debtor relocated. By doing so, Lender would have prevented lapse and allowed itself the full four months to discover Debtor's new location and refile there or, if Debtor is in default, to perfect by taking possession of the equipment.

Example 3: Under the facts of Example 2, Lender files a financing statement in New Jersey before the effectiveness of the Pennsylvania financing statement lapses. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], Lender's security interest is continuously perfected beyond May 14, 2007, for a period determined by New Jersey's Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A].

Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)] allows a one-year period in which to reperfect. The longer period is necessary, because, even with the exercise of due diligence, the secured party may be unable to discover that the collateral has been transferred to a person located in another jurisdiction.

Example 4: Debtor is a Pennsylvania corporation. Lender perfects a security interest in Debtor's equipment by filing in Pennsylvania. Debtor's shareholders decide to "reincorporate" in Delaware. They form a Delaware corporation (Newcorp) into which they merge Debtor. The merger effectuates a transfer of the collateral from Debtor to Newcorp, which thereby becomes a debtor and is located in another jurisdiction. Under subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)], the security interest remains perfected for one year after the merger. If a financing statement is filed in Delaware against Newcorp within the year following the merger, then the security interest remains perfected thereafter for a period determined by Delaware's Article 9. Note that although Newcorp is a "new debtor" as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102], the application of subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)] is not limited to transferees who are new debtors. Note also that, under Section 9-507 [30-9A-507], the financing statement naming Debtor remains effective even though Newcorp has become the debtor.

This section addresses security interests that are perfected (i.e., that have attached and as to which any required perfection step has been taken) before the debtor changes its location. It does not apply to security interests that have not attached before the location changes.

Example 5: Debtor is a Pennsylvania corporation. Debtor grants to Lender a security interest in Debtor's existing and after-acquired inventory. Lender perfects by filing in Pennsylvania. Debtor's shareholders decide to "reincorporate" in Delaware. They form a Delaware corporation (Newcorp) into which they merge Debtor. By virtue of the merger, Newcorp becomes bound by Debtor's security agreement. See Section 9-203 [30-9A-203]. After the merger, Newcorp acquires inventory to which Lender's security interest attaches. Because Newcorp is located in Delaware, Delaware law governs perfection of a security interest in Newcorp's inventory. See Sections 9-301, 9-307 [30-9A-301 and 30-9A-307]. Having failed to perfect under Delaware law, Lender holds an unperfected security interest in the inventory acquired by Newcorp after the merger. The same result follows regardless of the name of the Delaware corporation (i.e., even if the Delaware corporation and Debtor have the same name).

3. Retroactive Unperfection. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] sets forth the consequences of the failure to reperfect before perfection ceases under subsection (a) [subsection (1)]: the security interest becomes unperfected prospectively and, as against purchasers for value, including buyers and secured parties, but not as against donees or lien creditors, retroactively. The rule applies to agricultural liens, as well. See also Section 9-515 [30-9A-515] (taking the same approach with respect to lapse). Although this approach creates the potential for circular priorities, the alternative-retroactive unperfection against lien creditors-would create substantial and unjustifiable preference risks.

Example 6: Under the facts of Example 4, six months after the merger, Buyer bought from Newcorp some equipment formerly owned by Debtor. At the time of the purchase, Buyer took subject to Lender's perfected security interest, of which Buyer was unaware. See Section 9-315(a)(1) [30-9A-315(1)(a)]. However, subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that if Lender fails to reperfect in Delaware within a year after the merger, its security interest becomes unperfected and is deemed never to have been perfected against Buyer. Having given value and received delivery of the equipment without knowledge of the security interest and before it was perfected, Buyer would take free of the security interest. See Section 9-317(b) [30-9A-317(2)].

Example 7: Under the facts of Example 4, one month before the merger, Debtor created a security interest in certain equipment in favor of Financer, who perfected by filing in Pennsylvania. At that time, Financer's security interest is subordinate to Lender's. See Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)]. Financer reperfects by filing in Delaware within a year after the merger, but Lender fails to do so. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], Lender's security interest is deemed never to have been perfected against Financer, a purchaser for value. Consequently, under Section 9-322(a)(2) [30-9A-322(1)(b)], Financer's security interest is now senior.

Of course, the expiration of the time period specified in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] does not of itself prevent the secured party from later reperfecting under the law of the new jurisdiction. If the secured party does so, however, there will be a gap in perfection, and the secured party may lose priority as a result. Thus, in Example 7, if Lender perfects by filing in Delaware more than one year under the merger, it will have a new date of filing and perfection for purposes of Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)]. Financer's security interest, whose perfection dates back to the filing in Pennsylvania under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], will remain senior.

4. Possessory Security Interests. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] deals with continued perfection of possessory security interests. It applies not only to security interests perfected solely by the secured party's having taken possession of the collateral. It also applies to security interests perfected by a method that includes as an element of perfection the secured party's having taken possession, such as perfection by taking delivery of a certificated security in registered form, see Section 9-313(a) [30-9A-313(1)], and perfection by obtaining control over a certificated security. See Section 9-314(a) [30-9A-314(1)].

5. Goods Covered by Certificate of Title. Subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)] address continued perfection of a security interest in goods covered by a certificate of title. The following examples explain the operation of those subsections.

Example 8: Debtor's automobile is covered by a certificate of title issued by Illinois. Lender perfects a security interest in the automobile by complying with Illinois' certificate-of-title statute. Thereafter, Debtor applies for a certificate of title in Indiana. Six months thereafter, Creditor acquires a judicial lien on the automobile. Under Section 9-303(b) [30-9A-303(2)], Illinois law ceases to govern perfection; rather, once Debtor delivers the application and applicable fee to the appropriate Indiana authority, Indiana law governs. Nevertheless, under Indiana's Section 9-316(d) [30-9A-316(4)], Lender's security interest remains perfected until it would become unperfected under Illinois law had no certificate of title been issued by Indiana. (For example, Illinois' certificate-of-title statute may provide that the surrender of an Illinois certificate of title in connection with the issuance of a certificate of title by another jurisdiction causes a security interest noted thereon to become unperfected.) If Lender's security interest remains perfected, it is senior to Creditor's judicial lien.

Example 9: Under the facts in Example 8, five months after Debtor applies for an Indiana certificate of title, Debtor sells the automobile to Buyer. Under subsection (e)(2) [subsection (5)(b)], because Lender did not reperfect within the four months after the goods became covered by the Indiana certificate of title, Lender's security interest is deemed never to have been perfected against Buyer. Under Section 9-317(b) [30-9A-317(2)], Buyer is likely to take free of the security interest. Lender could have protected itself by perfecting its security interest either under Indiana's certificate-of-title statute, see Section 9-311 [30-9A-311], or, if it had a right to do so under an agreement or Section 9-609 [30-9A-609], by taking possession of the automobile. See Section 9-313(b) [30-9A-313(2)].

The results in Examples 8 and 9 do not depend on the fact that the original perfection was achieved by notation on a certificate of title. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] applies regardless of the method by which a security interest is perfected under the law of another jurisdiction when the goods became covered by a certificate of title from this State.

Section 9-337 [30-9A-337] affords protection to a limited class of persons buying or acquiring a security interest in the goods while a security interest is perfected under the law of another jurisdiction but after this State has issued a clean certificate of title.

6. Deposit Accounts, Letter-of-Credit Rights, and Investment Property. Subsections (f) and (g) [subsections (6) and (7)] address changes in the jurisdiction of a bank, issuer of an uncertificated security, issuer of or nominated person under a letter of credit, securities intermediary, and commodity intermediary. The provisions are analogous to those of subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)].

7. Agricultural Liens. This section does not apply to agricultural liens.

Example 10: Supplier holds an agricultural lien on corn. The lien arises under an Iowa statute. Supplier perfects by filing a financing statement in Iowa, where the corn is located. See Section 9-302 [30-9A-302]. Debtor stores the corn in Missouri. Assume the Iowa agricultural lien survives or an agricultural lien arises under Missouri law (matters that this Article does not govern). Once the corn is located in Missouri, Missouri becomes the jurisdiction whose law governs perfection. See Section 9-302 [30-9A-302]. Thus, the agricultural lien will not be perfected unless Supplier files a financing statement in Missouri.

1. Source. Former Sections 9-301, 2A-307(2) [30-9-301, now repealed, 30-2A-307(2)].

2. Scope of This Section. As did former Section 9-301 [30-9-301, now repealed], this section lists the classes of persons who take priority over, or take free of, an unperfected security interest. Section 9-308 [30-9A-308] explains when a security interest or agricultural lien is "perfected." A security interest that has attached (see Section 9-203 [30-9A-203]) but as to which a required perfection step has not been taken is "unperfected." Certain provisions have been moved from former Section 9-301 [30-9-301, now repealed]. The definition of "lien creditor" now appears in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102], and the rules governing priority in future advances are found in Section 9-323 [30-9A-323].

3. Competing Security Interests. Section 9-322 [30-9A-322] states general rules for determining priority among conflicting security interests and refers to other sections that state special rules of priority in a variety of situations. The security interests given priority under Section 9-322 [30-9A-322] and the other sections to which it refers take priority in general even over a perfected security interest. A fortiori they take priority over an unperfected security interest.

4. Filed but Unattached Security Interest vs. Lien Creditor. Under former Section 9-301(1)(b) [30-9-301(1)(b), now repealed], a lien creditor's rights had priority over an unperfected security interest. Perfection required attachment (former Section 9-303 [30-9-303, now repealed, see 30-9A-308]) and attachment required the giving of value (former Section 9-203 [30-9-203, now repealed, see 30-9A-203]). It followed that, if a secured party had filed a financing statement but had not yet given value, an intervening lien creditor whose lien arose after filing but before attachment of the security interest acquired rights that are senior to those of the secured party who later gives value. This result comported with the nemo dat concept: When the security interest attached, the collateral was already subject to the judicial lien.

On the other hand, this result treated the first secured advance differently from all other advances. The special rule for future advances in former Section 9-301(4) 30-9-301(4), now repealed] (substantially reproduced in Section 9-323(b) [30-9A-323(2)]) afforded priority to a discretionary advance made by a secured party within 45 days after the lien creditor's rights arose as long as the secured party was "perfected" when the lien creditor's lien arose-i.e., as long as the advance was not the first one and an earlier advance had been made.

Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] revises former Section 9-301(1)(b) [30-9-301(1)(b), now repealed] and treats the first advance the same as subsequent advances. That is, a judicial lien that arises after a financing statement is filed and before the security interest attaches and becomes perfected is subordinate to all advances secured by the security interest, even the first advance, except as otherwise provided in Section 9-323(b) [30-9A-323(2)]. However, if the security interest becomes unperfected (e.g., because the effectiveness of the filed financing statement lapses) before the judicial lien arises, the security interest is subordinate. If a financing statement is filed but a security interest does not attach, then no priority contest arises. The lien creditor has the only claim to the property.

5. Security Interest of Consignor or Receivables Buyer vs. Lien Creditor. Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)] defines "security interest" to include the interest of most true consignors of goods and the interest of most buyers of certain receivables (accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, and promissory notes). A consignee of goods or a seller of accounts or chattel paper each is deemed to have rights in the collateral which a lien creditor may reach, as long as the competing security interest of the consignor or buyer is unperfected. This is so even though, as between the consignor and the debtor-consignee, the latter has only limited rights, and, as between the buyer and debtor-seller, the latter does not have any rights in the collateral. See Sections 9-318 [30-9A-318] (seller), 9-319 [30-9A-319] (consignee). Security interests arising from sales of payment intangibles and promissory notes are automatically perfected. See Section 9-309 [30-9A-309]. Accordingly, a subsequent judicial lien always would be subordinate to the rights of a buyer of those types of receivables.

6. Purchasers Other Than Secured Parties. Subsections (b), (c), and (d) [subsections (2), (3), and (4)] afford priority over an unperfected security interest to certain purchasers (other than secured parties) of collateral. They derive from former Sections 9-301(1)(c), 2A-307(2), and 9-301(d) [30-9-301(1)(c), now repealed, 30-2A-307(2), and 30-9-301(4), now repealed, see 30-9A-323]. Former Section 9-301(1)(c) and (1)(d) [30-9-301(1)(c) and (1)(d), now repealed] provided that unperfected security interests are "subordinate" to the rights of certain purchasers. But, as former Comment 9 suggested, the practical effect of subordination in this context is that the purchaser takes free of the security interest. To avoid any possible misinterpretation, subsections (b) and (d) [subsections (2) and (4)] of this section use the phrase "takes free."

Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] governs goods, as well as intangibles of the type whose transfer is effected by physical delivery of the representative piece of paper (tangible chattel paper, documents, instruments, and security certificates). To obtain priority, a buyer must both give value and receive delivery of the collateral without knowledge of the existing security interest and before perfection. Even if the buyer gave value without knowledge and before perfection, the buyer would take subject to the security interest if perfection occurred before physical delivery of the collateral to the buyer. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] contains a similar rule with respect to lessees of goods. Note that a lessee of goods in ordinary course of business takes free of all security interests created by the lessor, even if perfected. See Section 9-321 [30-9A-321].

Normally, there will be no question when a buyer of chattel paper, documents, instruments, or security certificates "receives delivery" of the property. See Section 1-201 [30-1-201] (defining "delivery"). However, sometimes a buyer or lessee of goods, such as complex machinery, takes delivery of the goods in stages and completes assembly at its own location. Under those circumstances, the buyer or lessee "receives delivery" within the meaning of subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)] when, after an inspection of the portion of the goods remaining with the seller or lessor, it would be apparent to a potential lender to the seller or lessor that another person might have an interest in the goods.

The rule of subsection (b) [subsection (2)] obviously is not appropriate where the collateral consists of intangibles and there is no representative piece of paper whose physical delivery is the only or the customary method of transfer. Therefore, with respect to such intangibles (accounts, electronic chattel paper, general intangibles, and investment property other than certificated securities), subsection (d) [subsection (4)] gives priority to any buyer who gives value without knowledge, and before perfection, of the security interest. A licensee of a general intangible takes free of an unperfected security interest in the general intangible under the same circumstances. Note that a licensee of a general intangible in ordinary course of business takes rights under a nonexclusive license free of security interests created by the licensor, even if perfected. See Section 9-321 [30-9A-321].

Unless Section 9-109 [30-9A-109] excludes the transaction from this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], a buyer of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes is a "secured party" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]), and subsections (b) and (d) [subsections (2) and (4)] do not determine priority of the security interest created by the sale. Rather, the priority rules generally applicable to competing security interests apply. See Section 9-322 [30-9A-322].

7. Agricultural Liens. Subsections (a), (b), and (c) [subsections (1), (2), and (3)] subordinate unperfected agricultural liens in the same manner in which they subordinate unperfected security interests.

8. Purchase-Money Security Interests. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] derives from former Section 9-301(2) [30-9-301(2), now repealed]. It provides that, if a purchase-money security interest is perfected by filing no later than 20 days after the debtor receives delivery of the collateral, the security interest takes priority over the rights of buyers, lessees, or lien creditors which arise between the time the security interest attaches and the time of filing. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] differs from former Section 9-301(2) [30-9-301(2), now repealed] in two significant respects. First, subsection (e) [subsection (5)] protects a purchase-money security interest against all buyers and lessees, not just against transferees in bulk. Second, subsection (e) [subsection (5)] conditions this protection on filing within 20, as opposed to ten, days after delivery.

Section 9-311(b) [30-9A-311(2)] provides that compliance with the perfection requirements of a statute or treaty described in Section 9-311(a) [30-9A-311(1)] "is equivalent to the filing of a financing statement." It follows that a person who perfects a security interest in goods covered by a certificate of title by complying with the perfection requirements of an applicable certificate-of-title statute "files a financing statement" within the meaning of subsection (e) [subsection (5)].

Compiler's Comments

2001 Amendment: Chapter 179 in catchline before "security interest" deleted "unperfected"; at beginning of (1) substituted "security interest" for "unperfected security interest"; at beginning of (1)(b) inserted exception clause; at beginning of (1)(b)(ii) inserted "one of the conditions specified in 30-9A-203(2)(c) is met and"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

30-9A-318. No interest retained in right to payment that is sold — rights and title of seller of account or chattel paper with respect to creditors and purchasers.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Sellers of Accounts, Chattel Paper, Payment Intangibles, and Promissory Notes. Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)] defines "security interest" to include the interest of a buyer of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes. See also Section 9-109(a) [30-1-129(1)] and Comment 5. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] makes explicit what was implicit, but perfectly obvious, under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]: The fact that a sale of an account or chattel paper gives rise to a "security interest" does not imply that the seller retains an interest in the property that has been sold. To the contrary, a seller of an account or chattel paper retains no interest whatsoever in the property to the extent that it has been sold. Subsection (a) (subsection (1)] also applies to sales of payment intangibles and promissory notes, transactions that were not covered by former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. Neither this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] nor the definition of "security interest" in Section 1-201 [30-1-201] provides rules for distinguishing sales transactions from those that create a security interest securing an obligation.

3. Buyers of Accounts and Chattel Paper. Another aspect of sales of accounts and chattel paper also was implicit, and equally obvious, under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]: If the buyer's security interest is unperfected, then for purposes of determining the rights of certain third parties, the seller (debtor) is deemed to have all rights and title that the seller sold. The seller is deemed to have these rights even though, as between the parties, it has sold all its rights to the buyer. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] makes this explicit. As a consequence of subsection (b) [subsection (2)], if the buyer's security interest is unperfected, the seller can transfer, and the creditors of the seller can reach, the account or chattel paper as if it had not been sold.

Example: Debtor sells accounts or chattel paper to Buyer-1 and retains no interest in them. Buyer-1 does not file a financing statement. Debtor then sells the same receivables to Buyer-2. Buyer-2 files a proper financing statement. Having sold the receivables to Buyer-1, Debtor would not have any rights in the collateral so as to permit Buyer-2's security (ownership) interest to attach. Nevertheless, under this section, for purposes of determining the rights of purchasers for value from Debtor, Debtor is deemed to have the rights that Debtor sold. Accordingly, Buyer-2's security interest attaches, is perfected by the filing, and, under Section 9-322 [30-9A-322], is senior to Buyer-1's interest.

4. Effect of Perfection. If the security interest of a buyer of accounts or chattel paper is perfected the usual result would take effect: transferees from and creditors of the seller could not acquire an interest in the sold accounts or chattel paper. The same result would occur if payment intangibles or promissory notes were sold, inasmuch as the buyer's security interest is automatically perfected under Section 9-309 [30-9A-309].

30-9A-319. Rights and title of consignee with respect to creditors and purchasers.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Consignments. This section takes an approach to consignments similar to that taken by Section 9-318 [30-9A-318] with respect to buyers of accounts and chattel paper. Revised Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)] defines "security interest" to include the interest of a consignor of goods under many true consignments. Section 9-319(a) [30-9A-319(1)] provides that, for purposes of determining the rights of certain third parties, the consignee is deemed to acquire all rights and title that the consignor had, if the consignor's security interest is unperfected. The consignee acquires these rights even though, as between the parties, it purchases a limited interest in the goods (as would be the case in a true consignment, under which the consignee acquires only the interest of a bailee). As a consequence of this section, creditors of the consignee can acquire judicial liens and security interests in the goods.

Insofar as creditors of the consignee are concerned, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] to a considerable extent reformulates the former law, which appeared in former Sections 2-326 and 9-114 [30-2-326 and 30-9-114, now repealed], without changing the results. However, neither Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] nor former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] specifically addresses the rights of non-ordinary course buyers from the consignee. Former Section 9-114 [30-9-114, now repealed] contained priority rules applicable to security interests in consigned goods. Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], the priority rules for purchase-money security interests in inventory apply to consignments. See Section 9-103(d) [30-9A-103(4)]. Accordingly, a special section containing priority rules for consignments no longer is needed. Section 9-317 [30-9A-317] determines whether the rights of a judicial lien creditor are senior to the interest of the consignor, Sections 9-322 and 9-324 [30-9A-322 and 30-9A-324] govern competing security interests in consigned goods, and Sections 9-317, 9-315, and 9-320 [30-9A-317, 30-9A-315, and 30-9A-320] determine whether a buyer takes free of the consignor's interest.

The following example explains the operation of this section:

Example 1: SP-1 delivers goods to Debtor in a transaction constituting a "consignment" as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. SP-1 does not file a financing statement. Debtor then grants a security interest in the goods to SP-2. SP-2 files a proper financing statement. Assuming Debtor is a mere bailee, as in a "true" consignment, Debtor would not have any rights in the collateral (beyond those of a bailee) so as to permit SP-2's security interest to attach to any greater rights. Nevertheless, under this section, for purposes of determining the rights of Debtor's creditors, Debtor is deemed to acquire SP-1's rights. Accordingly, SP-2's security interest attaches, is perfected by the filing, and, under Section 9-322 [30-9A-322], is senior to SP-1's interest.

3. Effect of Perfection. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] contains a special rule with respect to consignments that are perfected. If application of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] would result in the consignor having priority over a competing creditor, then other law determines the rights and title of the consignee.

Example 2: SP-1 delivers goods to Debtor in a transaction constituting a "consignment" as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. SP-1 files a proper financing statement. Debtor then grants a security interest in the goods to SP-2. Under Section 9-322 [30-9A-322], SP-1's security interest is senior to SP-2's. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] indicates that, for purposes of determining SP-2's rights, other law determines the rights and title of the consignee. If, for example, a consignee obtains only the special property of a bailee, then SP-2's security interest would attach only to that special property.

Example 3: SP-1 obtains a security interest in all Debtor's existing and after-acquired inventory. SP-1 perfects its security interest with a proper filing. Then SP-2 delivers goods to Debtor in a transaction constituting a "consignment" as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. SP-2 files a proper financing statement but does not send notification to SP-1 under Section 9-324(b) [30-9A-324(2)]. Accordingly, SP-2's security interest is junior to SP-1's under Section 9-322(a) [30-9A-322(1)]. Under Section 9-319(a) [30-9A-319(1)], Debtor is deemed to have the consignor's rights and title, so that SP-1's security interest attaches to SP-2's ownership interest in the goods. Thereafter, Debtor grants a security interest in the goods to SP-3, and SP-3 perfects by filing. Because SP-2's perfected security interest is senior to SP-3's under Section 9-322(a) [30-9A-322(1)], Section 9-319(b) [30-9A-319(2)] applies: Other law determines Debtor's rights and title to the goods insofar as SP-3 is concerned, and SP-3's security interest attaches to those rights.

30-9A-320. Buyer of goods.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-307 [30-9-307, now repealed].

2. Scope of This Section. This section states when buyers of goods take free of a security interest even though perfected. Of course, a buyer who takes free of a perfected security interest takes free of an unperfected one. Section 9-317 [30-9A-317] should be consulted to determine what purchasers, in addition to the buyers covered in this section, take free of an unperfected security interest. Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] states general rules on purchase of goods from a seller with defective or voidable title (Section 2-403) [30-2-403].

3. Buyers in Ordinary Course. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] derives from former Section 9-307(1) [30-9-307(1), now repealed]. The definition of "buyer in ordinary course of business" in Section 1-201 [30-1-201] restricts its application to buyers "from a person, other than a pawnbroker, in the business of selling goods of that kind." Thus subsection (a) [subsection (1)] applies primarily to inventory collateral. The subsection further excludes from its operation buyers of "farm products"(defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]) from a person engaged in farming operations. The buyer in ordinary course of business is defined as one who buys goods "in good faith, without knowledge that the sale violates the rights of another person and in the ordinary course." Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that such a buyer takes free of a security interest, even though perfected, and even though the buyer knows the security interest exists. Reading the definition together with the rule of law results in the buyer's taking free if the buyer merely knows that a security interest covers the goods but taking subject if the buyer knows, in addition, that the sale violates a term in an agreement with the secured party.

As did former Section 9-307(1) [30-9-307(1), now repealed], subsection (a) [subsection (1)] applies only to security interests created by the seller of the goods to the buyer in ordinary course. However, under certain circumstances a buyer in ordinary course who buys goods that were encumbered with a security interest created by a person other than the seller may take free of the security interest, as Example 2 explains. See also Comment 6, below.

Example 1: Manufacturer, who is in the business of manufacturing appliances, owns manufacturing equipment subject to a perfected security interest in favor of Lender. Manufacturer sells the equipment to Dealer, who is in the business of buying and selling used equipment. Buyer buys the equipment from Dealer. Even if Buyer qualifies as a buyer in the ordinary course of business, Buyer does not take free of Lender's security interest under subsection (a) [subsection (1)], because Dealer did not create the security interest; Manufacturer did.

Example 2: Manufacturer, who is in the business of manufacturing appliances, owns manufacturing equipment subject to a perfected security interest in favor of Lender. Manufacturer sells the equipment to Dealer, who is in the business of buying and selling used equipment. Lender learns of the sale but does nothing to assert its security interest. Buyer buys the equipment from Dealer. Inasmuch as Lender's acquiescence constitutes an "entrusting" of the goods to Dealer within the meaning of Section 2-403(3) [30-2-403(3)] Buyer takes free of Lender's security interest under Section 2-403(2) [30-2-403(2)] if Buyer qualifies as a buyer in ordinary course of business.

4. Buyers of Farm Products. This section does not enable a buyer of farm products to take free of a security interest created by the seller, even if the buyer is a buyer in ordinary course of business. However, a buyer of farm products may take free of a security interest under Section 1324 of the Food Security Act of 1985, 7 U.S.C. §1631.

5. Buyers of Consumer Goods. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)], which derives from former Section 9-307(2) [30-9-307(2), now repealed], deals with buyers of collateral that the debtor-seller holds as "consumer goods" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]). Under Section 9-309(1) [30-9A-309(1)], a purchase-money interest in consumer goods, except goods that are subject to a statute or treaty described in Section 9-311(a) [30-9A-311(1)] (such as automobiles that are subject to a certificate-of-title statute), is perfected automatically upon attachment. There is no need to file to perfect. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] a buyer of consumer goods takes free of a security interest, even though perfected, if the buyer buys (1) without knowledge of the security interest, (2) for value, (3) primarily for the buyer's own personal, family, or household purposes, and (4) before a financing statement is filed.

As to purchase money-security interests which are perfected without filing under Section 9-309(1) [30-9A-309(1)]: A secured party may file a financing statement, although filing is not required for perfection. If the secured party does file, all buyers take subject to the security interest. If the secured party does not file, a buyer who meets the qualifications stated in the preceding paragraph takes free of the security interest.

As to security interests for which a perfection step is required: This category includes all non-purchase-money security interests, and all security interests, whether or not purchase-money, in goods subject to a statute or treaty described in Section 9-311(a) [30-9A-311(1)], such as automobiles covered by a certificate-of-title statute. As long as the required perfection step has not been taken and the security interest remains unperfected, not only the buyers described in subsection (b) [subsection (2)] but also the purchasers described in Section 9-317 [30-9A-317] will take free of the security interest. After a financing statement has been filed or the perfection requirements of the applicable certificate-of-title statute have been complied with (compliance is the equivalent of filing a financing statement; see Section 9-311(b) [30-9A-311(2)]), all subsequent buyers, under the rule of subsection (b) [subsection (2)], are subject to the security interest.

The rights of a buyer under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] turn on whether a financing statement has been filed against consumer goods. Occasionally, a debtor changes his or her location after a filing is made. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)], which derives from former Section 9-103(1)(d)(iii) [30-9-103(1)(d)(iii), now repealed, see 30-9A-316], deals with the continued effectiveness of the filing under those circumstances. It adopts the rules of Sections 9-316(a) and (b) [30-9A-316(1) and (2)]. These rules are explained in the Comments to that section.

6. Authorized Dispositions. The limitations that subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] impose on the persons who may take free of a security interest apply of course only to unauthorized sales by the debtor. If the secured party authorized the sale in an express agreement or otherwise, the buyer takes free under Section 9-315(a) [30-9A-315(1)] without regard to the limitations of this section. (That section also states the right of a secured party to the proceeds of a sale, authorized or unauthorized.) Moreover, the buyer also takes free if the secured party waived or otherwise is precluded from asserting its security interest against the buyer. See Section 1-103 [30-1-103].

7. Oil, Gas, and Other Minerals. Under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], a buyer in ordinary course of business of minerals at the wellhead or minehead or after extraction takes free of a security interest created by the seller. Specifically, it provides that qualified buyers take free not only of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] security interests but also of interests "arising out of an encumbrance." As defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102], the term "encumbrance" means "a right, other than an ownership interest, in real property." Thus, to the extent that a mortgage encumbers minerals not only before but also after extraction, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] enables a buyer in ordinary course of the minerals to take free of the mortgage. This subsection does not, however, enable these buyers to take free of interests arising out of ownership interests in the real property. This issue is significant only in a minority of states. Several of them have adopted special statutes and nonuniform amendments to Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] to provide special protections to mineral owners, whose interests often are highly fractionalized in the case of oil and gas. See Terry I. Cross, Oil and Gas Product Liens—Statutory Security Interests for Producers and Royalty Owners Under the Statutes of Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Texas and Wyoming, 50 Consumer Fin. L. Q. Rep. 418 (1996). Inasmuch as a complete resolution of the issue would require the addition of complex provisions to this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], and there are good reasons to believe that a uniform solution would not be feasible, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] leaves its resolution to other legislation.

8. Possessory Security Interests. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] is new. It rejects the holding of Tanbro Fabrics Corp. v. Deering Milliken, Inc., 350 N.E.2d 590 (N.Y. 1976) and, together with Section 9-317(b) [30-9A-317(2)], prevents a buyer of goods collateral from taking free of a security interest if the collateral is in the possession of the secured party. "The secured party" referred in subsection (e) [subsection (5)] is the holder of the security interest referred to in subsection (a) or (b) [subsection (1) or (2)]. Section 9-313 [30-9A-313] determines whether a secured party is in possession for purposes of this section. Under some circumstances, Section 9-313 [30-9A-313] provides that a secured party is in possession of collateral even if the collateral is in the physical possession of a third party.

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Security Interest — Creation by Seller: Defendant does not take free of the plaintiff's security interest under 30-9-307 (now repealed, see this section) although he purchased in good faith and in the ordinary course of business because defendant's seller did not create plaintiff's security interest as required by 30-9-307 (now repealed, see this section). Exch. Bank of Osceola v. Jarrett, 180 M 33, 588 P2d 1006 (1979).

Joint Tenancy Auto Title — Effect on Default: When defendant borrowed from plaintiff on auto collateral registered in his "and/or" another's name, the plaintiff bank was entitled to sell the auto upon defendant's default and receive one-half of the proceeds even though the bank's security interest was unperfected at the time of defendant's fraudulent assignment of his interest to his sister without value. The joint tenancy interest of the defendant was severed upon his default, and the bank became tenant in common with the holder of the remaining interest in the auto. First Westside Nat'l Bank v. Llera, 176 M 481, 580 P2d 100 (1978).

2. Licensee in Ordinary Course. Like the analogous rules in Section 9-320(a) [30-9A-320(1)] with respect to buyers in ordinary course and subsection (c) [subsection (3)] with respect to lessees in ordinary course, the new rule in subsection (b) [subsection (2)] reflects the expectations of the parties and the marketplace: a licensee under a nonexclusive license takes subject to a security interest unless the secured party authorizes the license free of the security interest or other, controlling law such as that of this section (protecting ordinary-course licensees) dictates a contrary result. See Sections 9-201, 9-315 [30-9A-201 and 30-9A-315]. The definition of "licensee in ordinary course of business" in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is modeled upon that of "buyer in ordinary course of business."

3. Lessee in Ordinary Course. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] contains the rule formerly found in Section 2A-307(3) [30-2A-307(3)]. The rule works in the same way as that of Section 9-320(a) [30-9A-320(1)].

30-9A-322. Priorities among conflicting security interests and agricultural liens in same collateral.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-312(5), (6) [30-9-312(5), (6), now repealed].

2. Scope of This Section. In a variety of situations, two or more people may claim a security interest in the same collateral. This section states general rules of priority among conflicting security interests. As subsection (f) [subsection (6)] provides, the general rules in subsections (a) through (e) [subsections (1) through (5)] are subject to the rule in subsection (g) [subsection (7)] governing perfected agricultural liens and to the other rules in this Part of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 3]. Rules that override this section include those applicable to purchase-money security interests (Section 9-324) [30-9A-324] and those qualifying for special priority in particular types of collateral. See, e.g., Section 9-327 [30-9A-327] (deposit accounts); Section 9-328 [30-9A-328] (investment property); Section 9-329 [30-9A-329] (letter-of-credit rights); Section 9-330 [30-9A-330] (chattel paper and instruments); Section 9-334 [30-9A-334] (fixtures). In addition, the general rules of sections (a) through (e) [subsections (1) through (5)] are subject to priority rules governing security interests arising under Articles 2, 2A, 4, and 5 [Title 30, chapters 2, 2A, 4, and 5].

3. General Rules. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] contains three general rules. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] governs the priority of competing perfected security interests. Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] governs the priority of competing security interests if one is perfected and the other is not. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)] governs the priority of competing unperfected security interests. The rules may be regarded as adaptations of the idea, deeply rooted at common law, of a race of diligence among creditors. The first two rules are based on precedence in the time as of which the competing secured parties either filed their financing statements or obtained perfected security interests. Under subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)], the first secured party who files or perfects has priority. Under subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)], which is new, a perfected security interest has priority over an unperfected one. Under subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)], if both security interests are unperfected, the first to attach has priority. Note that Section 9-708(b) [30-9A-708(2)] may affect the application of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] to a filing that occurred before the effective date of this Article [July 1, 2001] and which would be ineffective to perfect a security interest under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] but effective under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A].

4. Competing Perfected Security Interests. When there is more than one perfected security interest, the security interests rank according to priority in time of filing or perfection. "Filing," of course, refers to the filing of an effective financing statement. "Perfection" refers to the acquisition of a perfected security interest, i.e., one that has attached and as to which any required perfection step has been taken. See Section 9-308 [30-9A-308].

Example 1: On February 1, A files a financing statement covering a certain item of Debtor's equipment. On March 1, B files a financing statement covering the same equipment. On April 1, B makes a loan to Debtor and obtains a security interest in the equipment. On May 1, A makes a loan to Debtor and obtains a security interest in the same collateral. A has priority even though B's loan was made earlier and was perfected when made. It makes no difference whether A knew of B's security interest when A made its advance.

The problem stated in Example 1 is peculiar to a notice-filing system under which filing may occur before the security interest attaches (see Section 9-502) [30-9A-502]. The justification for determining priority by order of filing lies in the necessity of protecting the filing system-that is, of allowing the first secured party who has filed to make subsequent advances without each time having to check for subsequent filings as a condition of protection. Note, however, that this first-to-file protection is not absolute. For example, Section 9-324 [30-9A-324] affords priority to certain purchase-money security interests, even if a competing secured party was the first to file or perfect.

Example 2: A and B make non-purchase-money advances secured by the same collateral. The collateral is in Debtor's possession, and neither security interest is perfected when the second advance is made. Whichever secured party first perfects its security interest (by taking possession of the collateral or by filing) takes priority. It makes no difference whether that secured party knows of the other security interest at the time it perfects its own.

The rule of subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)], affording priority to the first to file or perfect, applies to security interests that are perfected by any method, including temporarily (Section 9-312) [30-9A-312] or upon attachment (Section 9-309) [30-9A-309], even though there may be no notice to creditors or subsequent purchasers and notwithstanding any common-law rule to the contrary. The form of the claim to priority, i.e., filing or perfection, may shift from time to time, and the rank will be based on the first filing or perfection as long as there is no intervening period without filing or perfection. See Section 9-308(c) [30-9A-308(3)].

Example 3: On October 1, A acquires a temporarily perfected (20-day) security interest, unfiled, in a negotiable document in the debtor's possession under Section 9-312(e) [30-9A-312(5)]. On October 5, B files and thereby perfects a security interest that previously had attached to the same document. On October 10, A files. A has priority, even after the 20-day period expires, regardless of whether A knows of B's security interest when A files. A was the first to perfect and maintained continuous perfection or filing since the start of the 20-day period. However, the perfection of A's security interest extends only "to the extent it arises for new value given." To the extent A's security interest secures advances made by A beyond the 20-day period, its security interest would be subordinate to B's, inasmuch as B was the first to file.

In general, the rule in subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] does not distinguish among various advances made by a secured party. The priority of every advance dates from the earlier of filing or perfection. However, in rare instances, the priority of an advance dates from the time the advance is made. See Example 3 and Section 9-323 [30-9A-323].

5. Priority in After-Acquired Property. The application of the priority rules to after-acquired property must be considered separately for each item of collateral. Priority does not depend only on time of perfection but may also be based on priority in filing before perfection.

Example 4: On February 1, A makes advances to Debtor under a security agreement covering "all Debtor's machinery, both existing and after-acquired." A promptly files a financing statement. On April 1, B takes a security interest in all Debtor's machinery, existing and after-acquired, to secure an outstanding loan. The following day, B files a financing statement. On May 1, Debtor acquires a new machine. When Debtor acquires rights in the new machine, both A and B acquire security interests in the machine simultaneously. Both security interests are perfected simultaneously. However, A has priority because A filed before B.

When after-acquired collateral is encumbered by more than one security interest, one of the security interests often is a purchase-money security interest that is entitled to special priority under Section 9-324 [30-9A-324].

6. Priority in Proceeds: General Rule. Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] follows former Section 9-312(6) [30-9-312(6), now repealed]. It provides that the baseline rules of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] apply generally to priority conflicts in proceeds except where otherwise provided (e.g., as in subsections (c) through (e) [subsections (3) through (5)]). Under Section 9-203 [30-9A-203], attachment cannot occur (and therefore, under Section 9-308 [30-9A-308], perfection cannot occur) as to particular collateral until the collateral itself comes into existence and the debtor has rights in it. Thus, a security interest in proceeds of original collateral does not attach and is not perfected until the proceeds come into existence and the debtor acquires rights in them.

Example 5: On April 1, Debtor authenticates a security agreement granting to A a security interest in all Debtor's existing and after-acquired inventory. The same day, A files a financing statement covering inventory. On May 1, Debtor authenticates a security agreement granting B a security interest in all Debtor's existing and future accounts. On June 1, Debtor sells inventory to a customer on 30-day unsecured credit. When Debtor acquires the account, B's security interest attaches to it and is perfected by B's financing statement. At the very same time, A's security interest attaches to the account as proceeds of the inventory and is automatically perfected. See Section 9-315 [30-9A-315]. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] of this section, for purposes of determining A's priority in the account, the time of filing as to the original collateral (April 1, as to inventory) is also the time of filing as to proceeds (account). Accordingly, A's security interest in the account has priority over B's. Of course, had B filed its financing statement before A filed (e.g., on March 1), then B would have priority in the accounts.

Section 9-324 [30-9A-324] governs the extent to which a special purchase-money priority in goods or software carries over into the proceeds of the original collateral.

7. Priority in Proceeds: Special Rules. Subsections (c), (d), and (e) [subsections (3), (4), and (5)], which are new, provide additional priority rules for proceeds of collateral in situations where the temporal (first-in-time) rules of subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] are not appropriate. These new provisions distinguish what these Comments refer to as "non-filing collateral" from what they call "filing collateral." As used in these Comments, non-filing collateral is collateral of a type for which perfection may be achieved by a method other than filing (possession or control, mainly) and for which secured parties who so perfect generally do not expect or need to conduct a filing search. More specifically, non-filing collateral is chattel paper, deposit accounts, negotiable documents, instruments, investment property, and letter-of-credit rights. Other collateral-accounts, commercial tort claims, general intangibles, goods, nonnegotiable documents, and payment intangibles-is filing collateral.

8. Proceeds of Non-Filing Collateral: Non-Temporal Priority. Subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)] provides a baseline priority rule for proceeds of non-filing collateral which applies if the secured party has taken the steps required for non-temporal priority over a conflicting security interest in non-filing collateral (e.g., control, in the case of deposit accounts, letter-of-credit rights, and investment property). This rule determines priority in proceeds of non-filing collateral whether or not there exists an actual conflicting security interest in the original non-filing collateral. Under subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)], the priority in the original collateral continues in proceeds if the security interest in proceeds is perfected and the proceeds are cash proceeds or non-filing proceeds "of the same type" as the original collateral. As used in subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)], "type" means a type of collateral defined in the Uniform Commercial Code and should be read broadly. For example, a security is "of the same type" as a security entitlement (i.e., investment property), and a promissory note is "of the same type" as a draft (i.e., an instrument).

Example 6: SP-1 perfects its security interest in investment property by filing. SP-2 perfects subsequently by taking control of a certificated security. Debtor receives cash proceeds of the security (e.g., dividends deposited into Debtor's deposit account). If the first-to-file-or-perfect rule of subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] were applied, SP-1's security interest in the cash proceeds would be senior, although SP-2's security interest continues perfected under Section 9-315 [30-9A-315] beyond the 20-day period of automatic perfection. This was the result under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. Under subsection (c) [subsection (3)], however, SP-2's security interest is senior. Note that a different result would obtain in Example 1 (i.e., SP-1's security interest would be senior) if SP-1 were to obtain control of the deposit-account proceeds. This is so because subsection (c) [subsection (3)] is subject to subsection (f) [subsection (6)], which in turn provides that the priority rules under subsections (a) through (e) [subsections (1) through (5)] are subject to "the other provisions of this part." One of those "other provisions" is Section 9-327 [30-9A-327], which affords priority to a security interest perfected by control. See Section 9-327(1) [30-9A-327(1)].

Example 7: SP-1 perfects its security interest in investment property by filing. SP-2 perfects subsequently by taking control of a certificated security. Debtor receives proceeds of the security consisting of a new certificated security issued as a stock dividend on the original collateral. Although the new security is of the same type as the original collateral (i.e., investment property), once the 20-day period of automatic perfection expires (see Section 9-315(d) [30-9A-315(4)]), SP-2's security interest is unperfected. (SP-2 has not filed or taken delivery or control, and no temporary-perfection rule applies.) Consequently, once the 20-day period expires, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] does not confer priority, and, under subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)], SP-1's security interest in the security is senior. This was the result under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed].

Example 8: SP-1 perfects its security interest in investment property by filing. SP-2 perfects subsequently by taking control of a certificated security and also by filing against investment property. Debtor receives proceeds of the security consisting of a new certificated security issued as a stock dividend of the collateral. Because the new security is of the same type as the original collateral (i.e., investment property) and (unlike Example 7) SP-2's security interest is perfected by filing, SP-2's security interest is senior under subsection (c) [subsection (3)]. If the new security were redeemed by the issuer upon surrender and yet another security were received by Debtor, SP-2's security interest would continue to enjoy priority under subsection (c) [subsection (3)]. The new security would be proceeds of proceeds.

Example 9: SP-1 perfects its security interest in instruments by filing. SP-2 subsequently perfects its security interest in investment property by taking control of a certificated security and also by filing against investment property. Debtor receives proceeds of the security consisting of a dividend check that it deposits to a deposit account. Because the check and the deposit account are cash proceeds, SP-1's and SP-2's security interests in the cash proceeds are perfected under Section 9-315 [30-9A-315] beyond the 20-day period of automatic perfection. However, SP-2's security interest is senior under subsection (c) [subsection (3)].

Example 10: SP-1 perfects its security interest in investment property by filing. SP-2 perfects subsequently by taking control of a certificated security and also by filing against investment property. Debtor receives an instrument as proceeds of the security. (Assume that the instrument is not cash proceeds.) Because the instrument is not of the same type as the original collateral (i.e., investment property), SP-2's security interest, although perfected by filing, does not achieve priority under subsection (c) [subsection (3)]. Under the first-to-file-or-perfect rule of subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)], SP-1's security interest in the proceeds is senior.

The proceeds of proceeds are themselves proceeds. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (defining "proceeds" and "collateral"). Sometimes competing security interests arise in proceeds that are several generations removed from the original collateral. As the following example explains, the applicability of subsection (c) [subsection (3)] may turn on the nature of the intervening proceeds.

Example 11: SP-1 perfects its security interest in Debtor's deposit account by obtaining control. Thereafter, SP-2 files against inventory, (presumably) searches, finds no indication of a conflicting security interest, and advances against Debtor's existing and after-acquired inventory. Debtor uses funds from the deposit account to purchase inventory, which SP-1 can trace as identifiable proceeds of its security interest in Debtor's deposit account, and which SP-2 claims as original collateral. The inventory is sold and the proceeds deposited into another deposit account, as to which SP-1 has not obtained control. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] does not govern priority in this other deposit account. This deposit account is cash proceeds and is also the same type of collateral as SP-1's original collateral, as required by subsections (c)(2)(A) and (B) [subsections (3)(b)(i) and (3)(b)(ii)]. However, SP-1's security interest does not satisfy subsection (c)(2)(C) [subsection (3)(b)(iii)] because the inventory proceeds, which intervened between the original deposit account and the deposit account constituting the proceeds at issue, are not cash proceeds, proceeds of the same type as the collateral (original deposit account), or an account relating to the collateral. Stated otherwise, once proceeds other than cash proceeds, proceeds of the same type as the original collateral, or an account relating to the original collateral intervene in the chain of proceeds, priority under subsection (c) [subsection (3)] is thereafter unavailable. The special priority rule in subsection (d) [subsection (4)] also is inapplicable to this case. See Comment 9, Example 13, below. Instead, the general first-to-file-or-perfect rule of subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] apply. Under that rule, SP-1 has priority unless its security interest in the inventory proceeds became unperfected under Section 9-315(d) [30-9A-315(4)]. Had SP-2 filed against inventory before SP-1 obtained control of the original deposit account, the SP-2 would have had priority even if SP-1's security interest in the inventory proceeds remained perfected.

9. Proceeds of Non-Filing Collateral: Special Temporal Priority. Under subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)], if a security interest in non-filing collateral is perfected by a method other than filing (e.g., control or possession), it does not retain its priority over a conflicting security interest in proceeds that are filing collateral. Moreover, it is not entitled to priority in proceeds under the first-to file-or-perfect rule of subsections (a)(1) and (b) [subsections (1)(a) and (2)]. Instead, under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], priority is determined by a new first-to-file rule.

Example 12: SP-1 perfects its security interest in Debtor's deposit account by obtaining control. Thereafter, SP-2 files against equipment, (presumably) searches, finds no indication of a conflicting security interest, and advances against Debtor's equipment. SP-1 then files against Debtor's equipment. Debtor uses funds from the deposit account to purchase equipment, which SP-1 can trace as proceeds of its security interest in Debtor's deposit account. If the first-to-file-or-perfect rule were applied, SP-1's security interest would be senior under subsections (a)(1) and (b) [subsection (1)(a) and (2)], because it was the first to perfect in the original collateral and there was no period during which its security interest was unperfected. Under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], however, SP-2's security interest would be senior because it filed first. This corresponds with the likely expectations of the parties.

Note that under subsection (e) [subsection (5)], the first-to-file rule of subsection (d) [subsection (4)] applies only if the proceeds in question are other than non-filing collateral (i.e., if the proceeds are filing collateral). If the proceeds are non-filing collateral, either the first-to-file-or-perfect rule under subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] or the non-temporal priority rule in subsection (c) [subsection (3)] would apply, depending on the facts.

Example 13: SP-1 perfects its security interest in Debtor's deposit account by obtaining control. Thereafter, SP-2 files against inventory, (presumably) searches, finds no indication of a conflicting security interest, and advances against Debtor's existing and after-acquired inventory. Debtor uses funds from the deposit account to purchase inventory, which SP-1 can trace as identifiable proceeds of its security interest in Debtor's deposit account, and which SP-2 claims as original collateral. The inventory is sold and the proceeds deposited into another deposit account, as to which SP-1 has not obtained control. As discussed above in Comment 8, Example 11, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] does not govern priority in this deposit account. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] also does not govern, because the proceeds at issue (the deposit account) are cash proceeds. See subsection (e) [subsection (5)]. Rather, the general rules of subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] govern.

10. Priority in Supporting Obligations. Under subsections (b)(2) and (c)(1) [subsections (2)(b) and (3)(a)], a security interest having priority in collateral also has priority in a supporting obligation for that collateral. However, the rules in these subsections are subject to the special rule in Section 9-329 [30-9A-329] governing the priority of security interests in a letter-of-credit right. See subsection (f) [subsection (6)]. Under Section 9-329 [30-9A-329], a secured party's failure to obtain control (Section 9-107) [30-9A-107] of a letter-of-credit right that serves as supporting collateral leaves its security interest exposed to a priming interest of a party who does take control.

11. Unperfected Security Interests. Under subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)], if conflicting security interests are unperfected, the first to attach has priority. This rule may be of merely theoretical interest, inasmuch as it is hard to imagine a situation where the case would come into litigation without either secured party's having perfected its security interest. If neither security interest had been perfected at the time of the filing of a petition in bankruptcy, ordinarily neither would be good against the trustee in bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Code.

12. Agricultural Liens. Statutes other than this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] may purport to grant priority to an agricultural lien as against a conflicting security interest or agricultural lien. Under subsection (g) [subsection (7)], if another statute grants priority to an agricultural lien, the agricultural lien has priority only if the same statute creates the agricultural lien and the agricultural lien is perfected. Otherwise, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] applies the same priority rules to an agricultural lien as to a security interest, regardless of whether the agricultural lien conflicts with another agricultural lien or with a security interest.

Inasmuch as no agricultural lien on proceeds arises under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], subsections (b) through (e) [subsections (2) through (5)] do not apply to proceeds of agricultural liens. However, if an agricultural lien has priority under subsection (g) [subsection (7)] and the statute creating the agricultural lien gives the secured party a lien on proceeds of the collateral subject to the lien, a court should apply the principle of subsection (g) [subsection (7)] and award priority in the proceeds to the holder of the perfected agricultural lien.

Case Notes

Failure to Demonstrate That Equitable Interest in Cattle Sold Displaced Perfected Security Interest in Cattle as After-Acquired Property: Bellanger obtained loans from the Daniels-Sheridan Federal Credit Union to finance a ranching operation, securing the loans with several promissory notes securing an interest in the cattle on the ranch. Bellanger subsequently defaulted on the loans, and the credit union initiated an action to enforce the promissory notes pursuant to the Uniform Commercial Code (U.C.C.). The case broadened to encompass disputes over proceeds from the sale of the cattle to include Smith, the owner of the auction company where Bellanger customarily sold cattle, whom the credit union alleged had an inferior security interest in some of the cattle that Smith had sold to Bellanger. The credit union pointed out that Smith had only an unperfected security interest because he failed to perfect a security interest pursuant to the U.C.C. Smith contended that Bellanger had obtained only a leasehold interest in the cattle and that the credit union thus had no security interest in those cattle. The cattle were subsequently seized and sold for $79,012.27, and the District Court split the proceeds, with $45,467.94 paid to the credit union and a judgment for the remainder owed on the promissory notes, and $33,544.33 paid to Smith. The credit union appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The District Court erred in equitably subordinating the credit union's prior perfected security interest to Smith's unperfected security interest. The Supreme Court held that Smith's transaction with Bellanger was a sale, not a lease or bailment, and as such, the hierarchy of priorities for security interests set forth in Article 9 of the U.C.C. (now Title 30, ch. 9A) applied in the credit union's favor. Smith failed to demonstrate that any equitable interest that he had in the cattle displaced the credit union's perfected security interest in the cattle as an after-acquired property of Bellanger, so an equitable carve-out from the U.C.C. principles of hierarchy priority was not justified. 30-9A-323. Future advances.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Sections 9-312(7), 9-301(4), 9-307(3), 2A-307(4) [30-9-312(7), now repealed, 30-9-301(4), now repealed, see former 30-9-307(3) not adopted in Montana, 30-2A-307(4)].

2. Scope of This Section. A security agreement may provide that collateral secures future advances. See Section 9-204(c) [30-9A-204(3)]. This section collects all of the special rules dealing with the priority of advances made by a secured party after a third party acquires an interest in the collateral. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] applies when the third party is a competing secured party. It replaces and clarifies former Section 9-312(7) [30-9-312(7), now repealed]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] deals with lien creditors and replaces former Section 9-301(4) [30-9-301(4), now repealed]. Subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)] deal with buyers and replace former Section 9-307(3) [see former 30-9-307, now repealed, see 30-9A-320]. Subsections (f) and (g) [subsections (4) and (5)] deal with lessees and replace former Section 2A-307(4) [30-2A-307(4)].

3. Competing Security Interests. Under a proper reading of the first-to-file-or-perfect rule of Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)] (and former Section 9-312(5) [30-9-312(5), now repealed, see 30-9A-322]), it is abundantly clear that the time when an advance is made plays no role in determining priorities among conflicting security interests except when a financing statement was not filed and the advance is the giving of value as the last step for attachment and perfection. Thus, a secured party takes subject to all advances secured by a competing security interest having priority under Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)]. This result generally obtains regardless of how the competing security interest is perfected and regardless of whether the advances are made "pursuant to commitment" (Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]). Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] of this section states the only other instance when the time of an advance figures in the priority scheme in Section 9-322 [30-9A-322]: when the security interest is perfected only automatically under Section 9-309 [30-9A-309] or temporarily under Section 9-312(e), (f), or (g) [30-9A-312 (5), (6), or (7)], and the advance is not made pursuant to a commitment entered into while the security interest was perfected by another method. Thus, an advance has priority from the date it is made only in the rare case in which it is made without commitment and while the security interest is perfected only temporarily under Section 9-312 [30-9A-312].

The new formulation in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] clarifies the result when the initial advance is paid and a new ("future") advance is made subsequently. Under former Section 9-312(7) [30-9-312(7), now repealed], the priority of the new advance turned on whether it was "made while a security interest is perfected." This section resolves any ambiguity by omitting the quoted phrase.

Example 1: On February 1, A makes an advance secured by machinery in the debtor's possession and files a financing statement. On March 1, B makes an advance secured by the same machinery and files a financing statement. On April 1, A makes a further advance, under the original security agreement, against the same machinery. A was the first to file and so, under the first-to-file-or-perfect rule of Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)], A's security interest has priority over B's, both as to the February 1 and as to the April 1 advance. It makes no difference whether A knows of B's intervening advance when A makes the second advance. Note that, as long as A was the first to file or perfect, A would have priority with respect to both advances if either A or B had perfected by taking possession of the collateral. Likewise, A would have priority if A's April 1 advance was not made under the original agreement with the debtor, but was under a new agreement.

Example 2: On October 1, A acquires a temporarily perfected (20-day) security interest, unfiled, in a negotiable document in the debtor's possession under Section 9-312 (e) or (f) [30-9A-312(5) or (6)]. The security interest secures an advance made on that day as well as future advances. On October 5, B files and thereby perfects a security interest that previously had attached to the same document. On October 8, A makes an additional advance. On October 10, A files. Under Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)], because A was the first to perfect and maintained continuous perfection or filing since the start of the 20-day period, A has priority, even after the 20-day period expires. See Section 9-322 [30-9A-322], Comment 4, Example 3. However, under this section, for purposes of Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)], to the extent A's security interest secures the October 8 advance, the security interest was perfected on October 8. Inasmuch as B perfected on October 5, B has priority over the October 8 advance.

The rule in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is more liberal toward the priority of future advances than the corresponding rules applicable to intervening lien creditors (subsection (b) [subsection (2)]), buyers (subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)]), and lessees (subsections (f) and (g) [subsections (6) and (7)]).

4. Competing Lien Creditors. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] replaces former Section 9-301(4) [30-9-301(4), now repealed] and addresses the rights of a "lien creditor," as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. Under Section 9-317(a)(2) [30-9A-317(1)(b)], a security interest is senior to the rights of person who becomes a lien creditor, unless the person becomes a lien creditor before the security interest is perfected and before a financing statement covering the collateral is filed. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] of this section provides that a security interest is subordinate to those rights to the extent that the specified circumstances occur. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] does not elevate the priority of a security interest that is subordinate to the rights of a lien creditor under Section 9-317(a)(2) [30-9A-317(1)(b)]; it only subordinates.

As under former Section 9-301(4) [30-9-301(4), now repealed], a secured party's knowledge does not cut short the 45-day period during which future advances can achieve priority over an intervening lien creditor's interest. Rather, because of the impact of the rule in subsection (b) [subsection (2)] on the question whether the security interest for future advances is "protected" under Section 6323(c)(2) and (d) of the Internal Revenue Code as amended by the Federal Tax Lien Act of 1966, the priority of the security interest for future advances over a lien creditor is made absolute for 45 days regardless of knowledge of the secured party concerning the lien. If, however, the advance is made after the 45 days, the advance will not have priority unless it was made or committed without knowledge of the lien.

5. Sales of Receivables; Consignments. Subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] do not apply to outright sales of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes, nor do they apply to consignments.

6. Competing Buyers and Lessees. Under subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)], a buyer will not take subject to a security interest to the extent it secures advances made after the secured party has knowledge that the buyer has purchased the collateral or more than 45 days after the purchase unless the advances were made pursuant to a commitment entered into before the expiration of the 45-day period and without knowledge of the purchase. Subsections (f) and (g) [subsections (6) and (7)] provide an analogous rule for lessees. Of course, a buyer in ordinary course who takes free of the security interest under Section 9-320 [30-9A-320] and a lessee in ordinary course who takes free under Section 9-321 [30-9A-321] are not subject to any future advances. Subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)] replace former Section 9-307(3) [see former 30-9-307, now repealed, see 30-9A-320], and subsections (f) and (g) [subsections (6) and (7)] replace former Section 2A-307(4) [30-2A-307(4)]. No change in meaning is intended.

30-9A-324. Priority of purchase-money security interests.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-312(3), (4) [30-9-312(3), (4), now repealed].

2. Priority of Purchase-Money Security Interests. This section contains the priority rules applicable to purchase-money security interests, as defined in Section 9-103 [30-9A-103]. It affords a special, non-temporal priority to those purchase-money security interests that satisfy the statutory conditions. In most cases, priority will be over a security interest asserted under an after-acquired property clause. See Section 9-204 [30-9A-204] on the extent to which security interests in after-acquired property are validated.

A purchase-money security interest can be created only in goods and software. See Section 9-103 [30-9A-103]. Section 9-324(a) [30-9A-324(1)], which follows former Section 9-312(4) [30-9-312(4), now repealed], contains the general rule for purchase-money security interests in goods. It is subject to subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)], which derive from former

Section 9-312(3) [30-9-312(3), now repealed] and apply to purchase-money security interests in inventory, and subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)], which apply to purchase-money security interests in livestock that are farm products. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] applies to purchase-money security interests in software. Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] deals with the relatively unusual case in which a debtor creates two purchase-money security interests in the same collateral and both security interests qualify for special priority under one of the other subsections.

Former Section 9-312(2) [30-9-312(2), now repealed] contained a rule affording special priority to those who provided secured credit that enabled a debtor to produce crops. This rule proved unworkable and has been eliminated from this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Instead, model Section 9-324A [not adopted in Montana] contains a revised production-money priority rule. That section is a model, not uniform, provision. The sponsors of the UCC have taken no position as to whether it should be enacted, instead leaving the matter for state legislatures to consider if they are so inclined.

3. Purchase-Money Priority in Goods Other Than Inventory and Livestock. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] states a general rule applicable to all types of goods except inventory and farm-products livestock: the purchase-money interest takes priority if it is perfected when the debtor receives possession of the collateral or within 20 days thereafter. (As to the 20-day "grace period," compare Section 9-317(e) [30-9A-317(5)]. Former Sections 9-312(4) and 9-301(2) [30-9-312(4) and 30-9-301(2), both now repealed] contained a 10[20]-day grace period.) The perfection requirement means that the purchase-money secured party either has filed a financing statement before that time or has a temporarily perfected security interest in goods covered by documents under Section 9-312(e) and (f) [30-9A-312(5) and (6)] which is continued in a perfected status by filing before the expiration of the 20-day period specified in that section. A purchase-money security interest qualifies for priority under subsection (a) [subsection (1)], even if the purchase-money secured party knows that a conflicting security interest has been created and/or that the holder of the conflicting interest has filed a financing statement covering the collateral.

Normally, there will be no question when "the debtor receives possession of the collateral" for purposes of subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. However, sometimes a debtor buys goods and takes possession of them in stages, and then assembly and testing are completed (by the seller or debtor-buyer) at the debtor's location. Under those circumstances, the buyer "takes possession" within the meaning of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] when, after an inspection of the portion of the goods in the debtor's possession, it would be apparent to a potential lender to the debtor that the debtor has acquired an interest in the goods taken as a whole.

A similar issue concerning the time when "the debtor receives possession" arises when a person acquires possession of goods under a transaction that is not governed by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] and then later agrees to buy the goods on secured credit. For example, a person may take possession of goods as lessee under a lease contract and then exercise an option to purchase the goods from the lessor on secured credit. Under Section 2A-307(1) [30-2A-307(1)], creditors of the lessee generally take subject to the lease contract; filing a financing statement against the lessee is unnecessary to protect the lessor's leasehold or residual interest. Once the lease is converted to a security interest, filing a financing statement is necessary to protect the seller's (former lessor's) security interest. Accordingly, the 20-day period in subsection (a) does not commence until the goods become "collateral" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]), i.e., until they are subject to a security interest.

4. Purchase-Money Security Interests in Inventory. Subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)] afford a means by which a purchase-money security interest in inventory can achieve priority over an earlier-filed security interest in the same collateral. To achieve priority, the purchase-money security interest must be perfected when the debtor receives possession of the inventory. For a discussion of when "the debtor receives possession," see Comment 3, above. The 20-day grace period of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] does not apply.

The arrangement between an inventory secured party and its debtor typically requires the secured party to make periodic advances against incoming inventory or periodic releases of old inventory as new inventory is received. A fraudulent debtor may apply to the secured party for advances even though it has already given a purchase-money security interest in the inventory to another secured party. For this reason, subsections (b)(2) through (4) and (c) [subsections (2)(b) through (2)(d) and (3)] impose a second condition for the purchase-money security interest's achieving priority: the purchase-money secured party must give notification to the holder of a conflicting security interest who filed against the same item or type of inventory before the purchase-money secured party filed or its security interest became perfected temporarily under Section 9-312(e) or (f) [30-9A-312(5) or (6)]. The notification requirement protects the non-purchase-money inventory secured party in such a situation: if the inventory secured party has received notification, it presumably will not make an advance; if it has not received notification (or if the other security interest does not qualify as purchase-money), any advance the inventory secured party may make ordinarily will have priority under Section 9-322 [30-9A-322]. Inasmuch as an arrangement for periodic advances against incoming goods is unusual outside the inventory field, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] does not contain a notification requirement.

5. Notification to Conflicting Inventory Secured Party: Timing. Under subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)], the perfected purchase-money security interest achieves priority over a conflicting security interest only if the holder of the conflicting security interest receives a notification within five years before the debtor receives possession of the purchase-money collateral. If the debtor never receives possession, the five-year period never begins, and the purchase-money security interest has priority, even if notification is not given. However, where the purchase-money inventory financing began by the purchase-money secured party's possession of a negotiable document of title, to retain priority the secured party must give the notification required by subsection (b) [subsection (2)] at or before the usual time, i.e., when the debtor gets possession of the inventory, even though the security interest remains perfected for 20 days under Section 9-312(e) or (f) [30-9A-312(5) or (6)].

Some people have mistakenly read former Section 9-312(3)(b) [30-9-312(3)(b), now repealed] to require, as a condition of purchase-money priority in inventory, that the purchase-money secured party give the notification before it files a financing statement. Read correctly, the "before" clauses compare (i) the time when the holder of the conflicting security interest filed a financing statement with (ii) the time when the purchase-money security interest becomes perfected by filing or automatically perfected temporarily. Only if (i) occurs before (ii) must notification be given to the holder of the conflicting security interest. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] has been rewritten to clarify this point.

6. Notification to Conflicting Inventory Secured Party: Address. Inasmuch as the address provided as that of the secured party on a filed financing statement is an "address that is reasonable under the circumstances," the holder of a purchase-money security interest may satisfy the requirement to "send" notification to the holder of a conflicting security interest in inventory by sending a notification to that address, even if the address is or becomes incorrect. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (definition of "send"). Similarly, because the address is "held out by [the holder of the conflicting security interest] as the place for receipt of such communications [i.e., communications relating to security interests]," the holder is deemed to have "received" a notification delivered to that address. See Section 1-201(26) [30-1-201(26)].

7. Consignments. Subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)] also determine the priority of a consignor's interest in consigned goods as against a security interest in the goods created by the consignee. Inasmuch as a consignment subject to this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] is defined to be a purchase-money security interest, see Section 9-103(d) [30-9A-103(4)], no inference concerning the nature of the transaction should be drawn from the fact that a consignor uses the term "security interest" in its notice under subsection (b)(4) [subsection (2)(d)]. Similarly, a notice stating that the consignor has delivered or expects to deliver goods, properly described, "on consignment" meets the requirements of subsection (b)(4) [subsection (2)(d)], even if it does not contain the term "security interest," and even if the transaction subsequently is determined to be a security interest. Cf. Section 9-505 [30-9A-505] (use of "consignor" and "consignee" in financing statement).

8. Priority in Proceeds: General. When the purchase-money secured party has priority over another secured party, the question arises whether this priority extends to the proceeds of the original collateral. Subsections (a), (d), and (f) [subsections (1), (4), and (6)] give an affirmative answer, but only as to proceeds in which the security interest is perfected (see Section 9-315 [30-9A-315]). Although this qualification did not appear in former Section 9-312(4) [30-9-312(4), now repealed], it was implicit in that provision.

In the case of inventory collateral under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], where financing frequently is based on the resulting accounts, chattel paper, or other proceeds, the special priority of the purchase-money secured interest carries over into only certain types of proceeds. As under former Section 9-312(3) [30-9-312(3), now repealed], the purchase-money priority in inventory under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] carries over into identifiable cash proceeds (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]) received on or before the delivery of the inventory to a buyer.

As a general matter, also like former Section 9-312(3) [30-9-312(3), now repealed], the purchase-money priority in inventory does not carry over into proceeds consisting of accounts or chattel paper. Many parties financing inventory are quite content to protect their first-priority security interest in the inventory itself. They realize that when the inventory is sold, someone else will be financing the resulting receivables (accounts or chattel paper), and the priority for inventory will not run forward to the receivables constituting the proceeds. Indeed, the cash supplied by the receivables financer often will be used to pay the inventory financing. In some situations, the party financing the inventory on a purchase-money basis makes contractual arrangements that the proceeds of receivables financing by another be devoted to paying off the inventory security interest.

However, the purchase-money priority in inventory does carry over to proceeds consisting of chattel paper and its proceeds (and also to instruments) to the extent provided in Section 9-330 [30-9A-330]. Under Section 9-330(e) [30-9A-330(5)], the holder of a purchase-money security interest in inventory is deemed to give new value for proceeds consisting of chattel paper. Taken together, Sections 9-324(b) and 9-330(e) [30-9A-324(2) and 30-9A-330(5)] enable a purchase-money inventory secured party to obtain priority in chattel paper constituting proceeds of the inventory, even if the secured party does not actually give new value for the chattel paper, provided the purchase-money secured party satisfies the other conditions for achieving priority.

When the proceeds of original collateral (goods or software) consist of a deposit account, Section 9-327 [30-9A-327] governs priority to the extent it conflicts with the priority rules of this section.

9. Priority in Accounts Constituting Proceeds of Inventory. The application of the priority rules in subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is shown by the following examples:

Example 1: Debtor creates a security interest in its existing and after-acquired inventory in favor of SP-1, who files a financing statement covering inventory. SP-2 subsequently takes a purchase-money security interest in certain inventory and, under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], achieves priority in this inventory over SP-1. This inventory is then sold, producing accounts. Accounts are not cash proceeds, and so the special purchase-money priority in the inventory does not control the priority in the accounts. Rather, the first-to-file-or-perfect rule of Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)] applies. The time of SP-1's filing as to the inventory is also the time of filing as to the accounts under Section 9-322(b) [30-9A-322(2)]. Assuming that each security interest in the accounts proceeds remains perfected under Section 9-315 [30-9A-315], SP-1 has priority as to the accounts.

Example 2: In Example 1, if SP-2 had filed directly against accounts, the date of that filing as to accounts would be compared with the date of SP-1's filing as to the inventory. The first filed would prevail under Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)].

Example 3: If SP-3 had filed against accounts in Example 1 before either SP-1 or SP-2 filed against inventory, SP-3's filing against accounts would have priority over the filings of SP-1 and SP-2. This result obtains even though the filings against inventory are effective to continue the perfected status of SP-1's and SP-2's security interest in the accounts beyond the 20-day period of automatic perfection. See Section 9-315 [30-9A-315]. SP-1's and SP-2's position as to the inventory does not give them a claim to accounts (as proceeds of the inventory) which is senior to someone who has filed earlier against accounts. If, on the other hand, either SP-1's or SP-2's filing against the inventory preceded SP-3's filing against accounts, SP-1 or SP-2 would outrank SP-3 as to the accounts.

10. Purchase-Money Security Interests in Livestock. New subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)] provide a purchase-money priority rule for farm-products livestock. They are patterned on the purchase-money priority rule for inventory found in subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)] and include a requirement that the purchase-money secured party notify earlier-filed parties. Two differences between subsections (b) and (d) [subsections (2) and (4)] are noteworthy. First, unlike the purchase-money inventory lender, the purchase-money livestock lender enjoys priority in all proceeds of the collateral. Thus, under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], the purchase-money secured party takes priority in accounts over an earlier-filed accounts financer. Second, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] affords priority in certain products of the collateral as well as proceeds.

11. Purchase-Money Security Interests in Aquatic Farm Products. Aquatic goods produced in aquacultural operations (e.g., catfish raised on a catfish farm) are farm products. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (definition of "farm products"). The definition does not indicate whether aquatic goods are "crops," as to which the model production money security interest priority in Section 9-324A [not adopted in Montana] applies, or "livestock," as to which the purchase-money priority in subsection (d) [subsection (4)] of this section applies. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] leaves courts free to determine the classification of particular aquatic goods on a case-by-case basis, applying whichever priority rule makes more sense in the overall context of the debtor's business.

12. Purchase-Money Security Interests in Software. Subsection (f) [subsection 6] governs the priority of purchase-money security interests in software. Under Section 9-103(c) [30-9A-103(3)], a purchase-money security interest arises in software only if the debtor acquires its interest in the software for the principal purpose of using the software in goods subject to a purchase-money security interest. Under subsection (f) [subsection (6)], a purchase-money security interest in software has the same priority as the purchase-money security interest in the goods in which the software was acquired for use. This priority is determined under subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)] (for inventory) or (a) [subsection (1)] (for other goods).

13. Multiple Purchase-Money Security Interests. New subsection (g) [subsection (7)] governs priority among multiple purchase-money security interests in the same collateral. It grants priority to purchase-money security interests securing the price of collateral (i.e., created in favor of the seller) over purchase-money security interests that secure enabling loans. Section 7.2(c) of the Restatement (3d) of the Law of Property (Mortgages) (1997) adopts this rule with respect to real property mortgages. As Comment d to that section explains:

the equities favor the vendor. Not only does the vendor part with specific real estate rather than money, but the vendor would never relinquish it at all except on the understanding that the vendor will be able to use it to satisfy the obligation to pay the price. This is the case even though the vendor may know that the mortgagor is going to finance the transaction in part by borrowing from a third party and giving a mortgage to secure that obligation. In the final analysis, the law is more sympathetic to the vendor's hazard of losing real estate previously owned than to the third party lender's risk of being unable to collect from an interest in real estate that never previously belonged to it.

The first-to-file-or-perfect rule of Section 9-322 [30-9A-322] applies to multiple purchase-money security interests securing enabling loans.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. "Double Debtor Problem." This section addresses the "double debtor" problem, which arises when a debtor acquires property that is subject to a security interest created by another debtor.

3. Taking Subject to Perfected Security Interest. Consider the following scenario:

Example 1: A owns an item of equipment subject to a perfected security interest in favor of SP-A. A sells the equipment to B, not in the ordinary course of business. B acquires its interest subject to SP-A's security interest. See Sections 9-201, 9-315(a)(1) [30-9A-201 and 30-9A-315(1)(a)]. Under this section, if B creates a security interest in the equipment in favor of SP-B, SP-B's security interest is subordinate to SP-A's security interest, even if SP-B filed against B before SP-A filed against A, and even if SP-B took a purchase-money security interest. Normally, SP-B could have investigated the source of the equipment and discovered SP-A's filing before making an advance against the equipment, whereas SP-A had no reason to search the filings against someone other than its debtor, A.

4. Taking Subject to Unperfected Security Interest. This section applies only if the security interest in the transferred collateral was perfected when the transferee acquired the collateral. See subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)]. If this condition is not met, then the normal priority rules apply.

Example 2: A owns an item of equipment subject to an unperfected security interest in favor of SP-A. A sells the equipment to B, who gives value and takes delivery of the equipment without knowledge of the security interest. B takes free of the security interest. See Section 9-317(b) [30-9A-317(2)]. If B then creates a security interest in favor of SP-B, no priority issue arises; SP-B has the only security interest in the equipment.

Example 3: The facts are as in Example 2, except that B knows of SP-A's security interest and therefore takes the equipment subject to it. If B creates a security interest in the equipment in favor of SP-B, this section does not determine the relative priority of the security interests.

Rather, the normal priority rules govern. If SP-B perfects its security interest, then, under Section 9-322(a)(2) [30-9A-322(1)(b)], SP-A's unperfected security interest will be junior to SP-B's perfected security interest. The award of priority to SP-B is premised on the belief that SP-A's failure to file could have misled SP-B.

5. Taking Subject to Perfected Security Interest that Becomes Unperfected. This section applies only if the security interest in the transferred collateral did not become unperfected at any time after the transferee acquired the collateral. See subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)]. If this condition is not met, then the normal priority rules apply.

Example 4: As in Example 1, A owns an item of equipment subject to a perfected security interest in favor of SP-A. A sells the equipment to B, not in the ordinary course of business. B acquires its interest subject to SP-A's security interest. See Sections 9-201, 9-315(a)(1) [30-9A-201 and 30-9A-315(1)(a)]. B creates a security interest in favor of SP-B, and SP-B perfects its security interest. This section provides that SP-A's security interest is senior to SP-B's. However, if SP-A's financing statement lapses while SP-B's security interest is perfected, then the normal priority rules would apply, and SP-B's security interest would become senior to SP-A's security interest. See Sections 9-322(a)(2), 9-515(c) [30-9A-322(1)(b) and 30-9A-515(3)].

6. Unusual Situations. The appropriateness of the rule of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is most apparent when it works to subordinate security interests having priority under the basic priority rules of Section 9-322(a) [30-9A-322(1)] or the purchase-money priority rules of Section 9-324 [30-9A-324]. The rule also works properly when applied to the security interest of a buyer under Section 2-711(3) [30-2-711(3)] or a lessee under Section 2A-508(5) [30-2A-508(5)]. However, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] may provide an inappropriate resolution of the "double debtor" problem in some of the wide variety of other contexts in which the problem may arise. Although subsection (b) [subsection (2)] limits the application of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] to those cases in which subordination is known to be appropriate, courts should apply the rule in other settings, if necessary to promote the underlying purposes and policies of the Uniform Commercial Code. See Section 1-102(1) [30-1-102(1)].

30-9A-326. Priority of security interests created by new debtor.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Subordination of Security Interests Created by New Debtor. This section addresses the priority contests that may arise when a new debtor becomes bound by the security agreement of an original debtor and each debtor has a secured creditor.

Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] subordinates the original debtor's secured party's security interest perfected against the new debtor solely under Section 9-508 [30-9A-508]. The security interest is subordinated to security interests in the same collateral perfected by another method, e.g., by filing against the new debtor. As used in this section, "a filed financing statement that is effective solely under Section 9-508 [30-9A-508]" refers to a financing statement filed against the original debtor that continues to be effective under Section 9-508 [30-9A-508]. It does not encompass a new initial financing statement providing the name of the new debtor, even if the initial financing statement is filed to maintain the effectiveness of a financing statement under the circumstances described in Section 9-508(b) [30-9A-508(2)]. Nor does it encompass a financing statement filed against the original debtor which remains effective against collateral transferred by the original debtor to the new debtor. See Section 9-508(c) [30-9A-508(3)]. Concerning priority contests involving transferred collateral, see Sections 9-325 and 9-507 [30-9A-325 and 30-9A-507].

Example 1: SP-X holds a perfected-by-filing security interest in X Corp's existing and after-acquired inventory, and SP-Z holds a perfected-by-possession security interest in an item of Z Corp's inventory. Z Corp becomes bound as debtor by X Corp's security agreement (e.g., Z Corp buys X Corp's assets and assumes its security agreement). See Section 9-203(d) [30-9A-203(4)]. Under Section 9-508 [30-9A-508], SP-X's financing statement is effective to perfect a security interest in the item of inventory in which Z Corp has rights. However, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that SP-X's security interest is subordinate to SP-Z's, regardless of whether SP-X's financing statement was filed before SP-Z perfected its security interest.

Example 2: SP-X holds a perfected-by-filing security interest in X Corp's existing and after-acquired inventory, and SP-Z holds a perfected-by-filing security interest in Z Corp's existing and after-acquired inventory. Z Corp becomes bound as debtor by X Corp's security agreement. Subsequently, Z Corp acquires a new item of inventory. Under Section 9-508 [30-9A-508], SP-X's financing statement is effective to perfect a security interest in the new item of inventory in which Z Corp has rights. However, because SP-Z's security interest was perfected by another method, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that SP-X's security interest is subordinate to SP-Z's, regardless of which financing statement was filed first. This would be the case even if SP-Z filed after Z Corp became bound by X Corp's security agreement.

3. Other Priority Rules. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] addresses the priority among security interests created by the original debtor (X Corp). By invoking the other priority rules of this subpart, as applicable, subsection (b) [subsection (2)] preserves the relative priority of security interests created by the original debtor.

Example 3: Under the facts of Example 2, SP-Y also holds a perfected-by-filing security interest in X Corp's existing and after-acquired inventory. SP-Y filed after SP-X. Inasmuch as both SP-X's and SP-Y's security interests in inventory acquired by Z Corp after it became bound are perfected solely under Section 9-508 [30-9A-508], the normal priority rules determine their relative priorities. Under the "first-to-file-or-perfect" rule of Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)], SP-X has priority over SP-Y.

Example 4: Under the facts of Example 3, after Z Corp became bound by X Corp's security agreement, SP-Y promptly filed a new initial financing statement against Z Corp. At that time, SP-X's security interest was perfected only by virtue of its original filing against X Corp which was "effective solely under Section 9-508 [30-9A-508]." Because SP-Y's security interest no longer is perfected by a financing statement that is "effective solely under Section 9-508 [30-9A-508]," this section does not apply to the priority contest. Rather, the normal priority rules apply. Under Section 9-322 [30-9A-322], because SP-Y's financing statement was filed against Z Corp, the new debtor, before SP-X's, SP-Y's security interest is senior to that of SP-X. Similarly, the normal priority rules would govern priority between SP-Y and SP-Z.

The second sentence of subsection (b) [subsection (2)] effectively limits the applicability of the first sentence to situations in which a new debtor has become bound by more than one security agreement entered into by the same original debtor. When the new debtor has become bound by security agreements entered into by different original debtors, the second sentence provides that priority is based on priority in time of the new debtor's becoming bound.

Example 5: Under the facts of Example 2, SP-W holds a perfected-by-filing security interest in W Corp's existing and after-acquired inventory. After Z Corp became bound by X Corp's security agreement in favor of SP-X, Z Corp became bound by W Corp's security agreement. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], SP-W's security interest in inventory acquired by Z Corp is subordinate to that of SP-X, because Z Corp became bound under SP-X's security agreement before it became bound under SP-W's security agreement. This is the result regardless of which financing statement (SP-X's or SP-W's) was filed first. The second sentence of subsection (b) [subsection (2)] reflects the generally accepted view that priority based on the first-to-file rule is inappropriate for resolving priority disputes when the filings were made against different debtors. Like subsection (a) [subsection (1)] and the first sentence of subsection (b) [subsection (2)], however, the second sentence of subsection (b) [subsection (2)] relates only to priority conflicts among security interests perfected by filed financing statements that are "effective solely under Section 9-508 [30-9A-508]."

Example 6: Under the facts of Example 5, after Z Corp became bound by W Corp's security agreement, SP-W promptly filed a new initial financing statement against Z Corp. At that time, SP-X's security interest was perfected only pursuant to its original filing against X Corp which was "effective solely under Section 9-508 [30-9A-508]." Because SP-W's security interest is not perfected by a financing statement that is "effective solely under Section 9-508 [30-9A-508]," this section does not apply to the priority contest. Rather, the normal priority rules apply. Under Section 9-322 [30-9A-322], because SP-W's financing statement was the first to be filed against Z Corp, the new debtor, SP-W's security interest is senior to that of SP-X. Similarly, the normal priority rules would govern priority between SP-W and SP-Z.

30-9A-327. Priority of security interests in deposit account.

Official Comments

1. Source. New; derived from former Section 9-115(5) [30-9-115(5), now repealed].

2. Scope of This Section. This section contains the rules governing the priority of conflicting security interests in deposit accounts. It overrides conflicting priority rules. See Sections 9-322(f)(1), 9-324(a), (b), (d), (f) [30-9A-322(6)(a) and 30-9A-324(1), (2), (4), and (6)]. This section does not apply to accounts evidenced by an instrument (e.g., certain certificates of deposit), which by definition are not "deposit accounts."

3. Control. Under paragraph (1) [subsection (1)], security interests perfected by control (Sections 9-314, 9-104 [30-9A-314 and 30-9A-104]) take priority over those perfected otherwise, e.g., as identifiable cash proceeds under Section 9-315 [30-9A-315]. Secured parties for whom the deposit account is an integral part of the credit decision will, at a minimum, insist upon the right to immediate access to the deposit account upon the debtor's default (i.e., control). Those secured parties for whom the deposit account is less essential will not take control, thereby running the risk that the debtor will dispose of funds on deposit (either outright or for collateral purposes) after default but before the account can be frozen by court order or the secured party can obtain control.

Paragraph (2) [subsection (2)] governs the case (expected to be very rare) in which a bank enters into a Section 9-104(a)(2) [30-9A-104(1)(b)] control agreement with more than one secured party. It provides that the security interests rank according to time of obtaining control. If the bank is solvent and the control agreements are well drafted, the bank will be liable to each secured party, and the priority rule will have no practical effect.

4. Priority of Bank. Under paragraph (3) [subsection (3)], the security interest of the bank with which the deposit account is maintained normally takes priority over all other conflicting security interests in the deposit account, regardless of whether the deposit account constitutes the competing secured party's original collateral or its proceeds. A rule of this kind enables banks to extend credit to their depositors without the need to examine either the public record or their own records to determine whether another party might have a security interest in the deposit account.

A secured party who takes a security interest in the deposit account as original collateral can protect itself against the results of this rule in one of two ways. It can take control of the deposit account by becoming the bank's customer. Under paragraph (4) [subsection (4)], this arrangement operates to subordinate the bank's security interest. Alternatively, the secured party can obtain a subordination agreement from the bank. See Section 9-339 [30-9A-339].

A secured party who claims the deposit account as proceeds of other collateral can reduce the risk of becoming junior by obtaining the debtor's agreement to deposit proceeds into a specific cash-collateral account and obtaining the agreement of that bank to subordinate all its claims to those of the secured party. But if the debtor violates its agreement and deposits funds into a deposit account other than the cash-collateral account, the secured party risks being subordinated.

5. Priority in Proceeds of, and Funds Transferred from, Deposit Account. The priority afforded by this section does not extend to proceeds of a deposit account. Rather, Section 9-322(c) through (e) [30-9A-322(3) through (5)] and the provisions referred to in Section 9-322(f) [30-9A-322(6)] govern priorities in proceeds of a deposit account. Section 9-315(d) [30-9A-315(4)] addresses continuation of perfection in proceeds of deposit accounts. As to funds transferred from a deposit account that serves as collateral, see Section 9-332 [30-9A-332].

30-9A-328. Priority of security interests in investment property.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-115(5) [30-9-115(5), now repealed].

2. Scope of This Section. This section contains the rules governing the priority of conflicting security interests in investment property. Paragraph (1) [subsection 1] states the most important general rule-that a secured party who obtains control has priority over a secured party who does not obtain control. Paragraphs (2) through (4) [subsections (2) through (4)] deal with conflicting security interests each of which is perfected by control. Paragraph (5) [subsection (5)] addresses the priority of a security interest in a certificated security which is perfected by delivery but not control. Paragraph (6) [subsection (6)] deals with the relatively unusual circumstance in which a broker, securities intermediary, or commodity intermediary has created conflicting security interests none of which is perfected by control. Paragraph (7) [subsection (7)] provides that the general priority rules of Sections 9-322 and 9-323 [30-9A-322 and 30-9A-323] apply to cases not covered by the specific rules in this section. The principal application of this residual rule is that the usual first in time of filing rule applies to conflicting security interests that are perfected only by filing. Because the control priority rule of paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] provides for the ordinary cases in which persons purchase securities on margin credit from their brokers, there is no need for special rules for purchase-money security interests. See also Section 9-103 [30-9A-103] (limiting purchase-money collateral to goods and software).

3. General Rule: Priority of Security Interest Perfected by Control. Under paragraph (1) [subsection (1)], a secured party who obtains control has priority over a secured party who does not obtain control. The control priority rule does not turn on either temporal sequence or awareness of conflicting security interests. Rather, it is a structural rule, based on the principle that a lender should be able to rely on the collateral without question if the lender has taken the necessary steps to assure itself that it is in a position where it can foreclose on the collateral without further action by the debtor. The control priority rule is necessary because the perfection rules provide considerable flexibility in structuring secured financing arrangements. For example, at the "retail" level, a secured lender to an investor who wants the full measure of protection can obtain control, but the creditor may be willing to accept the greater measure of risk that follows from perfection by filing. Similarly, at the "wholesale" level, a lender to securities firms can leave the collateral with the debtor and obtain a perfected security interest under the automatic perfection rule of Section 9-309(10) [30-9A-309(10)], but a lender who wants to be entirely sure of its position will want to obtain control. The control priority rule of paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] is an essential part of this system of flexibility. It is feasible to provide more than one method of perfecting security interests only if the rules ensure that those who take the necessary steps to obtain the full measure of protection do not run the risk of subordination to those who have not taken such steps. A secured party who is unwilling to run the risk that the debtor has granted or will grant a conflicting control security interest should not make a loan without obtaining control of the collateral.

As applied to the retail level, the control priority rule means that a secured party who obtains control has priority over a conflicting security interest perfected by filing without regard to inquiry into whether the control secured party was aware of the filed security interest. Prior to the 1994 revisions to Articles 8 and 9 [Title 30, chapters 8 and 9A], Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] did not permit perfection of security interests in securities by filing. Accordingly, parties who deal in securities never developed a practice of searching the UCC files before conducting securities transactions. Although filing is now a permissible method of perfection, in order to avoid disruption of existing practices in this business it is necessary to give perfection by filing a different and more limited effect for securities than for some other forms of collateral. The priority rules are not based on the assumption that parties who perfect by the usual method of obtaining control will search the files. Quite the contrary, the control priority rule is intended to ensure that, with respect to investment property, secured parties who do obtain control are entirely unaffected by filings. To state the point another way, perfection by filing is intended to affect only general creditors or other secured creditors who rely on filing. The rule that a security interest perfected by filing can be primed by a control security interest, without regard to awareness, is a consequence of the system of perfection and priority rules for investment property. These rules are designed to take account of the circumstances of the securities markets, where filing is not given the same effect as for some other forms of property. No implication is made about the effect of filing with respect to security interests in other forms of property, nor about other Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] rules, e.g., Section 9-330 [30-9A-330], which govern the circumstances in which security interests in other forms of property perfected by filing can be primed by subsequent perfected security interests.

The following examples illustrate the application of the priority rule in paragraph (1) [subsection (1)]:

Example 1: Debtor borrows from Alpha and grants Alpha a security interest in a variety of collateral, including all of Debtor's investment property. At that time Debtor owns 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock for which Debtor has a certificate. Alpha perfects by filing. Later, Debtor borrows from Beta and grants Beta a security interest in the 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock. Debtor delivers the certificate, properly indorsed, to Beta. Alpha and Beta both have perfected security interests in the XYZ Co. stock. Beta has control, see Section 8-106(b)(1) [30-8-116(2)(a)], and hence has priority over Alpha.

Example 2: Debtor borrows from Alpha and grants Alpha a security interest in a variety of collateral, including all of Debtor's investment property. At that time Debtor owns 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock, held through a securities account with Able & Co. Alpha perfects by filing. Later, Debtor borrows from Beta and grants Beta a security interest in the 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock. Debtor instructs Able to have the 1000 shares transferred through the clearing corporation to Custodian Bank, to be credited to Beta's account with Custodian Bank. Alpha and Beta both have perfected security interests in the XYZ Co. stock. Beta has control, see Section 8-106(d)(1) [30-8-116(4)(a)], and hence has priority over Alpha.

Example 3: Debtor borrows from Alpha and grants Alpha a security interest in a variety of collateral, including all of Debtor's investment property. At that time Debtor owns 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock, which is held through a securities account with Able & Co. Alpha perfects by filing. Later, Debtor borrows from Beta and grants Beta a security interest in the 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock. Debtor, Able, and Beta enter into an agreement under which Debtor will continue to receive dividends and distributions, and will continue to have the right to direct dispositions, but Beta will also have the right to direct dispositions and receive the proceeds. Alpha and Beta both have perfected security interests in the XYZ Co. stock (more precisely, in the Debtor's security entitlement to the financial asset consisting of the XYZ Co. stock). Beta has control, see Section 8-106(d)(2) [30-8-116(4)(b)], and hence has priority over Alpha.

Example 4: Debtor borrows from Alpha and grants Alpha a security interest in a variety of collateral, including all of Debtor's investment property. At that time Debtor owns 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock, held through a securities account with Able & Co. Alpha perfects by filing. Debtor's agreement with Able & Co. provides that Able has a security interest in all securities carried in the account as security for any obligations of Debtor to Able. Debtor incurs obligations to Able and later defaults on the obligations to Alpha and Able. Able has control by virtue of the rule of Section 8-106(e) [30-8-116(5)] that if a customer grants a security interest to its own intermediary, the intermediary has control. Since Alpha does not have control, Able has priority over Alpha under the general control priority rule of paragraph (1) [subsection (1)].

4. Conflicting Security Interests Perfected by Control: Priority of Securities Intermediary or Commodity Intermediary. Paragraphs (2) through (4) [subsections (2) through (4)] govern the priority of conflicting security interests each of which is perfected by control. The following example explains the application of the rules in paragraphs (3) and (4) [subsections (3) and (4)]:

Example 5: Debtor holds securities through a securities account with Able & Co. Debtor's agreement with Able & Co. provides that Able has a security interest in all securities carried in the account as security for any obligations of Debtor to Able. Debtor borrows from Beta and grants Beta a security interest in 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock carried in the account. Debtor, Able, and Beta enter into an agreement under which Debtor will continue to receive dividends and distributions and will continue to have the right to direct dispositions, but Beta will also have the right to direct dispositions and receive the proceeds. Debtor incurs obligations to Able and later defaults on the obligations to Beta and Able. Both Beta and Able have control, so the general control priority rule of paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] does not apply. Compare Example 4. Paragraph (3) [subsection (3)] provides that a security interest held by a securities intermediary in positions of its own customer has priority over a conflicting security interest of an external lender, so Able has priority over Beta. (Paragraph (4) [subsection (4)] contains a parallel rule for commodity intermediaries.) The agreement among Able, Beta, and Debtor could, of course, determine the relative priority of the security interests of Able and Beta, see Section 9-339 [30-9A-339], but the fact that the intermediary has agreed to act on the instructions of a secured party such as Beta does not itself imply any agreement by the intermediary to subordinate.

5. Conflicting Security Interests Perfected by Control: Temporal Priority. Former Section 9-115 [30-9-115, now repealed] introduced into Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] the concept of conflicting security interests that rank equally. Paragraph (2) [subsection (2)] of this section governs priority in those circumstances in which more than one secured party (other than a broker, securities intermediary, or commodity intermediary) has control. It replaces the equal-priority rule for conflicting security interests in investment property with a temporal rule. For securities, both certificated and uncertificated, under paragraph (2)(A) [subsection (2)(a)] priority is based on the time that control is obtained. For security entitlements carried in securities accounts, the treatment is more complex. Paragraph (2)(B) [subsection (2)(b)] bases priority on the timing of the steps taken to achieve control. The following example illustrates the application of paragraph (2) [subsection (2)].

Example 6: Debtor borrows from Alpha and grants Alpha a security interest in a variety of collateral, including all of Debtor's investment property. At that time Debtor owns a security entitlement that includes 1000 shares of XYZ Co. stock that Debtor holds through a securities account with Able & Co. Debtor, Able, and Alpha enter into an agreement under which Debtor will continue to receive dividends and distributions, and will continue to have the right to direct dispositions, but Alpha will also have the right to direct dispositions and receive the proceeds. Later, Debtor borrows from Beta and grants Beta a security interest in all its investment property, existing and after-acquired. Debtor, Able, and Beta enter into an agreement under which Debtor will continue to receive dividends and distributions, and will continue to have the right to direct dispositions, but Beta will also have the right to direct dispositions and receive the proceeds. Alpha and Beta both have perfected-by-control security interests in the security entitlement to the XYZ Co. stock by virtue of their agreements with Able. See Sections 9-314(a), 9-106(a), 8-106(d)(2) [30-9A-314(1), 30-9A-106(1), 30-8-116(4)(b)]. Under paragraph (2)(B)(ii)

[subsection (2)(b)(ii)], the priority of each security interest dates from the time of the secured party's agreement with Able. Because Alpha's agreement was first in time, Alpha has priority. This priority applies equally to security entitlements to financial assets credited to the account after the agreement was entered into.

The priority rule is analogous to "first-to-file" priority under Section 9-322 [30-9A-322] with respect to after-acquired collateral. Paragraphs (2)(B)(i) and (2)(B)(iii) [subsections (2)(b)(i) and (2)(b)(iii)] provide similar rules for security entitlements as to which control is obtained by other methods, and paragraph (2)(C) [subsection (2)(c)] provides a similar rule for commodity contracts carried in a commodity account. Section 8-510 [30-8-510] also has been revised to provide a temporal priority conforming to paragraph (2)(B) [subsection (2)(b)].

6. Certificated Securities. A long-standing practice has developed whereby secured parties whose collateral consists of a security evidenced by a security certificate take possession of the security certificate. If the security certificate is in bearer form, the secured party's acquisition of possession constitutes "delivery" under Section 8-301(a)(1) [30-8-331(1)(a)], and the delivery constitutes "control" under Section 8-106(a) [30-8-116(1)]. Comment 5 discusses the priority of security interests perfected by control of investment property.

If the security certificate is in registered form, the secured party will not achieve control over the security unless the security certificate contains an appropriate indorsement or is (re)registered in the secured party's name. See Section 8-106(b) [30-8-116(2)]. However, the secured party's acquisition of possession constitutes "delivery" of the security certificate under Section 8-301 [30-8-331] and serves to perfect the security interest under Section 9-313(a) [30-9A-313(1)], even if the security certificate has not been appropriately indorsed and has not been (re)registered in the secured party's name. A security interest perfected by this method has priority over a security interest perfected other than by control (e.g., by filing). See paragraph (5) [subsection (5)].

The priority rule stated in paragraph (5) [subsection (5)] may seem anomalous, in that it can afford less favorable treatment to purchasers who buy collateral outright that to those who take a security interest in it. For example, a buyer of a security certificate would cut off a security interest perfected by filing only if the buyer achieves the status of a protected purchaser under Section 8-303 [30-8-333]. The buyer would not be a protected purchaser, for example, if it does not obtain "control" under Section 8-106 [30-8-116] (e.g., if it fails to obtain a proper indorsement of the certificate) or if it had notice of an adverse claim under Section 8-105 [30-8-115]. The apparent anomaly disappears, however, when one understands the priority rule not as one intended to protect careless or guilty parties, but as one that eliminates the need to conduct a search of the public records only insofar as necessary to serve the needs of the securities markets.

7. Secured Financing of Securities Firms. Priority questions concerning security interests granted by brokers and securities intermediaries are governed by the general control-beats-non-control priority rule of paragraph (1) [subsection (1)], as supplemented by the special rules set out in paragraphs (2) [subsection (2)] (temporal priority-first to control), (3) [subsection (3)] (special priority for securities intermediary), and (6) [subsection (6)] (equal priority for non-control). The following examples illustrate the priority rules as applied to this setting. (In all cases it is assumed that the debtor retains sufficient other securities to satisfy all customers' claims. This section deals with the relative rights of secured lenders to a securities firm. Disputes between a secured lender and the firm's own customers are governed by Section 8-511 [30-8-511].)

Example 7: Able & Co., a securities dealer, enters into financing arrangements with two lenders, Alpha Bank and Beta Bank. In each case the agreements provide that the lender will have a security interest in the securities identified on lists provided to the lender on a daily basis, that the debtor will deliver the securities to the lender on demand, and that the debtor will not list as collateral any securities which the debtor has pledged to any other lender. Upon Able's insolvency it is discovered that Able has listed the same securities on the collateral lists provided to both Alpha and Beta. Alpha and Beta both have perfected security interests under the automatic-perfection rule of Section 9-309(10) [30-9A-309(10)]. Neither Alpha nor Beta has control. Paragraph (6) [subsection (6)] provides that the security interests of Alpha and Beta rank equally, because each of them has a non-control security interest granted by a securities firm. They share pro-rata.

Example 8: Able enters into financing arrangements, with Alpha Bank and Beta Bank as in Example 7. At some point, however, Beta decides that it is unwilling to continue to provide financing on a non-control basis. Able directs the clearing corporation where it holds its principal inventory of securities to move specified securities into Beta's account. Upon Able's insolvency it is discovered that a list of collateral provided to Alpha includes securities that had been moved to Beta's account. Both Alpha and Beta have perfected security interests; Alpha under the automatic-perfection rule of Section 9-309(10) [30-9A-309(10)], and Beta under that rule and also the perfection-by-control rule in Section 9-314(a) [30-9A-314(1)]. Beta has control but Alpha does not. Beta has priority over Alpha under paragraph (1) [subsection (1)].

Example 9: Able & Co. carries its principal inventory of securities through Clearing Corporation, which offers a "shared control" facility whereby a participant securities firm can enter into an arrangement with a lender under which the securities firm will retain the power to trade and otherwise direct dispositions of securities carried in its account, but Clearing Corporation agrees that, at any time the lender so directs, Clearing Corporation will transfer any securities from the firm's account to the lender's account or otherwise dispose of them as directed by the lender. Able enters into financing arrangements with two lenders, Alpha and Beta, each of which obtains such a control agreement from Clearing Corporation. The agreement with each lender provides that Able will designate specific securities as collateral on lists provided to the lender on a daily or other periodic basis, and that it will not pledge the same securities to different lenders. Upon Able's insolvency, it is discovered that Able has listed the same securities on the collateral lists provided to both Alpha and Beta. Both Alpha and Beta have control over the disputed securities. Paragraph (2) [subsection (2)] awards priority to whichever secured party first entered into the agreement with Clearing Corporation.

8. Relation to Other Law. Section 1-103 [30-1-103] provides that "unless displaced by particular provisions of this Act, the principles of law and equity . . . shall supplement its provisions." There may be circumstances in which a secured party's action in acquiring a security interest that has priority under this section constitutes conduct that is wrongful under other law. Though the possibility of such resort to other law may provide an appropriate "escape valve" for cases of egregious conduct, care must be taken to ensure that this does not impair the certainty and predictability of the priority rules. Whether a court may appropriately look to other law to impose liability upon or estop a secured party from asserting its Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] priority depends on an assessment of the secured party's conduct under the standards established by such other law as well as a determination of whether the particular application of such other law is displaced by the UCC.

Some circumstances in which other law is clearly displaced by the UCC rules are readily identifiable. Common law "first in time, first in right" principles, or correlative tort liability rules such as common law conversion principles under which a purchaser may incur liability to a person with a prior property interest without regard to awareness of that claim, are necessarily displaced by the priority rules set out in this section since these rules determine the relative ranking of security interests in investment property. So too, Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] provides protections against adverse claims to certain purchasers of interests in investment property. In circumstances where a secured party not only has priority under Section 9-328 [30-9A-328], but also qualifies for protection against adverse claims under Section 8-303, 8-502, or 8-510 [30-8-333, 30-8-502, or 30-8-510], resort to other law would be precluded.

In determining whether it is appropriate in a particular case to look to other law, account must also be taken of the policies that underlie the commercial law rules on securities markets and security interests in securities. A principal objective of the 1994 revision of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8] and the provisions of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] governing investment property was to ensure that secured financing transactions can be implemented on a simple, timely, and certain basis. One of the circumstances that led to the revision was the concern that uncertainty in the application of the rules on secured transactions involving securities and other financial assets could contribute to systemic risk by impairing the ability of financial institutions to provide liquidity to the markets in times of stress. The control priority rule is designed to provide a clear and certain rule to ensure that lenders who have taken the necessary steps to establish control do not face a risk of subordination to other lenders who have not done so.

The control priority rule does not turn on an inquiry into the state of a secured party's awareness of potential conflicting claims because a rule under which a person's rights depended on that sort of after-the-fact inquiry could introduce an unacceptable measure of uncertainty. If an inquiry into awareness could provide a complete and satisfactory resolution of the problem in all cases, the priority rules of this section would have incorporated that test. The fact that they do not necessarily means that resort to other law based solely on that factor is precluded, though the question whether a control secured party induced or encouraged its financing arrangement with actual knowledge that the debtor would be violating the rights of another secured party may, in some circumstances, appropriately be treated as a factor in determining whether the control party's action is the kind of egregious conduct for which resort to other law is appropriate.

30-9A-329. Priority of security interests in letter-of-credit right.

Official Comments

1. Source. New; loosely modeled after former Section 9-115(5) [30-9-115(5), now repealed].

2. General Rule. Paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] awards priority to a secured party who perfects a security interest directly in letter-of-credit rights (i.e., one that takes an assignment of proceeds and obtains consent of the issuer or any nominated person under Section 5-114(c) [30-5-134(3)]) over another conflicting security interest (i.e., one that is perfected automatically in the letter-of-credit rights as supporting obligations under Section 9-308(d) [30-9A-308(4)]). This is consistent with international letter-of-credit practice and provides finality to payments made to recognized assignees of letter-of-credit proceeds. If an issuer or nominated person recognizes multiple security interests in a letter-of-credit right, resulting in multiple parties having control (Section 9-107 [30-9A-107]), under paragraph (2) [subsection (2)] the security interests rank according to the time of obtaining control.

3. Drawing Rights; Transferee Beneficiaries. Drawing under a letter of credit is personal to the beneficiary and requires the beneficiary to perform the conditions for drawing under the letter of credit. Accordingly, a beneficiary's grant of a security interest in a letter of credit includes the beneficiary's "letter-of-credit right" as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] and the right to "proceeds of [the] letter of credit" as defined in Section 5-114(a) [30-5-134(1)], but does not include the right to demand payment under the letter of credit.

Section 5-114(e) [30-5-134(5)] provides that the "[r]ights of a transferee beneficiary or nominated person are independent of the beneficiary's assignment of the proceeds of a letter of credit and are superior to the assignee's right to the proceeds." To the extent the rights of a transferee beneficiary or nominated person are independent and superior, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not apply. See Section 9-109(c) [30-9A-109(3)].

Under Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5], there is in effect a novation upon the transfer with the issuer becoming bound on a new, independent obligation to the transferee. The rights of nominated persons and transferee beneficiaries under a letter of credit include the right to demand payment from the issuer. Under Section 5-114(e) [30-5-134(5)], their rights to payment are independent of their obligations to the beneficiary (or original beneficiary) and superior to the rights of assignees of letter-of-credit proceeds (Section 5-114(c) [30-5-134(3)]) and others claiming a security interest in the beneficiary's (or original beneficiary's) letter-of-credit rights.

A transfer of drawing rights under a transferable letter of credit establishes independent Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] rights in the transferee and does not create or perfect an Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] security interest in the transferred drawing rights. The definition of "letter-of-credit right" in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] excludes a beneficiary's drawing rights. The exercise of drawing rights by a transferee beneficiary may breach a contractual obligation of the transferee to the original beneficiary concerning when and how much the transferee may draw or how it may use the funds received under the letter of credit. If, for example, drawing rights are transferred to support a sale or loan from the transferee to the original beneficiary, then the transferee would be obligated to the original beneficiary under the sale or loan agreement to account for any drawing and for the use of any funds received. The transferee's obligation would be governed by the applicable law of contracts or restitution.

4. Secured Party-Transferee Beneficiaries. As described in Comment 3, drawing rights under letters of credit are transferred in many commercial contexts in which the transferee is not a secured party claiming a security interest in an underlying receivable supported by the letter of credit. Consequently, a transfer of a letter of credit is not a method of "perfection" of a security interest. The transferee's independent right to draw under the letter of credit and to receive and retain the value thereunder (in effect, priority) is not based on Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] but on letter-of-credit law and the terms of the letter of credit. Assume, however, that a secured party does hold a security interest in a receivable that is owned by a beneficiary-debtor and supported by a transferable letter of credit. Assume further that the beneficiary-debtor causes the letter of credit to be transferred to the secured party, the secured party draws under the letter of credit, and, upon the issuer's payment to the secured party-transferee, the underlying account debtor's obligation to the original beneficiary-debtor is satisfied. In this situation, the payment to the secured party-transferee is proceeds of the receivable collected by the secured party-transferee. Consequently, the secured party-transferee would have certain duties to the debtor and third parties under Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. For example, it would be obliged to collect under the letter of credit in a commercially reasonable manner and to remit any surplus pursuant to Sections 9-607 and 9-608 [30-9A-607 and 30-9A-608].

This scenario is problematic under letter-of-credit law and practice, inasmuch as a transferee beneficiary collects in its own right arising from its own performance. Accordingly, under Section 5-114 [30-5-134], the independent and superior rights of a transferee control over any inconsistent duties under Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. A transferee beneficiary may take a transfer of drawing rights to avoid reliance on the original beneficiary's credit and collateral, and it may consider any Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] rights superseded by its Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] rights. Moreover, it will not always be clear (i) whether a transferee beneficiary has a security interest in the underlying collateral, (ii) whether any security interest is senior to the rights of others, or (iii) whether the transferee beneficiary is aware that it holds a security interest. There will be clear cases in which the role of a transferee beneficiary as such is merely incidental to a conventional secured financing. There also will be cases in which the existence of a security interest may have little to do with the position of a transferee beneficiary as such. In dealing with these cases and less clear cases involving the possible application of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] to a nominated person or a transferee beneficiary, the right to demand payment under a letter of credit should be distinguished from letter-of-credit rights. The courts also should give appropriate consideration to the policies and provisions of Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5] and letter-of-credit practice as well as Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A].

30-9A-330. Purchase of chattel paper or instrument.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-308 [30-9-308, now repealed].

2. Non-Temporal Priority. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] permits a security interest in chattel paper or instruments to be perfected either by filing or by the secured party's taking possession. This section enables secured parties and other purchasers of chattel paper (both electronic and tangible) and instruments to obtain priority over earlier-perfected security interests.

3. Chattel Paper. Subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] follow former Section 9-308 [30-9-308, now repealed] in distinguishing between earlier-perfected security interests in chattel paper that is claimed merely as proceeds of inventory subject to a security interest and chattel paper that is claimed other than merely as proceeds. Like former Section 9-308 [30-9-308, now repealed], this section does not elaborate upon the phrase "merely as proceeds." For an elaboration, see PEB Commentary No. 8.

This section makes explicit the "good faith" requirement and retains the requirements of "the ordinary course of the purchaser's business" and the giving of "new value" as conditions for priority. Concerning the last, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] deletes former Section 9-108 [30-9-108, now repealed] and adds to Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] a completely different definition of the term "new value." Under subsection (e) [subsection (5)], the holder of a purchase-money security interest in inventory is deemed to give "new value" for chattel paper constituting the proceeds of the inventory. Accordingly, the purchase-money secured party may qualify for priority in the chattel paper under subsection (a) or (b) [subsection (1) or (2)], whichever is applicable, even if it does not make an additional advance against the chattel paper.

If a possessory security interest in tangible chattel paper or a perfected-by-control security interest in electronic chattel paper does not qualify for priority under this section, it may be subordinate to a perfected-by-filing security interest under Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)].

4. Possession. The priority afforded by this section turns in part on whether a purchaser "takes possession" of tangible chattel paper. Similarly, the governing law provisions in Section 9-301 [30-9A-301] address both "possessory" and "nonpossessory" security interests. Two common practices have raised particular concerns. First, in some cases the parties create more than one copy or counterpart of chattel paper evidencing a single secured obligation or lease. This practice raises questions as to which counterpart is the "original" and whether it is necessary for a purchaser to take possession of all counterparts in order to "take possession" of the chattel paper. Second, parties sometimes enter into a single "master" agreement. The master agreement contemplates that the parties will enter into separate "schedules" from time to time, each evidencing chattel paper. Must a purchaser of an obligation or lease evidenced by a single schedule also take possession of the master agreement as well as the schedule in order to "take possession" of the chattel paper?

The problem raised by the first practice is easily solved. The parties may in the terms of their agreement and by designation on the chattel paper identify only one counterpart as the original chattel paper for purposes of taking possession of the chattel paper. Concerns about the second practice also are easily solved by careful drafting. Each schedule should provide that it incorporates the terms of the master agreement, not the other way around. This will make it clear that each schedule is a "stand alone" document.

5. Chattel Paper Claimed Merely as Proceeds. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] revises the rule in former Section 9-308(b) [30-9A-308(2)] to eliminate reference to what the purchaser knows. Instead, a purchaser who meets the possession or control, ordinary course, and new value requirements takes priority over a competing security interest unless the chattel paper itself indicates that it has been assigned to an identified assignee other than the purchaser. Thus subsection (a) [subsection (1)] recognizes the common practice of placing a "legend" on chattel paper to indicate that it has been assigned. This approach, under which the chattel paper purchaser who gives new value in ordinary course can rely on possession of unlegended, tangible chattel paper without any concern for other facts that it may know, comports with the expectations of both inventory and chattel paper financers.

6. Chattel Paper Claimed Other Than Merely as Proceeds. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] eliminates the requirement that the purchaser take without knowledge that the "specific paper" is subject to the security interest and substitutes for it the requirement that the purchaser take "without knowledge that the purchase violates the rights of the secured party." This standard derives from the definition of "buyer in ordinary course of business" in Section 1-201(9) [30-1-201(9)]. The source of the purchaser's knowledge is irrelevant. Note, however, that "knowledge" means "actual knowledge." Section 1-201(25) [30-1-201(25)].

In contrast to a junior secured party in accounts, who may be required in some special circumstances to undertake a search under the "good faith" requirement, see Comment 5 to Section 9-331 [30-9A-331], a purchaser of chattel paper under this section is not required as a matter of good faith to make a search in order to determine the existence of prior security interests. There may be circumstances where the purchaser undertakes a search nevertheless, either on its own volition or because other considerations make it advisable to do so, e.g., where the purchaser also is purchasing accounts. Without more, a purchaser of chattel paper who has seen a financing statement covering the chattel paper or who knows that the chattel paper is encumbered with a security interest, does not have knowledge that its purchase violates the secured party's rights. However, if a purchaser sees a statement in a financing statement to the effect that a purchase of chattel paper from the debtor would violate the rights of the filed secured party, the purchaser would have such knowledge. Likewise, under new subsection (f) [subsection (6)], if the chattel paper itself indicates that it had been assigned to an identified secured party other than the purchaser, the purchaser would have wrongful knowledge for purposes of subsection (b) [subsection (2)], thereby preventing the purchaser from qualifying for priority under that subsection, even if the purchaser did not have actual knowledge. In the case of tangible chattel paper, the indication normally would consist of a written legend on the chattel paper. In the case of electronic chattel paper, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] leaves to developing market and technological practices the manner in which the chattel paper would indicate an assignment.

7. Instruments. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] contains a special priority rule for instruments. Under this subsection, a purchaser of an instrument has priority over a security interest perfected by a method other than possession (e.g., by filing, temporarily under Section 9-312(e) or (g) [30-9A-312(5) or (7)], as proceeds under Section 9-315(d) [30-9A-315(4)], or automatically upon attachment under Section 9-309(4) [30-9A-309(4)] if the security interest arises out of a sale of the instrument) if the purchaser gives value and takes possession of the instrument in good faith and without knowledge that the purchase violates the rights of the secured party. Generally, to the extent subsection (d) [subsection (4)] conflicts with Section 3-306 [30-3-306], subsection (d) [subsection (4)] governs. See Section 3-102(b) [30-3-102(2)]. For example, notice of a conflicting security interest precludes a purchaser from becoming a holder in due course under Section 3-302 [30-3-202] and thereby taking free of all claims to the instrument under Section 3-306 [30-3-306]. However, a purchaser who takes even with knowledge of the security interest qualifies for priority under subsection (d) [subsection (4)] if it takes without knowledge that the purchase violates the rights of the holder of the security interest. Likewise, a purchaser qualifies for priority under subsection (d) [subsection (4)] if it takes for "value" as defined in Section 1-201 [30-1-201], even if it does not take for "value" as defined in Section 3-303 [30-3-303].

Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] is subject to Section 9-331(a) [30-9A-331(1)], which provides that Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not limit the rights of a holder in due course under Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Thus, in the rare case in which the purchaser of an instrument qualifies for priority under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], but another person has the rights of a holder in due course of the instrument, the other person takes free of the purchaser's claim. See Section 3-306 [30-3-306].

The rule in subsection (d) [subsection (4)] is similar to the rules in subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)], which govern priority in chattel paper. The observations in Comment 6 concerning the requirement of good faith and the phrase "without knowledge that the purchase violates the rights of the secured party" apply equally to purchasers of instruments. However, unlike a purchaser of chattel paper, to qualify for priority under this section a purchaser of an instrument need only give "value" as defined in Section 1-201 [30-1-201]; it need not give "new value." Also, the purchaser need not purchase the instrument in the ordinary course of its business.

Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] applies to checks as well as notes. For example, to collect and retain checks that are proceeds (collections) of accounts free of a senior secured party's claim to the same checks, a junior secured party must satisfy the good-faith requirement (honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing) of this subsection. This is the same good-faith requirement applicable to holders in due course. See Section 9-331 [30-9A-331], Comment 5.

8. Priority in Proceeds of Chattel Paper. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] sets forth the two circumstances under which the priority afforded to a purchaser of chattel paper under subsection (a) or (b) [subsection (1) or (2)] extends also to proceeds of the chattel paper. The first is if the purchaser would have priority under the normal priority rules applicable to proceeds. The second, which the following Comments discuss in greater detail, is if the proceeds consist of the specific goods covered by the chattel paper. Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] generally was silent as to the priority of a security interest in proceeds when a purchaser qualifies for priority under Section 9-308 [30-9A-308] (but see former Section 9-306(5)(b) [30-9-306(5)(b), now repealed, see 30-9A-315], concerning returned and repossessed goods).

9. Priority in Returned and Repossessed Goods. Returned and repossessed goods may constitute proceeds of chattel paper. The following Comments explain the treatment of returned and repossessed goods as proceeds of chattel paper. The analysis is consistent with that of PEB Commentary No. 5, which these Comments replace, and is based upon the following example:

Example: SP-1 has a security interest in all the inventory of a dealer in goods (Dealer); SP-1's security interest is perfected by filing. Dealer sells some of its inventory to a buyer in the ordinary course of business (BIOCOB) pursuant to a conditional sales contract (chattel paper) that does not indicate that it has been assigned to SP-1. SP-2 purchases the chattel paper from Dealer and takes possession of the paper in good faith, in the ordinary course of business, and without knowledge that the purchase violates the rights of SP-1. Subsequently, BIOCOB returns the goods to Dealer because they are defective. Alternatively, Dealer acquires possession of the goods following BIOCOB's default.

10. Assignment of Non-Lease Chattel Paper.

a. Loan by SP-2 to Dealer Secured by Chattel Paper (or Functional Equivalent Pursuant to Recourse Arrangement).

(1) Returned Goods. If BIOCOB returns the goods to Dealer for repairs, Dealer is merely a bailee and acquires thereby no meaningful rights in the goods to which SP-1's security interest could attach. (Although SP-1's security interest could attach to Dealer's interest as a bailee, that interest is not likely to be of any particular value to SP-1.) Dealer is the owner of the chattel paper (i.e., the owner of a right to payment secured by a security interest in the goods); SP-2 has a security interest in the chattel paper, as does SP-1 (as proceeds of the goods under Section 9-315 [30-9A-315]). Under Section 9-330 [30-9A-330], SP-2's security interest in the chattel paper is senior to that of SP-1. SP-2 enjoys this priority regardless of whether, or when, SP-2 filed a financing statement covering the chattel paper. Because chattel paper and goods represent different types of collateral, Dealer does not have any meaningful interest in goods to which either SP-1's or SP-2's security interest could attach in order to secure Dealer's obligations to either creditor. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (defining "chattel paper" and "goods").

Now assume that BIOCOB returns the goods to Dealer under circumstances whereby Dealer once again becomes the owner of the goods. This would be the case, for example, if the goods were defective and BIOCOB was entitled to reject or revoke acceptance of the goods. See Sections 2-602 [30-2-602] (rejection), 2-608 [30-2-608] (revocation of acceptance). Unless BIOCOB has waived its defenses as against assignees of the chattel paper, SP-1's and SP-2's rights against BIOCOB would be subject to BIOCOB's claims and defenses. See Sections 9-403, 9-404 [30-9A-403 and 30-9A-404]. SP-1's security interest would attach again because the returned goods would be proceeds of the chattel paper. Dealer's acquisition of the goods easily can be characterized as "proceeds" consisting of an "in kind" collection on or distribution on account of the chattel paper. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (definition of "proceeds"). Assuming that SP-1's security interest is perfected by filing against the goods and that the filing is made in the same office where a filing would be made against the chattel paper, SP-1's security interest in the goods would remain perfected beyond the 20-day period of automatic perfection. See Section 9-315(e) [30-9A-315(5)].

Because Dealer's newly reacquired interest in the goods is proceeds of the chattel paper, SP-2's security interest also would attach in the goods as proceeds. If SP-2 had perfected its security interest in the chattel paper by filing (again, assuming that filing against the chattel paper was made in the same office where a filing would be made against the goods), SP-2's security interest in the reacquired goods would be perfected beyond 20 days. See Section 9-315(e) [30-9A-315(5)]. However, if SP-2 had relied only on its possession of the chattel paper for perfection and had not filed against the chattel paper or the goods, SP-2's security interest would be unperfected after the 20-day period. See Section 9-315(e) [30-9A-315(5)]. Nevertheless, SP-2's unperfected security interest in the goods would be senior to SP-1's security interest under Section 9-330(c) [30-9A-330(3)]. The result in this priority contest is not affected by SP-2's acquiescence or non-acquiescence in the return of the goods to Dealer.

(2) Repossessed Goods. As explained above, Dealer owns the chattel paper covering the goods, subject to security interests in favor of SP-1 and SP-2. In Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] parlance, Dealer has an interest in chattel paper, not goods. If Dealer, SP-1, or SP-2 repossesses the goods upon BIOCOB's default, whether the repossession is rightful or wrongful as among Dealer, SP-1, or SP-2, Dealer's interest will not change. The location of goods and the party who possesses them does not affect the fact that Dealer's interest is in chattel paper, not goods. The goods continue to be owned by BIOCOB. SP-1's security interest in the goods does not attach until such time as Dealer reacquires an interest (other than a bare possessory interest) in the goods. For example, Dealer might buy the goods at a foreclosure sale from SP-2 (whose security interest in the chattel paper is senior to that of SP-1); that disposition would cut off BIOCOB's rights in the goods. Section 9-617 [30-9A-617].

In many cases the matter would end upon sale of the goods to Dealer at a foreclosure sale and there would be no priority contest between SP-1 and SP-2; Dealer would be unlikely to buy the goods under circumstances whereby SP-2 would retain its security interest. There can be exceptions, however. For example, Dealer may be obliged to purchase the goods from SP-2 and SP-2 may be obliged to convey the goods to Dealer, but Dealer may fail to pay SP-2. Or, one could imagine that SP-2, like SP-1, has a general security interest in the inventory of Dealer. In the latter case, SP-2 should not receive the benefit of any special priority rule, since its interest in no way derives from priority under Section 9-330 [30-9A-330]. In the former case, SP-2's security interest in the goods reacquired by Dealer is senior to SP-1's security interest under Section 9-330 [30-9A-330].

b. Dealer's Outright Sale of Chattel Paper to SP-2. Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] also applies to a transaction whereby SP-2 buys the chattel paper in an outright sale transaction without recourse against Dealer. Sections 1-201(37), 9-109(a) [30-1-201(37), 30-9A-109(1)]. Although Dealer does not, in such a transaction, retain any residual ownership interest in the chattel paper, the chattel paper constitutes proceeds of the goods to which SP-1's security interest will attach and continue following the sale of the goods. Section 9-315(a) [30-9A-315(1)]. Even though Dealer has not retained any interest in the chattel paper, as discussed above BIOCOB subsequently may return the goods to Dealer under circumstances whereby Dealer reacquires an interest in the goods. The priority contest between SP-1 and SP-2 will be resolved as discussed above; Section 9-330 [30-9A-330] makes no distinction among purchasers of chattel paper on the basis of whether the purchaser is an outright buyer of chattel paper or one whose security interest secures an obligation of Dealer.

11. Assignment of Lease Chattel Paper. As defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102], "chattel paper" includes not only writings that evidence security interests in specific goods but also those that evidence true leases of goods.

The analysis with respect to lease chattel paper is similar to that set forth above with respect to non-lease chattel paper. It is complicated, however, by the fact that, unlike the case of chattel paper arising out of a sale, Dealer retains a residual interest in the goods. See Section 2A-103(1)(q) [30-2A-103(1)(q)] (defining "lessor's residual interest"); In re Leasing Consultants, Inc., 486 F.2d 367 (2d Cir. 1973) (lessor's residual interest under true lease is an interest in goods and is a separate type of collateral from lessor's interest in the lease). If Dealer leases goods to a "lessee in ordinary course of business" (LIOCOB), then LIOCOB takes its interest under the lease (i.e., its "leasehold interest") free of the security interest of SP-1. See Sections 2A-307(3), 2A-103(1)(m) [30-2A-307(3), 30-2A-103(1)(m)] (defining "leasehold interest"), (1)(o) [30-2A-103(1)(o)] (defining "lessee in ordinary course of business"). SP-1 would, however, retain its security interest in the residual interest. In addition, SP-1 would acquire an interest in the lease chattel paper as proceeds. If Dealer then assigns the lease chattel paper to SP-2, Section 9-330 [30-9A-330] gives SP-2 priority over SP-1 with respect to the chattel paper, but not with respect to the residual interest in the goods. Consequently, assignees of lease chattel paper typically take a security interest in and file against the lessor's residual interest in goods, expecting their priority in the goods to be governed by the first-to-file-or-perfect rule of Section 9-322 [30-9A-322].

If the goods are returned to Dealer, other than upon expiration of the lease term, then the security interests of both SP-1 and SP-2 normally would attach to the goods as proceeds of the chattel paper. (If the goods are returned to Dealer at the expiration of the lease term and the lessee has made all payments due under the lease, however, then Dealer no longer has any rights under the chattel paper. Dealer's interest in the goods consists solely of its residual interest, as to which SP-2 has no claim.) This would be the case, for example, when the lessee rescinds the lease or when the lessor recovers possession in the exercise of its remedies under Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A]. See, e.g., Section 2A-525 [30-2A-525]. If SP-2 enjoyed priority in the chattel paper under Section 9-330 [30-9A-330], then SP-2 likewise would enjoy priority in the returned goods as proceeds. This does not mean that SP-2 necessarily is entitled to the entire value of the returned goods. The value of the goods represents the sum of the present value of (i) the value of their use for the term of the lease and (ii) the value of the residual interest. SP-2 has priority in the former, but SP-1 ordinarily would have priority in the latter. Thus, an allocation of a portion of the value of the goods to each component may be necessary. Where, as here, one secured party has a security interest in the lessor's residual interest and another has a priority security interest in the chattel paper, it may be advisable for the conflicting secured parties to establish a method for making such an allocation and otherwise to determine their relative rights in returned goods by agreement.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-309 [30-9-309, now repealed].

2. "Priority." In some provisions, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] distinguishes between claimants that take collateral free of a security interest (in the sense that the security interest no longer encumbers the collateral) and those that take an interest in the collateral that is senior to a surviving security interest. See, e.g., Section 9-317 [30-9A-317]. Whether a holder or purchaser referred to in this section takes free or is senior to a security interest depends on whether the purchaser is a buyer of the collateral or takes a security interest in it. The term "priority" is meant to encompass both scenarios, as it does in Section 9-330 [30-9A-330].

3. Rights Acquired by Purchasers. The rights to which this section refers are set forth in Sections 3-305 and 3-306 [30-3-505 and 30-3-306] (holder in due course), 7-502 [30-7-502] (holder to whom a negotiable document of title has been duly negotiated), and 8-303 [30-8-333] (protected purchaser). The holders and purchasers referred to in this section do not always take priority over a security interest. See, e.g., Section 7-503 [30-7-503] (affording paramount rights to certain owners and secured parties as against holder to whom a negotiable document of title has been duly negotiated). Accordingly, this section adds the clause, "to the extent provided in Articles 3, 7, and 8 [Title 30, chapters 3, 7, and 8]" to former Section 9-309 [30-9-309, now repealed].

4. Financial Assets and Security Entitlements. New subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides explicit protection for those who deal with financial assets and security entitlements and who are immunized from liability under Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. See, e.g., Sections 8-502, 8-503(e), 8-510, 8-511 [30-8-502, 30-8-503(5), 30-8-510, 30-8-511]. The new subsection makes explicit in Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] what is implicit in former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] and explicit in several provisions of Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. It does not change the law.

5. Collections by Junior Secured Party. Under this section, a secured party with a junior security interest in receivables (accounts, chattel paper, promissory notes, or payment intangibles) may collect and retain the proceeds of those receivables free of the claim of a senior secured party to the same receivables, if the junior secured party is a holder in due course of the proceeds. In order to qualify as a holder in due course, the junior must satisfy the requirements of Section 3-302 [30-3-302], which include taking in "good faith." This means that the junior not only must act "honestly" but also must observe "reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing" under the particular circumstances. See Section 9-102(a) [30-9A-102(1)]. Although "good faith" does not impose a general duty of inquiry, e.g., a search of the records in filing offices, there may be circumstances in which "reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing" would require such a search.

Consider, for example, a junior secured party in the business of financing or buying accounts who fails to undertake a search to determine the existence of prior security interests. Because a search, under the usages of trade of that business, would enable it to know or learn upon reasonable inquiry that collecting the accounts violated the rights of a senior secured party, the junior may fail to meet the good-faith standard. See Utility Contractors Financial Services, Inc. v. Amsouth Bank, NA, 985 F.2d 1554 (11th Cir. 1993). Likewise, a junior secured party who collects accounts when it knows or should know under the particular circumstances that doing so would violate the rights of a senior secured party, because the debtor had agreed not to grant a junior security interest in, or sell, the accounts, may not meet the good-faith test. Thus, if a junior secured party conducted or should have conducted a search and a financing statement filed on behalf of the senior secured party states such a restriction, the junior's collection would not meet the good-faith standard. On the other hand, if there was a course of performance between the senior secured party and the debtor which placed no such restrictions on the debtor and allowed the debtor to collect and use the proceeds without any restrictions, the junior secured party may then satisfy the requirements for being a holder in due course. This would be more likely in those circumstances where the junior secured party was providing additional financing to the debtor on an on-going basis by lending against or buying the accounts and had no notice of any restrictions against doing so. Generally, the senior secured party would not be prejudiced because the practical effect of such payment to the junior secured party is little different than if the debtor itself had made the collections and subsequently paid the secured party from the debtor's general funds. Absent collusion, the junior secured party would take the funds free of the senior security interests. See Section 9-332 [30-9A-332]. In contrast, the senior secured party is likely to be prejudiced if the debtor is going out of business and the junior secured party collects the accounts by notifying the account debtors to make payments directly to the junior. Those collections may not be consistent with "reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing."

Whether the junior secured party qualifies as a holder in due course is fact-sensitive and should be decided on a case-by-case basis in the light of those circumstances. Decisions such as Financial Management Services Inc. v. Familian, 905 P.2d 506 (Ariz. App. Div. 1995) (finding holder in due course status) could be determined differently under this application of the good-faith requirement.

The concepts addressed in this Comment are also applicable to junior secured parties as purchasers of instruments under Section 9-330(d) [30-9A-330(4)]. See Section 9-330 [30-9A-330], Comment 7.

30-9A-332. Transfer of money — transfer of funds from deposit account.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Scope of This Section. This section affords broad protection to transferees who take funds from a deposit account and to those who take money. The term "transferee" is not defined; however, the debtor itself is not a transferee. Thus this section does not cover the case in which a debtor withdraws money (currency) from its deposit account or the case in which a bank debits an encumbered account and credits another account it maintains for the debtor.

A transfer of funds from a deposit account, to which subsection (b) [subsection (2)] applies, normally will be made by check, by funds transfer, or by debiting the debtor's deposit account and crediting another depositor's account.

Example 1: Debtor maintains a deposit account with Bank A. The deposit account is subject to a perfected security interest in favor of Lender. Debtor draws a check on the account, payable to Payee. Inasmuch as the check is not the proceeds of the deposit account (it is an order to pay funds from the deposit account), Lender's security interest in the deposit account does not give rise to a security interest in the check. Payee deposits the check into its own deposit account, and Bank A pays it. Unless Payee acted in collusion with Debtor in violating Lender's rights, Payee takes the funds (the credits running in favor of Payee) free of Lender's security interest. This is true regardless of whether Payee is a holder in due course of the check and even if Payee gave no value for the check.

Example 2: Debtor maintains a deposit account with Bank A. The deposit account is subject to a perfected security interest in favor of Lender. At Bank B's suggestion, Debtor moves the funds from the account at Bank A to Debtor's deposit account with Bank B. Unless Bank B acted in collusion with Debtor in violating Lender's rights, Bank B takes the funds (the credits running in favor of Bank B) free from Lender's security interest. See subsection (b) [subsection (2)]. However, inasmuch as the deposit account maintained with Bank B constitutes the proceeds of the deposit account at Bank A, Lender's security interest would attach to that account as proceeds. See Section 9-315 [30-9A-315].

Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] also would apply if, in the example, Bank A debited Debtor's deposit account in exchange for the issuance of Bank A's cashier's check. Lender's security interest would attach to the cashier's check as proceeds of the deposit account, and the rules applicable to instruments would govern any competing claims to the cashier's check. See, e.g., Sections 3-306, 9-322, 9-330, 9-331 [30-3-306, 30-9A-322, 30-9A-330, and 30-9A-331].

If Debtor withdraws money (currency) from an encumbered deposit account and transfers the money to a third party, then subsection (a) [subsection (1)], to the extent not displaced by federal law relating to money, applies. It contains the same rule as subsection (b) [subsection (2)].

Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] applies to transfers of funds from a deposit account; it does not apply to transfers of the deposit account itself or of an interest therein. For example, this section does not apply to the creation of a security interest in a deposit account. Competing claims to the deposit account itself are dealt with by other Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] priority rules. See Sections 9-317(a), 9-327, 9-340, 9-341 [30-9A-317(1), 30-9A-327, 30-9A-340, and 30-9A-341]. Similarly, a corporate merger normally would not result in a transfer of funds from a deposit account. Rather, it might result in a transfer of the deposit account itself. If so, the normal rules applicable to transferred collateral would apply; this section would not.

3. Policy. Broad protection for transferees helps to ensure that security interests in deposit accounts do not impair the free flow of funds. It also minimizes the likelihood that a secured party will enjoy a claim to whatever the transferee purchases with the funds. Rules concerning recovery of payments traditionally have placed a high value on finality. The opportunity to upset a completed transaction, or even to place a completed transaction in jeopardy by bringing suit against the transferee of funds, should be severely limited. Although the giving of value usually is a prerequisite for receiving the ability to take free from third-party claims, where payments are concerned the law is even more protective. Thus, Section 3-418(c) [see 30-3-425] provides that, even where the law of restitution otherwise would permit recovery of funds paid by mistake, no recovery may be had from a person "who in good faith changed position in reliance on the payment." Rather than adopt this standard, this section eliminates all reliance requirements whatsoever. Payments made by mistake are relatively rare, but payments of funds from encumbered deposit accounts (e.g., deposit accounts containing collections from accounts receivable) occur with great regularity. In most cases, unlike payment by mistake, no one would object to these payments. In the vast proportion of cases, the transferee probably would be able to show a change of position in reliance on the payment. This section does not put the transferee to the burden of having to make this proof.

4. "Bad Actors." To deal with the question of the "bad actor," this section borrows "collusion" language from Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]. See, e.g., Sections 8-115, 8-503(e) [30-8-115, 30-8-503(5)]. This is the most protective (i.e., least stringent) of the various standards now found in the UCC. Compare, e.g., Section 1-201(9) [30-1-201(9)] ("without knowledge that the sale . . . is in violation of the . . . security interest"); Section 1-201(19) [30-1-201(19)] ("honesty in fact in the conduct or transaction concerned"); Section 3-302(a)(2)(v) [30-3-302(1)(b)(v)] ("without notice of any claim").

5. Transferee Who Does Not Take Free. This section sets forth the circumstances under which certain transferees of money or funds take free of security interests. It does not determine the rights of a transferee who does not take free of a security interest.

Example 3: The facts are as in Example 2, but, in wrongfully moving the funds from the deposit account at Bank A to Debtor's deposit account with Bank B, Debtor acts in collusion with Bank B. Bank B does not take the funds free of Lender's security interest under this section. If Debtor grants a security interest to Bank B, Section 9-327 [30-9A-327] governs the relative priorities of Lender and Bank B. Under Section 9-327(3) [30-9A-327(3)], Bank B's security interest in the Bank B deposit account is senior to Lender's security interest in the deposit account as proceeds. However, Bank B's senior security interest does not protect Bank B against any liability to Lender that might arise from Bank B's wrongful conduct.

30-9A-333. Priority of certain liens arising by operation of law.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-310 [30-9-310, now repealed].

2. "Possessory Liens." This section governs the relative priority of security interests arising under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] and "possessory liens," i.e., common-law and statutory liens whose effectiveness depends on the lienor's possession of goods with respect to which the lienor provided services or furnished materials in the ordinary course of its business. As under former Section 9-310 [30-9-310, now repealed], the possessory lien has priority over a security interest unless the possessory lien is created by a statute that expressly provides otherwise. If the statute creating the possessory lien is silent as to its priority relative to a security interest, this section provides a rule of interpretation that the possessory lien takes priority, even if the statute has been construed judicially to make the possessory lien subordinate.

30-9A-334. Priority of security interests in fixtures and crops.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-313 [30-9-313, now repealed].

2. Scope of This Section. This section contains rules governing the priority of security interests in fixtures and crops as against persons who claim an interest in real property. Priority contests with other Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] security interests are governed by the other priority rules of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. The provisions with respect to fixtures follow those of former Section 9-313 [30-9-313, now repealed]. However, they have been rewritten to conform to Section 2A-309 [30-2A-309] and to prevailing style conventions. Subsections (i) and (j) [subsections (9) and (10)], which apply to crops, are new.

3. Security Interests in Fixtures. Certain goods that are the subject of personal-property (chattel) financing become so affixed or otherwise so related to real property that they become part of the real property. These goods are called "fixtures." See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (definition of "fixtures"). Some fixtures retain their personal-property nature: a security interest under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] may be created in fixtures and may continue in goods that become fixtures. See subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. However, if the goods are ordinary building materials incorporated into an improvement on land, no security interest in them exists. Rather, the priority of claims to the building materials are determined by the law governing claims to real property. (Of course, the fact that no security interest exists in ordinary building materials incorporated into an improvement on land does not prejudice any rights the secured party may have against the debtor or any other person who violated the secured party's rights by wrongfully incorporating the goods into real property.)

Thus, this section recognizes three categories of goods: (1) those that retain their chattel character entirely and are not part of the real property; (2) ordinary building materials that have become an integral part of the real property and cannot retain their chattel character for purposes of finance; and (3) an intermediate class that has become real property for certain purposes, but as to which chattel financing may be preserved.

To achieve priority under certain provisions of this section, a security interest must be perfected by making a "fixture filing" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]) in the real-property records. Because the question whether goods have become fixtures often is a difficult one under applicable real-property law, a secured party may make a fixture filing as a precaution. Courts should not infer from a fixture filing that the secured party concedes that the goods are or will become fixtures.

4. Priority in Fixtures: General. In considering priority problems under this section, one must first determine whether real-property claimants per se have an interest in the crops or fixtures as part of real property. If not, it is immaterial, so far as concerns real property parties as such, whether a security interest arising under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] is perfected or unperfected. In no event does a real-property claimant (e.g., owner or mortgagee) acquire an interest in a "pure" chattel just because a security interest therein is unperfected. If on the other hand real-property law gives real-property parties an interest in the goods, a conflict arises and this section states the priorities.

5. Priority in Fixtures: Residual Rule. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] states the residual priority rule, which applies only if one of the other rules does not: A security interest in fixtures is subordinate to a conflicting interest of an encumbrancer or owner of the related real property other than the debtor.

6. Priority in Fixtures: First to File or Record. Subsection (e)(1) [subsection (5)(a)], which follows former Section 9-313(4)(b) [30-9-313(4)(b), now repealed], contains the usual priority rule of conveyancing, that is, the first to file or record prevails. In order to achieve priority under this rule, however, the security interest must be perfected by a "fixture filing" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]), i.e., a filing for record in the real property records and indexed therein, so that it will be found in a real-property search.. The condition in subsection (e)(1)(B) [subsection (5)(a)(ii)], that the security interest must have had priority over any conflicting interest of a predecessor in title of the conflicting encumbrancer or owner, appears to limit to the first-in-time principle. However, this apparent limitation is nothing other than an expression of the usual rule that a person must be entitled to transfer what he has. Thus, if the fixture security interest is subordinate to a mortgage, it is subordinate to an interest of an assignee of the mortgage, even though the assignment is a later recorded instrument. Similarly if the fixture security interest is subordinate to the rights of an owner, it is subordinate to a subsequent grantee of the owner and likewise subordinate to a subsequent mortgagee of the owner.

7. Priority in Fixtures: Purchase-Money Security Interests. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)], which follows former Section 9-313(4)(a) [30-9-313(4)(a), now repealed], contains the principal exception to the first-to-file-or-record rule of subsection (e)(1) [subsection (5)(a)]. It affords priority to purchase-money security interests in fixtures as against prior recorded real-property interests, provided that the purchase-money security interest is filed as a fixture filing in the real-property records before the goods become fixtures or within 20 days thereafter. This priority corresponds to the purchase-money priority under Section 9-324(a) [30-9A-324(1)]. (Like other 10-day periods in former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], the 10-day period in this section has been changed to 20 days.)

It should be emphasized that this purchase-money priority with the 20-day grace period for filing is limited to rights against real-property interests that arise before the goods become fixtures. There is no such priority with the 20-day grace period as against real-property interests that arise subsequently. The fixture security interest can defeat subsequent real-property interests only if it is filed first and prevails under the usual conveyancing rule in subsection (e)(1) [subsection (5)(a)] or one of the other rules in this section.

8. Priority in Fixtures: Readily Removable Goods. Subsection (e)(2) [subsection (5)(b)], which derives from Section 2A-309 [30-2A-309] and former Section 9-313(4)(d) [30-9-313(4)(d), now repealed], contains another exception to the usual first-to-file-or-perfect rule. It affords priority to the holders of security interests in certain types of readily removable goods-factory and office machines, equipment that is not primarily used or leased for use in the operation of the real property, and (as discussed below) certain replacements of domestic appliances. This rule is made necessary by the confusion in the law as to whether certain machinery, equipment, and appliances become fixtures. It protects a secured party who, perhaps in the mistaken belief that the readily removable goods will not become fixtures, makes a UCC filing (or otherwise perfects under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]) rather than making a fixture filing.

Frequently, under applicable law, goods of the type described in subsection (e)(2) [subsection (5)(b)] will not be considered to have become part of the real property. In those cases, the fixture security interest does not conflict with a real-property interest, and resort to this section is unnecessary. However, if the goods have become part of the real property, subsection (e)(2) [subsection (5)(b)] enables a fixture secured party to take priority over a conflicting real-property interest if the fixture security interest is perfected by a fixture filing or by any other method permitted by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. If perfection is by fixture filing, the fixture security interest would have priority over subsequently recorded real-property interests under subsection (e)(1) [subsection (5)(a)] and, if the fixture security interest is a purchase-money security interest (a likely scenario), it would also have priority over most real property interests under the purchase-money priority of subsection (d) [subsection (4)]. Note, however, that unlike the purchase-money priority rule in subsection (d) [subsection (4)], the priority rules in subsection (e) [subsection (5)] override the priority given to a construction mortgage under subsection (h) [subsection (8)].

The rule in subsection (e)(2) [subsection (5)(b)] is limited to readily removable replacements of domestic appliances. It does not apply to original installations. Moreover, it is limited to appliances that are "consumer goods" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]) in the hands of the debtor. The principal effect of the rule is to make clear that a secured party financing occasional replacements of domestic appliances in noncommercial, owner-occupied contexts need not concern itself with real-property descriptions or records; indeed, for a purchase-money replacement of consumer goods, perfection without any filing will be possible. See Section 9-309(1) [30-9A-309(1)].

9. Priority in Fixtures: Judicial Liens. Subsection (e)(3) [subsection (5)(c)], which follows former Section 9-313(4)(d) [30-9-313(4)(d), now repealed], adopts a first-in-time rule applicable to conflicts between a fixture security interest and a lien on the real property obtained by legal or equitable proceedings. Such a lien is subordinate to an earlier-perfected security interest, regardless of the method by which the security interest was perfected. Judgment creditors generally are not reliance creditors who search real-property records. Accordingly, a perfected fixture security interest takes priority over a subsequent judgment lien or other lien obtained by legal or equitable proceedings, even if no evidence of the security interest appears in the relevant real-property records. Subsection (e)(3) [subsection (5)(c)] thus protects a perfected fixture security interest from avoidance by a trustee in bankruptcy under Bankruptcy Code Section 544(a), regardless of the method of perfection.

10. Priority in Fixtures: Manufactured Homes. A manufactured home may become a fixture. New subsection (e)(4) [subsection (5)(d)] contains a special rule granting priority to certain security interests created in a "manufactured home" as part of a "manufactured-home transaction" (both defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]). Under this rule, a security interest in a manufactured home that becomes a fixture has priority over a conflicting interest of an encumbrancer or owner of the real property if the security interest is perfected under a certificate-of-title statute (see Section 9-311 [30-9A-311]). Subsection (e)(4) [subsection (5)(d)] is only one of the priority rules applicable to security interests in a manufactured home that becomes a fixture. Thus, a security interest in a manufactured home which does not qualify for priority under this subsection may qualify under another.

11. Priority in Fixtures: Construction Mortgages. The purchase-money priority presents a difficult problem in relation to construction mortgages. The latter ordinarily will have been recorded even before the commencement of delivery of materials to the job, and therefore would take priority over fixture security interests were it not for the purchase-money priority. However, having recorded first, the holder of a construction mortgage reasonably expects to have first priority in the improvement built using the mortgagee's advances. Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] expressly gives priority to the construction mortgage recorded before the filing of the purchase-money security interest in fixtures. A refinancing of a construction mortgage has the same priority as the construction mortgage itself. The phrase "an obligation incurred for the construction of an improvement" covers both optional advances and advances pursuant to commitment. Both types of advances have the same priority under subsection (g) [subsection (7)].

The priority under this subsection applies only to goods that become fixtures during the construction period leading to the completion of the improvement. The construction priority will not apply to additions to the building made long after completion of the improvement, even if the additions are financed by the real-property mortgagee under an open-end clause of the construction mortgage. In such case, subsections (d), (e), and (f) [subsections (4), (5), and (6)] govern.

Although this subsection affords a construction mortgage priority over a purchase-money security interest that otherwise would have priority under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], the subsection is subject to the priority rules in subsections (e) and (f) [subsections (5) and (6)]. Thus, a construction mortgage may be junior to a fixture security interest perfected by a fixture filing before the construction mortgage was recorded. See subsection (e)(1) [subsection (5)(a)].

12. Crops. Growing crops are "goods" in which a security interest may be created and perfected under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. In some jurisdictions, a mortgage of real property may cover crops, as well. In the event that crops are encumbered by both a mortgage and an Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] security interest, subsection (i) [subsection (9)] provides that the security interest has priority. States whose real-property law provides otherwise should either amend that law directly or override it by enacting subsection (j) [subsection (10)].

30-9A-335. Accessions.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-314 [30-9-314, now repealed].

2. "Accession." This section applies to an "accession," as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102], regardless of the cost or difficulty of removing the accession from the other goods, and regardless of whether the original goods have come to form an integral part of the other goods. This section does not apply to goods whose identity has been lost. Goods of that kind are "commingled goods" governed by Section 9-336 [30-9A-336]. Neither this section nor the following one addresses the case of collateral that changes form without the addition of other goods.

3. "Accession" vs. "Other Goods." This section distinguishes among the "accession," the "other goods," and the "whole." The last term refers to the combination of the "accession" and the "other goods." If one person's collateral becomes physically united with another person's collateral, each is an "accession."

Example 1: SP-1 holds a security interest in the debtor's tractors (which are not subject to a certificate-of-title statute), and SP-2 holds a security interest in a particular tractor engine. The engine is installed in a tractor. From the perspective of SP-1, the tractor becomes an "accession" and the engine is the "other goods." From the perspective of SP-2, the engine is the "accession" and the tractor is the "other goods." The completed tractor-tractor cum engine-constitutes the "whole."

4. Scope. This section governs only a few issues concerning accessions. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] contains rules governing continuation of a security interest in an accession. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] contains a rule governing continued perfection of a security interest in goods that become an accession. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] contains a special priority rule governing accessions that become part of a whole covered by a certificate of title. Subsections (e) and (f) [subsections (5) and (6)] govern enforcement of a security interest in an accession.

5. Matters Left to Other Provisions of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]: Attachment and Perfection. Other provisions of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] often govern accession-related issues. For example, this section does not address whether a secured party acquires a security interest in the whole if its collateral becomes an accession. Normally this will turn on the description of the collateral in the security agreement.

Example 2: Debtor owns a computer subject to a perfected security interest in favor of SP-1. Debtor acquires memory and installs it in the computer. Whether SP-1's security interest attaches to the memory depends on whether the security agreement covers it.

Similarly, this section does not determine whether perfection against collateral that becomes an accession is effective to perfect a security interest in the whole. Other provisions of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], including the requirements for indicating the collateral covered by a financing statement, resolve that question.

6. Matters Left to Other Provisions of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]: Priority. With one exception, concerning goods covered by a certificate of title (see subsection (d) [subsection (4)]), the other provisions of this Part, including the rules governing purchase-money security interests, determine the priority of most security interests in an accession, including the relative priority of a security interest in an accession and a security interest in the whole. See subsection (c) [subsection (3)].

Example 3: Debtor owns an office computer subject to a security interest in favor of SP-1. Debtor acquires memory and grants a perfected security interest in the memory to SP-2. Debtor installs the memory in the computer, at which time (one assumes) SP-1's security interest attaches to the memory. The first-to-file-or-perfect rule of Section 9-322 [30-9A-322] governs priority in the memory. If, however, SP-2's security interest is a purchase-money security interest, Section 9-324(a) [30-9A-324(1)] would afford priority in the memory to SP-2, regardless of which security interest was perfected first.

7. Goods Covered by Certificate of Title. This section does govern the priority of a security interest in an accession that is or becomes part of a whole that is subject to a security interest perfected by compliance with a certificate-of-title statute. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides that a security interest in the whole, perfected by compliance with a certificate-of-title statute, takes priority over a security interest in the accession. It enables a secured party to rely upon a certificate of title without having to check the UCC files to determine whether any components of the collateral may be encumbered. The subsection imposes a corresponding risk upon those who finance goods that may become part of goods covered by a certificate of title. In doing so, it reverses the priority that appeared reasonable to most pre-UCC courts.

Example 4: Debtor owns an automobile subject to a security interest in favor of SP-1. The security interest is perfected by notation on the certificate of title. Debtor buys tires subject to a perfected-by-filing purchase-money security interest in favor of SP-2 and mounts the tires on the automobile's wheels. If the security interest in the automobile attaches to the tires, then SP-1 acquires priority over SP-2. The same result would obtain if SP-1's security interest attached to the automobile and was perfected after the tires had been mounted on the wheels.

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Tires Not Accessions: Paccar leased trucks to MPT. MPT entered into an agreement to buy tires from Les Schwab on credit. When MPT defaulted on its purchase agreement, Paccar argued that it had a superior interest to Les Schwab in the tires on the basis that the tires were accessions. The Supreme Court, after examining decisions of other jurisdictions, determined that the tires were not accessions because they could easily be removed from the trucks with no damage to the trucks. Paccar Financial Corp. v. Les Schwab Tire Centers of Mont., Inc., 277 M 171, 920 P2d 977, 53 St. Rep. 652 (1996).

30-9A-336. Commingled goods.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-315 [30-9-315, now repealed].

2. "Commingled Goods." Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] defines "commingled goods." It is meant to include not only goods whose identity is lost through manufacturing or production (e.g., flour that has become part of baked goods) but also goods whose identity is lost by commingling with other goods from which they cannot be distinguished (e.g., ball bearings).

3. Consequences of Becoming "Commingled Goods." By definition, the identity of the original collateral cannot be determined once the original collateral becomes commingled goods. Consequently, the security interest in the specific original collateral alone is lost once the collateral becomes commingled goods, and no security interest in the original collateral can be created thereafter except as a part of the resulting product or mass. See subsection (b) [subsection (2)].

Once collateral becomes commingled goods, the secured party's security interest is transferred from the original collateral to the product or mass. See subsection (c) [subsection (3)]. If the security interest in the original collateral was perfected, the security interest in the product or mass is a perfected security interest. See subsection (d) [subsection (4)]. This perfection continues until lapse.

4. Priority of Perfected Security Interests That Attach Under This Section. This section governs the priority of competing security interests in a product or mass only when both security interests arise under this section. In that case, if both security interests are perfected by operation of this section (see subsections (c) and (d) [subsections (3) and (4)]), then the security interests rank equally, in proportion to the value of the collateral at the time it became commingled goods. See subsection (f)(2) [subsection (6)(b)].

Example 1: SP-1 has a perfected security interest in Debtor's eggs, which have a value of $300 and secure a debt of $400, and SP-2 has a perfected security interest in Debtor's flour, which has a value of $500 and secures a debt of $600. Debtor uses the flour and eggs to make cakes, which have a value of $1000. The two security interests rank equally and share in the ratio of 3:5. Applying this ratio to the entire value of the product, SP-1 would be entitled to $375 (i.e., 3/8 x $1000), and SP-2 would be entitled to $625 (i.e., 5/8 x $1000).

Example 2: Assume the facts of Example 1, except that SP-1's collateral, worth $300, secures a debt of $200. Recall that, if the cake is worth $1000, then applying the ratio of 3:5 would entitle SP-1 to $375 and SP-2 to $625. However, SP-1 is not entitled to collect from the product more than it is owed. Accordingly, SP-1's share would be only $200, SP-2 would receive the remaining value, up to the amount it is owed ($600).

Example 3: Assume that the cakes in the previous examples have a value of only $600. Again, the parties share in the ratio of 3:5. If, as in Example 1, SP-1 is owed $400, then SP-1 is entitled to $225 (i.e., 3/8 x $600), and SP-2 is entitled to $375 (i.e., 5/8 x $600). Debtor receives nothing. If, however, as in Example 2, SP-1 is owed only $200, then SP-2 receives $400.

The results in the foregoing examples remain the same, regardless of whether SP-1 or SP-2 (or each) has a purchase-money security interest.

5. Perfection: Unperfected Security Interests. The rule explained in the preceding Comment applies only when both security interests in original collateral are perfected when the goods become commingled goods. If a security interest in original collateral is unperfected at the time the collateral becomes commingled goods, subsection (f)(1) [subsection (6)(a)] applies.

Example 4: SP-1 has a perfected security interest in the debtor's eggs, and SP-2 has an unperfected security interest in the debtor's flour. Debtor uses the flour and eggs to make cakes. Under subsection (c) [subsection (3)], both security interests attach to the cakes. But since SP-1's security interest was perfected at the time of commingling and SP-2's was not, only SP-1's security interest in the cakes is perfected. See subsection (d) [subsection (4)]. Under subsection (f)(1) and Section 9-322(a)(2) [subsection (6)(a) and 30-9A-322(1)(b)], SP-1's perfected security interest has priority over SP-2's unperfected security interest. If both security interests are unperfected, the rule of Section 9-322(a)(3) [30-9A-322(1)(c)] would apply.

6. Multiple Security Interests. On occasion, a single input may be encumbered by more than one security interest. In those cases, the multiple secured parties should be treated like a single secured party for purposes of determining their collective share under subsection (f)(2) [subsection (6)(b)]. The normal priority rules would determine how that share would be allocated between them. Consider the following example, which is a variation on Example 1 above:

Example 5: SP-1A has a perfected, first-priority security interest in Debtor's eggs. SP-1B has a perfected, second-priority security interest in the same collateral. The eggs have a value of $300. Debtor owes $200 to SP-1A and $200 to SP-1B. SP-2 has a perfected security interest in Debtor's flour, which has a value of $500 and secures a debt of $600. Debtor uses the flour and eggs to make cakes, which have a value of $1000.

For purposes of subsection (f)(2) [subsection (6)(b)], SP-1A and SP-1B should be treated like a single secured party. The collective security interest would rank equally with that of SP-2. Thus, the secured parties would share in the ratio of 3 (for SP-1A and SP-1B combined) to 5 (for SP-2). Applying this ratio to the entire value of the product, SP-1A and SP-1B in the aggregate would be entitled to $375 (i.e., 3/8 x $1000), and SP-2 would be entitled to $625 (i.e., 5/8 x $1000).

SP-1A and SP-1B would share the $300 in accordance with their priority, as established under other rules. Inasmuch as SP-1A has first priority, it would receive $200, and SP-1B would receive $100.

7. Priority of Security Interests That Attach Other Than by Operation of This Section. Under subsection (e) [subsection (5)], the normal priority rules determine the priority of a security interest that attaches to the product or mass other than by operation of this section. For example, assume that SP-1 has a perfected security interest in Debtor's existing and after-acquired baked goods, and SP-2 has a perfected security interest in Debtor's flour. When the flour is processed into cakes, subsections (c) and (d) [subsections (3) and (4)] provide that SP-2 acquires a perfected security interest in the cakes. If SP-1 filed against the baked goods before SP-2 filed against the flour, then SP-1 will enjoy priority in the cakes. See Section 9-322 [30-9A-322] (first-to-file-or-perfect). But if SP-2 filed against the flour before SP-1 filed against the baked goods, then SP-2 will enjoy priority in the cakes to the extent of its security interest.

2. Protection for Buyers and Secured Parties. This section affords protection to certain good-faith purchasers for value who are likely to have relied on a "clean" certificate of title, i.e., one that neither shows that the goods are subject to a particular security interest nor contains a statement that they may be subject to security interests not shown on the certificate. Under this section, a buyer can take free of, and the holder of a conflicting security interest can acquire priority over, a security interest that is perfected by any method under the law of another jurisdiction. The fact that the security interest has been reperfected by possession under Section 9-313 [30-9A-313] does not of itself disqualify the holder of a conflicting security interest from protection under paragraph (2) [subsection (2)].

2. Effect of Incorrect Information in Financing Statement. Section 9-520(a) [30-9A-520(1)] requires the filing office to reject financing statements that do not contain information concerning the debtor as specified in Section 9-516(b)(5) [30-9A-516(2)(e)]. An error in this information does not render the financing statement ineffective. On rare occasions, a subsequent purchaser of the collateral (i.e., a buyer or secured party) may rely on the misinformation to its detriment. This section subordinates a security interest or agricultural lien perfected by an effective, but flawed, financing statement to the rights of a buyer or holder of a perfected security interest to the extent that, in reasonable reliance on the incorrect information, the purchaser gives value and, in the case of tangible collateral, receives delivery of the collateral. A purchaser who has not made itself aware of the information in the filing office with respect to the debtor cannot act in "reasonable reliance" upon incorrect information.

3. Relationship to Section 9-507 [30-9A-507]. This section applies to financing statements that contain information that is incorrect at the time of filing and imposes a small risk of subordination on the filer. In contrast, Section 9-507 [30-9A-507] deals with financing statements containing information that is correct at the time of filing but which becomes incorrect later. Except as provided in Section 9-507 [30-9A-507] with respect to changes in the debtor's name, an otherwise effective financing statement does not become ineffective if the information contained in it becomes inaccurate.

Official Comments

2. Subordination by Agreement. The preceding sections deal elaborately with questions of priority. This section makes it entirely clear that a person entitled to priority may effectively agree to subordinate its claim. Only the person entitled to priority may make such an agreement: a person's rights cannot be adversely affected by an agreement to which the person is not a party.

30-9A-340. Effectiveness of right of recoupment or setoff against deposit account.

Official Comments

1. Source. New; subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is based on a nonuniform Illinois amendment.

2. Set-off vs. Security Interest. This section resolves the conflict between a security interest in a deposit account and the bank's rights of recoupment and set-off.

Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] states the general rule and provides that the bank may effectively exercise rights of recoupment and set-off against the secured party. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] contains an exception: if the secured party has control under Section 9-104(a)(3) [30-9A-104(1)(c)] (i.e., if it has become the bank's customer), then any set-off exercised by the bank against a debt owed by the debtor (as opposed to a debt owed to the bank by the secured party) is ineffective. The bank may, however, exercise its recoupment rights effectively. This result is consistent with the priority rule in Section 9-327(4) [30-9A-327(4)], under which the security interest of a bank in a deposit account is subordinate to that of a secured party who has control under Section 9-104(a)(3) [30-9A-104(1)(c)].

This section deals with rights of set-off and recoupment that a bank may have under other law. It does not create a right of set-off or recoupment, nor is it intended to override any limitations or restrictions that other law imposes on the exercise of those rights.

3. Preservation of Set-Off Right. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] makes clear that a bank may hold both a right of set-off against, and an Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] security interest in, the same deposit account. By holding a security interest in a deposit account, a bank does not impair any right of set-off it would otherwise enjoy. This subsection does not pertain to accounts evidenced by an instrument (e.g., certain certificates of deposit), which are excluded from the definition of "deposit accounts."

30-9A-341. Bank's rights and duties with respect to deposit account.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Free Flow of Funds. This section is designed to prevent security interests in deposit accounts from impeding the free flow of funds through the payment system. Subject to two exceptions, it leaves the bank's rights and duties with respect to the deposit account and the funds on deposit unaffected by the creation or perfection of a security interest or by the bank's knowledge of the security interest. In addition, the section permits the bank to ignore the instructions of the secured party unless it had agreed to honor them or unless other law provides to the contrary. A secured party who wishes to deprive the debtor of access to funds on deposit or to appropriate those funds for itself needs to obtain the agreement of the bank, utilize the judicial process, or comply with procedures set forth in other law. Section 4-303(a) [30-4-303(1)], concerning the effect of notice on a bank's right and duty to pay items, is not to the contrary. That section addresses only whether an otherwise effective notice comes too late; it does not determine whether a timely notice is otherwise effective.

3. Operation of Rule. The general rule of this section is subject to Section 9-340(c) [30-9A-340(3)], under which a bank's right of set-off may not be exercised against a deposit account in the secured party's name if the right is based on a claim against the debtor. This result reflects current law in many jurisdictions and does not appear to have unduly disrupted banking practices or the payments system. The more important function of this section, which is not impaired by Section 9-340 [30-9A-340], is the bank's right to follow the debtor's (customer's) instructions (e.g., by honoring checks, permitting withdrawals, etc.) until such time as the depository institution is served with judicial process or receives instructions with respect to the funds on deposit from a secured party who has control over the deposit account.

4. Liability of Bank. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not determine whether a bank that pays out funds from an encumbered deposit is liable to the holder of a security interest. Although the fact that a secured party has control over the deposit account and the manner by which control was achieved may be relevant to the imposition of liability, whatever rule applies generally when a bank pays out funds in which a third party has an interest would determine liability to a secured party. Often, this rule is found in a non-UCC adverse claim statute.

5. Certificates of Deposit. This section does not address the obligations of banks that issue instruments evidencing deposits (e.g., certain certificates of deposit).

30-9A-342. Bank's right to refuse to enter into or disclose existence of control agreement.

Official Comments

1. Source. New; derived from Section 8-106(g) [30-8-116].

2. Protection for Bank. This section protects banks from the need to enter into agreements against their will and from the need to respond to inquiries from persons other than their customers.

Part Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Good Faith Filing — Effective Against Persons With Knowledge: In a case decided before the 1985 amendments to 30-9-401 (now repealed, see 30-9A-501), a bank that filed its security agreement in livestock in the wrong county did not have a perfected security interest in the livestock but did take precedence over another secured party because the filing was made in good faith and the other secured party had actual knowledge of the security interest. First Nat'l Bank of Glasgow v. First Sec. Bank of Mont., 222 M 118, 721 P2d 1270, 43 St. Rep. 1105 (1986).

Business Equipment for Lease: A trencher held by a leasing business falls into none of the categories for which filing is not required. Since it is business equipment for lease, the perfection of a security interest in the trencher required filing with the Secretary of State. Between two rival security interests, one filed with the Secretary of State on June 19, 1978, and one filed initially with a County Clerk and Recorder on December 13, 1979, and subsequently filed with the Secretary of State on March 13, 1981, the former prevailed. Taylor Rental Corp. v. First Citizens Bank, 539 F. Supp. 228, 39 St. Rep. 985 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Knowledge of Financing Statement — Unidentified Bank Loan: A national leasing company perfected a security interest in after-acquired inventory of its franchisee. Subsequently, a bank incorrectly filed a security interest on the franchisee's trencher that it had financed. The leasing company's knowledge of an unidentified bank loan did not imply it had knowledge of the bank's security interest. Even if it did, the leasing company's security interest would still be prior to the bank's security interest. Taylor Rental Corp. v. First Citizens Bank, 539 F. Supp. 228, 39 St. Rep. 985 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Knowledge of Financing Statement — Confidential Computer Journal Records: A national leasing company provided a computerized accounting service to its franchisees. The information provided to the accounting service was confidential and unavailable to the leasing company without consent of the franchisee. A journal entry of an unidentified bank loan was not evidence of the leasing company's knowledge of a bank's security agreement. Taylor Rental Corp. v. First Citizens Bank, 539 F. Supp. 228, 39 St. Rep. 985 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Security Interest on Livestock: Security interest listing "all livestock" was perfected upon filing of financing statement with County Clerk (prior to 1985 amendment). Failure to adequately describe cattle in notice of security agreement to Livestock Commission would bar superior lien only in action against livestock market for conversion. Batey Land & Livestock Co. v. Nixon, 172 M 99, 560 P2d 1334 (1977).

Forestry and Logging: Forestry and logging are not farming for the purposes of 30-9-401 (now repealed, see 30-9A-501); filing with the Secretary of State is necessary to perfect a security interest on equipment used for that purpose. Belgrade St. Bank v. Elder, 157 M 1, 482 P2d 135 (1971).

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-311 [30-9-311, now repealed].

2. Scope of This Part. This Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 4] deals with several issues affecting third parties (i.e., parties other than the debtor and the secured party). These issues are not addressed in Part 3, Subpart 3 [30-9A-317 through 30-9A-339], which deals with priorities. This Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 4] primarily addresses the rights and duties of account debtors and other persons obligated on collateral who are not, themselves, parties to a secured transaction.

3. Governing Law. There was some uncertainty under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] as to which jurisdiction's law (usually, which jurisdiction's version of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]) applied to the matters that this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 4] addresses. Part 3, Subpart 1 [30-9A-301 through 30-9A-307], does not determine the law governing these matters because they do not relate to perfection, the effect of perfection or nonperfection, or priority. However, it might be inappropriate for a designation of applicable law by a debtor and secured party under Section 1-105 [30-1-105] to control the law applicable to an independent transaction or relationship between the debtor and an account debtor.

Consider an example under Section 9-408 [30-9A-408].

Example 1: State X has adopted this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]; former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] is the law of State Y. A general intangible (e.g., a franchise agreement) between a debtor-franchisee, D, and an account debtor-franchisor, AD, is governed by the law of State Y. D grants to SP a security interest in its rights under the franchise agreement. The franchise agreement contains a term prohibiting D's assignment of its rights under the agreement. D and SP agree that their secured transaction is governed by the law of State X. Under State X's Section 9-408 [30-9A-408], the restriction on D's assignment is ineffective to prevent the creation, attachment, or perfection of SP's security interest. State Y's former Section 9-318(4) [30-9-318(4), now repealed, see 30-9A-404 through 30-9A-406], however, does not address restrictions on the creation of security interests in general intangibles other than general intangibles for money due or to become due. Accordingly, it does not address restrictions on the assignment to SP of D's rights under the franchise agreement. The non-Article-9 [non-Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] law of State Y, which does address restrictions, provides that the prohibition on assignment is effective.

This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not provide a specific answer to the question of which State's law applies to the restriction on assignment in the example. However, assuming that under non-UCC choice-of-law principles the effectiveness of the restriction would be governed by the law of State Y, which governs the franchise agreement, the fact that State X's Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] governs the secured transaction between SP and D would not override the otherwise applicable law governing the agreement. Of course, to the extent that jurisdictions eventually adopt identical versions of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] and courts interpret it consistently, the inability to identify the applicable law in circumstances such as those in the example may be inconsequential.

4. Inalienability Under Other Law. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] addresses the question whether property necessarily is transferable by virtue of its inclusion (i.e., its eligibility as collateral) within the scope of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. It gives a negative answer, subject to the identified exceptions. The substance of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] was implicit under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed].

5. Negative Pledge Covenant. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is an exception to the general rule in subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. It makes clear that in secured transactions under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] the debtor has rights in collateral (whether legal title or equitable) which it can transfer and which its creditors can reach. It is best explained with an example.

Example 2: A debtor, D, grants to SP a security interest to secure a debt in excess of the value of the collateral. D agrees with SP that it will not create a subsequent security interest in the collateral and that any security interest purportedly granted in violation of the agreement will be void. Subsequently, in violation of its agreement with SP, D purports to grant a security interest in the same collateral to another secured party. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] validates D's creation of the subsequent (prohibited) security interest, which might even achieve priority over the earlier security interest. See Comment 7. However, unlike some other provisions of this Part, such as Section 9-406 [30-9A-406], subsection (b) [subsection (2)] does not provide that the agreement restricting assignment itself is "ineffective." Consequently, the debtor's breach may create a default.

6. Rights of Lien Creditors. Difficult problems may arise with respect to attachment, levy, and other judicial procedures under which a debtor's creditors may reach collateral subject to a security interest. For example, an obligation may be secured by collateral worth many times the amount of the obligation. If a lien creditor has caused all or a portion of the collateral to be seized under judicial process, it may be difficult to determine the amount of the debtor's "equity" in the collateral that has been seized. The section leaves resolution of this problem to the courts. The doctrine of marshaling may be appropriate.

7. Sale of Receivables. If a debtor sells an account, chattel paper, payment intangible, or promissory note outright, as against the buyer the debtor has no remaining rights to transfer. If, however, the buyer fails to perfect its interest, then solely insofar as the rights of certain third parties are concerned, the debtor is deemed to retain its rights and title. See Section 9-318 [30-9A-318]. The debtor has the power to convey these rights to a subsequent purchaser. If the subsequent purchaser (buyer or secured lender) perfects its interest, it will achieve priority over the earlier, unperfected purchaser. See Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)].

Transfer of Collateral — Security Interest Follows: The plaintiff's father had the right to transfer to plaintiff his interest in property securing loans by the defendant's bank to the father where the security instrument was perfected and the father was not in default; but the creditor, without knowledge of the transfer and under an agreement containing a "dragnet clause", not having received the proceeds, could consider such a transfer a default. The security interest followed the collateral though the transfer occurred under 30-9-311 (now repealed, see this section). Sturdevant v. First Security Bank, 186 M 91, 606 P2d 525 (1980).

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Oral Notice Sufficient: Plaintiff entered numerous financing arrangements with Tri-Mont. Plaintiff had blanket security interests in Tri-Mont's after-acquired assets. Defendant also financed acquisitions of inventory for Tri-Mont. Defendant filed a purchase money security interest in certain property. Although there was no formal agreement between the parties, they routinely contacted one another prior to financing an item. Upon Tri-Mont's filing a bankruptcy petition, a dispute arose as to whether the defendant's security interest had been properly noticed to plaintiff, thereby giving priority to defendant's interest. Under 30-9-312 (now repealed, see 30-9A-322 through 30-9A-324), prior to perfecting a purchase money security interest, notice must be given to known secured parties. Plaintiff contended this notice had to be in writing. It was held that under the definitions of "notice" and "notifies" in 30-1-201, notice may be given orally, as was the case here. The defendant's oral notification to plaintiff was sufficient to put plaintiff on notice of its intent to perfect a purchase money security interest. Credit Alliance Corp. v. First Nat'l Bank of Missoula, 40 St. Rep. 2095 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 1983) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement). See also First Bank of Billings v. Feterl Mfg. Co., 47 Bankr. 419, 42 St. Rep. 382 (Bankr. 9th Cir. 1985).

Security Interest in Inventory — Subsidiary Corporation Transfers to Parent Corporation: A subsidiary corporation owed money to plaintiff under a contract by which plaintiff sold his business and took a security interest in the subsidiary's inventory to cover the balance due on the purchase price. The subsidiary's parent corporation later guaranteed a bank's loan to the subsidiary. The subsidiary defaulted on the loan, the parent paid it upon request of the bank, and the parent took over from the bank a security interest in the subsidiary's inventory, which the bank was given upon granting the loan. This security interest, both in the hands of the bank and in the hands of the parent, was secondary to plaintiff's security interest, which plaintiff had perfected. The subsidiary corporation then sold its entire inventory and placed the proceeds of the sale in the parent corporation's account. The argument that the parent corporation was not liable to plaintiff for the remainder of the purchase price of plaintiff's business because plaintiff knew of and did not object to the sale of the inventory by the subsidiary and thus waived his security interest could not stand. The parent corporation was simply a secured creditor of the subsidiary with a security interest inferior to plaintiff's. Whether or not plaintiff waived his security interest in the subsidiary's inventory has no bearing on plaintiff's right to the proceeds of the sale by the subsidiary of the subsidiary's inventory, as against competing creditors such as the parent corporation. The plaintiff had priority, to the extent of his security interest, in the proceeds of the sale of the inventory whether or not he consented to the sale. Any consent by plaintiff to the sale affected only his rights as against the purchaser of the inventory, barring him from obtaining possession from the purchaser. As against the parent corporation, the plaintiff's security interest took precedence over the parent corporation's security interest. The same person owned the parent and the subsidiary, and the parent had in fact liquidated the subsidiary and deposited the proceeds in the parent's account. This was very close to a fraudulent transaction in that plaintiff's security interest was violated. Therefore, the parent corporation was secondarily liable to the plaintiff for the balance due on the purchase of his business, the subsidiary being primarily liable. Rudio v. Yellowstone Merchandising Corp., 200 M 537, 652 P2d 1163, 39 St. Rep. 1923 (1982).

Business Equipment for Lease: A trencher held by a leasing business falls into none of the categories for which filing is not required. Since it is business equipment for lease, the perfection of a security interest in the trencher required filing with the Secretary of State. Between two rival security interests, one filed with the Secretary of State on June 19, 1978, and one filed initially with a County Clerk and Recorder on December 13, 1979, and subsequently filed with the Secretary of State on March 13, 1981, the former prevailed. Taylor Rental Corp. v. First Citizens Bank, 539 F. Supp. 228, 39 St. Rep. 985 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Security Interest in Collateral: Where a tractor was sold to a third party in violation of plaintiff's security agreement within the 4-month grace period allowed by Article 9, defendant took the tractor "subject to" plaintiff's security interest. Exch. Bank of Osceola v. Jarrett, 180 M 33, 588 P2d 1006 (1979).

30-9A-403. Agreement not to assert defense against assignee.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-206 [30-9-206, now repealed].

2. Scope and Purpose. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)], like former Section 9-206 [30-9-206, now repealed], generally validates an agreement between an account debtor and an assignor that the account debtor will not assert against an assignee claims and defenses that it may have against the assignor. These agreements are typical in installment sale agreements and leases. However, this section expands former Section 9-206 [30-9-206, now repealed] to apply to all account debtors; it is not limited to account debtors that have bought or leased goods. This section applies only to the obligations of an "account debtor," as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. Thus, it does not determine the circumstances under which and the extent to which a person who is obligated on a negotiable instrument is disabled from asserting claims and defenses. Rather, Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] must be consulted. See, e.g., Sections 3-305, 3-306 [30-3-305, 30-3-306]. Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] governs even when the negotiable instrument constitutes part of chattel paper. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (an obligor on a negotiable instrument constituting part of chattel paper is not an "account debtor").

3. Conditions of Validation; Relationship to Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] validates an account debtor's agreement only if the assignee takes an assignment for value, in good faith, and without notice of conflicting claims to the property assigned or of certain claims or defenses of the assignor. Like former Section 9-206 [30-9-206, now repealed], this section is designed to put the assignee in a position that is no better and no worse than that of a holder in due course of an negotiable instrument under Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]. However, former Section 9-206 [30-9-206, now repealed] left open certain issues, e.g., whether the section incorporated the special Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] definition of "value" in Section 3-303 [30-3-303] or the generally applicable definition in Section 1-201(44) [30-1-201(44)]. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] addresses this question; it provides that "value" has the meaning specified in Section 3-303(a) [30-3-303(1)]. Similarly, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that subsection (b) [subsection (2)] does not validate an agreement with respect to defenses that could be asserted against a holder in due course under Section 9-305(b) [30-9A-305(2)] (the so-called "real" defenses). In 1990, the definition of "holder in due course" (Section 3-302 [30-3-302]) and the articulation of the rights of a holder in due course (Sections 3-305 and 3-306 [30-3-305 , 30-3-306]) were revised substantially. This section tracks more closely the rules of Sections 3-302, 3-305, and 3-306 [30-3-302, 30-3-305, and 30-3-306].

4. Relationship to Terms of Assigned Property. Former Section 9-206(2) [30-9-206(2), now repealed], concerning warranties accompanying the sale of goods, has been deleted as unnecessary. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not regulate the terms of the account, chattel paper, or general intangible that is assigned, except insofar as the account, chattel paper, or general intangible itself creates a security interest (as often is the case with chattel paper). Thus, Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2], and not this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], determines whether a seller of goods makes or effectively disclaims warranties, even if the sale is secured. Similarly, other law, and not this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], determines the effectiveness of an account debtor's undertaking to pay notwithstanding, and not to assert, any defenses or claims against an assignor-e.g., a "hell-or-high-water" provision in the underlying agreement that is assigned. If other law gives effect to this undertaking, then, under principles of nemo dat, the undertaking would be enforceable by the assignee (secured party). If other law prevents the assignor from enforcing the undertaking, this section nevertheless might permit the assignee to do so. The right of the assignee to enforce would depend upon whether, under the particular facts, the account debtor's undertaking fairly could be construed as an agreement that falls within the scope of this section and whether the assignee meets the requirements of this section.

5. Relationship to Federal Trade Commission Rule. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] is new. It applies to rights evidenced by a record that is required to contain, but does not contain, the notice set forth in Federal Trade Commission Rule 433, 16 C.F.R. Part 433 (the "Holder-in-Due-Course Regulations"). Under this subsection, an assignee of such a record takes subject to the consumer account debtor's claims and defenses to the same extent as it would have if the writing had contained the required notice. Thus, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] effectively renders waiver-of-defense clauses ineffective in the transactions with consumers to which it applies.

6. Relationship to Other Law. Like former Section 9-206(1) [30-9-206(1), now repealed], this section takes no position on the enforceability of waivers of claims and defenses by consumer account debtors, leaving that question to other law. However, the reference to "law other than this article [this chapter] "in subsection (e) [subsection (5)] encompasses administrative rules and regulations; the reference in former Section 9-206(1) [30-9-206(1), now repealed] that it replaces ("statute or decision") arguably did not.

This section does not displace other law that gives effect to a non-consumer account debtor's agreement not to assert defenses against an assignee, even if the agreement would not qualify under subsection (b) [subsection (2)]. See subsection (f) [subsection (6)]. It validates, but does not invalidate, agreements made by a non-consumer account debtor. This section also does not displace other law to the extent that the other law permits an assignee, who takes an assignment with notice of a claim of a property or possessory right, a defense, or a claim in recoupment, to enforce an account debtor's agreement not to assert claims and defenses against the assignor (e.g., a "hell-or-high-water" agreement). See Comment 4. It also does not displace an assignee's right to assert that an account debtor is estopped from asserting a claim or defense. Nor does this section displace other law with respect to waivers of potential future claims and defenses that are the subject of an agreement between the account debtor and the assignee. Finally, it does not displace Section 1-107 [30-1-107], concerning waiver of a breach that allegedly already has occurred.

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Assignee Obligated on Contract Claims: Defendant was entitled to receive from plaintiff the value of a combine trade-in awarded on counterclaim, over and above being absolved from making payments on the contract sued on by plaintiff assignee, because the facts and circumstances surrounding plaintiff's acceptance of the contract obligated it to perform the contract upon assignor's failure to do so and subjected it to assignor's indebtedness arising out of the contract. Plaintiff could not avail itself of the protection under 30-9-206 (now repealed, see this section). Massey-Ferguson Credit Corp. v. Brown, 173 M 253, 567 P2d 440 (1977), followed in Topco, Inc. v. St., 275 M 352, 912 P2d 805, 53 St. Rep. 175 (1996).

When Seller's Breach of Oral Contract Is a Valid Defense Against Seller's Assignee: Where assignee's agent was present during seller's oral promise to make repairs to buyer, assignee cannot be considered among those whose protection is contemplated by 30-9-206 (now repealed, see this section) as the assignee did not take assignment without notice of a claim or defense. Massey-Ferguson Credit Corp. v. Brown, 169 M 396, 547 P2d 846 (1976), distinguished with regard to a lack of implied assumption of contractual liabilities in real estate transactions in Davey v. Nessan, 252 M 397, 830 P2d 92, 49 St. Rep. 294 (1992).

30-9A-404. Rights acquired by assignee — claim and defenses against assignee.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-318(1) [30-9-318(1), now repealed].

2. Purpose; Rights of Assignee in General. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)], like former Section 9-318(1) [30-9-318(1), now repealed], provides that an assignee generally takes an assignment subject to defenses and claims of an account debtor. Under subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)], if the account debtor's defenses on an assigned claim arise from the transaction that gave rise to the contract with the assignor, it makes no difference whether the defense or claim accrues before or after the account debtor is notified of the assignment. Under subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)], the assignee takes subject to other defenses or claims only if they accrue before the account debtor has been notified of the assignment. Of course, an account debtor may waive its right to assert defenses or claims against an assignee under Section 9-403 [30-9A-403] or other applicable law. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] tracks Section 3-305(a)(3) [30-9A-305(1)(c)] more closely than its predecessor.

3. Limitation on Affirmative Claims. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is new. It limits the claim that the account debtor may assert against an assignee. Borrowing from Section 3-305(a)(3) [30-9A-305(1)(c)] and cases construing former Section 9-318 [30-9-318, now repealed], subsection (b) [subsection (2)] generally does not afford the account debtor the right to an affirmative recovery from an assignee.

4. Consumer Account Debtors; Relationship to Federal Trade Commission Rule. Subsections (c) and (d) [subsections (3) and (4)] also are new. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] makes clear that the rules of this section are subject to other law establishing special rules for consumer account debtors. An "account debtor who is an individual" as used in subsection (c) [subsection (3)] includes individuals who are jointly or jointly and severally obligated. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] applies to rights evidenced by a record that is required to contain, but does not contain, the notice set forth in Federal Trade Commission Rule 433, 16 C.F.R. Part 433 (the "Holder-in-Due-Course Regulations"). Under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], a consumer account debtor has the same right to an affirmative recovery from an assignee of such a record as the consumer would have had against the assignee had the record contained the required notice.

5. Scope; Application to "Account Debtor." This section deals only with the rights and duties of "account debtors"-and for the most part only with account debtors on accounts, chattel paper, and payment intangibles. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] provides that the obligation of an insurer with respect to a health-care-insurance receivable is governed by other law. References in this section to an "account debtor" include account debtors on collateral that is proceeds. Neither this section nor any other provision of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], including Sections 9-408 and 9-409 [30-9A-408 and 30-9A-409], provides analogous regulation of the rights and duties of other obligors on collateral, such as the maker of a negotiable instrument (governed by Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3]), the issuer of or nominated person under a letter of credit (governed by Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]), or the issuer of a security (governed by Article 8 [Title 30, chapter 8]). Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] leaves those rights and duties untouched; however, Section 9-409 [30-9A-409] deals with the special case of letters of credit. When chattel paper is composed in part of a negotiable instrument, the obligor on the instrument is not an "account debtor," and Article 3 [Title 30, chapter 3] governs the rights of the assignee of the chattel paper with respect to the issues that this section addresses. See, e.g., Section 3-601 [30-3-601] (dealing with discharge of an obligation to pay a negotiable instrument).

Case Notes

Inadequate Notice of Assignment — Escrow Agent Not Liable for Failure to Disburse Funds to Party With No Escrow Rights: Brandts invested in a condominium development corporation, loaning $20,000 to the corporation president. The promissory note exchanged for the loan provided that Brandts would be repaid with interest upon sale of a condominium to a family trust. Sande acted as escrow agent for the closing of the real estate sale and purchase transaction. The corporation president had instructed the title company to repay Brandts upon closing, but later rescinded that instruction, so funds from the purchase of the condominium were disbursed to the corporation and to various creditors instead of to Brandts. When the corporation was later sold, Brandts signed an agreement releasing and discharging their claims against the corporation. Nearly 2 years later, Brandts sued Sande and the title company for negligently and wrongfully applying $20,000 from the escrow account. The District Court summarily dismissed the suit and ordered sanctions against Brandts for filing a frivolous complaint. The court determined that there was neither a valid assignment nor legal notice of an assignment of Brandts' interest in the funds from the closing, so Sande owed no legal duty to Brandts. However, Brandts never asserted an irrevocable interest in the closing proceeds either prior to or during the time that the funds were in Sande's possession, nor did they execute a written assignment to ensure that the repayment instruction would not be rescinded. Under Montana law, an escrow agent or other account debtor must have adequate notice of an assignment before an assignee can hold the agent liable for wrongful payment. The promissory note did not reasonably identify the rights assigned and was thus ineffective. Brandts did not dispute that they were not a party to the escrow agreement, and because Sande had no notice of an assignment of the closing proceeds, he was not liable under an assignment theory. Sande simply fulfilled his fiduciary duty by strictly following the instructions of the principles to the escrow account, which did not assign any funds to Brandts. Summary dismissal was affirmed on grounds that Sande owed no legal duty to Brandts. Brandt v. Sande, 2000 MT 98, 299 M 256, 1 P3d 929, 57 St. Rep. 400 (2000), distinguishing Merchants & Miners Nat'l Bank v. Barnes, 18 M 335, 45 P 218 (1896).

New Agreement and Termination of Escrow by Account Debtor and Assignor: The purpose for the provision requiring notice that payment is to be made to the assignee is to allow for commercial situations where accounts are used as collateral to secure a loan repayment. Borrower in this case retained right to collect account, and assignee's right of collection would ripen only upon default of borrower. Subject to this "indirect collection" situation, the account debtor could not be expected to pay assignee until he had been instructed. The payor and payee in this case could make a new agreement and terminate the escrow account as long as third parties did not intervene. First Fidelity Bank v. Matthews, 214 M 323, 692 P2d 1255, 41 St. Rep. 2502 (1984).

Intent of Section: Plaintiff purchased a truck from defendant under a retail installment sales contract that was subsequently assigned to Ford Motor Credit Company. Plaintiff had problems with the truck that could not be adequately repaired and left the truck with defendant. Plaintiff then filed suit against defendant and the credit company for rescission. Shortly after filing an answer, the credit company reassigned the contract to defendant and moved for summary judgment, which was granted. Plaintiff appealed, alleging that the assignment of the retail installment sales contract imposed full contract liability on the assignee of certain rights under the contract. The court relied on other courts' interpretation of section 9-318 of the U.C.C. (30-9-318, MCA, now repealed, see 30-9A-404 through 30-9A-406). The court held that the intent of 30-9-318 (now repealed, see 30-9A-404 through 30-9A-406) was to allow an account debtor to assert contractual defenses as a setoff. The provisions were not intended, generally, to place the assignee of a contract in the position of being held a guarantor of a product in place of the assignor. The summary judgment was affirmed. Cuchine v. H.O. Bell, Inc., 210 M 312, 682 P2d 723, 41 St. Rep. 1074 (1984).

Assignee Obligated on Contract Claims: Defendant was entitled to receive from plaintiff the value of a combine trade-in awarded on counterclaim, over and above being absolved from making payments on the contract sued on by plaintiff assignee, because the facts and circumstances surrounding plaintiff's acceptance of the contract obligated it to perform the contract upon assignor's failure to do so and subjected it to assignor's indebtedness arising out of the contract. Plaintiff could not avail itself of the protection under 30-9-206 (now repealed, see 30-9A-403). Massey-Ferguson Credit Corp. v. Brown, 173 M 253, 567 P2d 440 (1977), followed in Topco, Inc. v. St., 275 M 352, 912 P2d 805, 53 St. Rep. 175 (1996), and distinguished, with regard to a lack of implied assumption of contractual liabilities in real estate transactions, in Davey v. Nessan, 252 M 397, 830 P2d 92, 49 St. Rep. 294 (1992).

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-318(2) [30-9-318(2), now repealed].

2. Modification of Assigned Contract. The ability of account debtors and assignors to modify assigned contracts can be important, especially in the case of government contracts and complex contractual arrangements (e.g., construction contracts) with respect to which modifications are customary. Subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] provide that good-faith modifications of assigned contracts are binding against an assignee to the extent that (i) the right to payment has not been fully earned or (ii) the right to payment has been earned and notification of the assignment has not been given to the account debtor. Former Section 9-318(2) [30-9-318(2), now repealed] did not validate modifications of fully-performed contracts under any circumstances, whether or not notification of the assignment had been given to the account debtor. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] protects the interests of assignees by (i) limiting the effectiveness of modifications to those made in good faith, (ii) affording the assignee with corresponding rights under the contract as modified, and (iii) recognizing that the modification may be a breach of the assignor's agreement with the assignee.

3. Consumer Account Debtors. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] is new. It makes clear that the rules of this section are subject to other law establishing special rules for consumer account debtors.

4. Account Debtors on Health-Care-Insurance Receivables. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] also is new. It provides that this section does not apply to an assignment of a heath-care-insurance receivable. The obligation of an insurer with respect to a health-care-insurance receivable is governed by other law.

30-9A-406. Discharge of account debtor — notification of assignment — identification and proof of assignment — restrictions on assignment of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, and promissory notes ineffective.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-318(3), (4) [30-9-318(3), (4), now repealed].

2. Account Debtor's Right to Pay Assignor Until Notification. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides the general rule concerning an account debtor's right to pay the assignor until the account debtor receives appropriate notification. The revision makes clear that once the account debtor receives the notification, the account debtor cannot discharge its obligation by paying the assignor. It also makes explicit that payment to the assignor before notification, or payment to the assignee after notification, discharges the obligation. No change in meaning from former Section 9-318 [30-9-318, now repealed] is intended. Nothing in this section conditions the effectiveness of a notification on the identity of the person who gives it. An account debtor that doubts whether the right to payment has been assigned may avail itself of the procedures in subsection (c) [subsection (3)]. See Comment 4.

An effective notification under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] must be authenticated. This requirement normally could be satisfied by sending notification on the notifying person's letterhead or on a form on which the notifying person's name appears. In each case the printed name would be a symbol adopted by the notifying person for the purpose of identifying the person and adopting the notification. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (defining "authenticate").

Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] applies only to account debtors on accounts, chattel paper, and payment intangibles. (Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] defines the term "account debtor" more broadly, to include those obligated on all general intangibles.) Although subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is more precise than its predecessor, it probably does not change the rule that applied under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. Former Section 9-318(3) [30-9-318(3), now repealed] referred to the account debtor's obligation to "pay," indicating that the subsection was limited to account debtors on accounts, chattel paper, and other payment obligations.

3. Limitations on Effectiveness of Notification. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] contains some special rules concerning the effectiveness of a notification under subsection (a) [subsection (1)].

Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] tracks former Section 9-318(3) [30-9-318(3), now repealed] by making ineffective a notification that does not reasonably identify the rights assigned. A reasonable identification need not identify the right to payment with specificity, but what is reasonable also is not left to the arbitrary decision of the account debtor. If an account debtor has doubt as to the adequacy of a notification, it may not be safe in disregarding the notification unless it notifies the assignee with reasonable promptness as to the respects in which the account debtor considers the notification defective.

Subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)], which is new, applies only to sales of payment intangibles. It makes a notification ineffective to the extent that other law gives effect to an agreement between an account debtor and a seller of a payment intangible that limits the account debtor's duty to pay a person other than the seller. Payment intangibles are substantially less fungible than accounts and chattel paper. In some (e.g., commercial bank loans), account debtors customarily and legitimately expect that they will not be required to pay any person other than the financial institution that has advanced funds.

It has become common in financing transactions to assign interests in a single obligation to more than one assignee. Requiring an account debtor that owes a single obligation to make multiple payments to multiple assignees would be unnecessarily burdensome. Thus, under subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)], an account debtor that is notified to pay an assignee less than the full amount of any installment or other periodic payment has the option to treat the notification as ineffective, ignore the notice, and discharge the assigned obligation by paying the assignor. Some account debtors may not realize that the law affords them the right to ignore certain notices of assignment with impunity. By making the notification ineffective at the account debtor's option, subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)] permits an account debtor to pay the assignee in accordance with the notice and thereby to satisfy its obligation pro tanto. Under subsection (g) [subsection (7)], the rights and duties created by subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)] cannot be waived or varied.

4. Proof of Assignment. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] links payment with discharge, as in subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. It follows former Section 9-318(3) [30-9-318(3), now repealed] in referring to the right of the account debtor to pay the assignor if the requested proof of assignment is not seasonably forthcoming. Even if the proof is not forthcoming, the notification of assignment would remain effective, so that, in the absence of reasonable proof of the assignment, the account debtor could discharge the obligation by paying either the assignee or the assignor. Of course, if the assignee did not in fact receive an assignment, the account debtor cannot discharge its obligation by paying a putative assignee who is a stranger. The observations in Comment 3 concerning the reasonableness of an identification of a right to payment also apply here. An account debtor that questions the adequacy of proof submitted by an assignor would be well advised to promptly inform the assignor of the defects.

An account debtor may face another problem if its obligation becomes due while the account debtor is awaiting reasonable proof of the assignment that it has requested from the assignee. This section does not excuse the account debtor from timely compliance with its obligations. Consequently, an account debtor that has received a notification of assignment and who has requested reasonable proof of the assignment may discharge its obligation by paying the assignor at the time (or even earlier if reasonably necessary to avoid risk of default) when a payment is due, even if the account debtor has not yet received a response to its request for proof. On the other hand, after requesting reasonable proof of the assignment, an account debtor may not discharge its obligation by paying the assignor substantially in advance of the time that the payment is due unless the assignee has failed to provide the proof seasonably.

5. Contractual Restrictions on Assignment. Former Section 9-318(4) [30-9-318(4), now repealed] rendered ineffective an agreement between an account debtor and an assignor which prohibited assignment of an account (whether outright or to secure an obligation) or prohibited a security assignment of a general intangible for the payment of money due or to become due. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] essentially follows former Section 9-318(4) [30-9-318(4), now repealed], but expands the rule of free assignability to chattel paper (subject to Sections 2A-303 and 9-407 [30-2A-303 and 30-9A-407]) and promissory notes and explicitly overrides both restrictions and prohibitions of assignment. The policies underlying the ineffectiveness of contractual restrictions under this section build on common-law developments that essentially have eliminated legal restrictions on assignments of rights to payment as security and other assignments of rights to payment such as accounts and chattel paper. Any that might linger for accounts and chattel paper are addressed by new subsection (f) [subsection (6)]. See Comment 6.

Former Section 9-318(4) [30-9-318(4), now repealed] did not apply to a sale of a payment intangible (as described in the former provision, "a general intangible for money due or to become due") but did apply to an assignment of a payment intangible for security. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] continues this approach and also makes subsection (d) [subsection (4)] inapplicable to sales of promissory notes. Section 9-408 [30-9A-408] addresses anti-assignment clauses with respect to sales of payment intangibles and promissory notes.

Like former Section 9-318(4) [30-9-318(4), now repealed], subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides that anti-assignment clauses are "ineffective." The quoted term means that the clause is of no effect whatsoever; the clause does not prevent the assignment from taking effect between the parties and the prohibited assignment does not constitute a default under the agreement between the account debtor and assignor. However, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] does not override terms that do not directly prohibit, restrict, or require consent to an assignment but which might, nonetheless, present a practical impairment of the assignment. Properly read, however, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] reaches only covenants that prohibit, restrict, or require consents to assignments; it does not override all terms that might "impair" an assignment in fact.

Example: Buyer enters into an agreement with Seller to buy equipment that Seller is to manufacture according to Buyer's specifications. Buyer agrees to make a series of prepayments during the construction process. In return, Seller agrees to set aside the prepaid funds in a special account and to use the funds solely for the manufacture of the designated equipment. Seller also agrees that it will not assign any of its rights under the sale agreement with Buyer. Nevertheless, Seller grants to Secured Party a security interest in its accounts. Seller's anti-assignment agreement is ineffective under subsection (d) [subsection (4)]; its agreement concerning the use of prepaid funds, which is not a restriction or prohibition on assignment, is not. However, if Secured Party notifies Buyer to make all future payments directly to Secured Party, Buyer will be obliged to do so under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] if it wishes the payments to discharge its obligation. Unless Secured Party releases the funds to Seller so that Seller can comply with its use-of-funds covenant, Seller will be in breach of that covenant. In the example, there appears to be a plausible business purpose for the use-of-funds covenant. However, a court may conclude that a covenant with no business purpose other than imposing an impediment to an assignment actually is a direct restriction that is rendered ineffective by subsection (d) [subsection (4)].

6. Legal Restrictions on Assignment. Former Section 9-318(4) [30-9-318(4), now repealed], like subsection (d) [subsection (4)] of this section, addressed only contractual restrictions on assignment. The former section was grounded on the reality that legal, as opposed to contractual, restrictions on assignments of rights to payment had largely disappeared. New subsection (f) [subsection (6)] codifies this principle of free assignability for accounts and chattel paper. For the most part the discussion of contractual restrictions in Comment 5 applies as well to legal restrictions rendered ineffective under subsection (f) [subsection (6)].

7. Multiple Assignments. This section, like former Section 9-318 [30-9-318, now repealed], is not a complete codification of the law of assignments of rights to payment. In particular, it is silent concerning many of the ramifications for an account debtor in cases of multiple assignments of the same right. For example, an assignor might assign the same receivable to multiple assignees (which assignments could be either inadvertent or wrongful). Or, the assignor could assign the receivable to assignee-1, which then might re-assign it to assignee-2, and so forth. The rights and duties of an account debtor in the face of multiple assignments and in other circumstances not resolved in the statutory text are left to the common-law rules. See, e.g., Restatement (2d), Contracts §§338(3), 339. The failure of former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] to codify these rules does not appear to have caused problems.

8. Consumer Account Debtors. Subsection (h) [subsection (8)] is new. It makes clear that the rules of this section are subject to other law establishing special rules for consumer account debtors.

9. Account Debtors on Health-Care-Insurance Receivables. Subsection (i) [subsection (9)] also is new. The obligation of an insurer with respect to a health-care-insurance receivable is governed by other law. Section 9-408 [30-9A-408] addresses contractual and legal restrictions on the assignment of a health-care-insurance receivable.

Official Comments

1. Source. Section 2A-303 [30-2A-303].

2. Restrictions on Assignment Generally Ineffective. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1)], as under former Section 2A-303(3) [30-2A-303(3)], a term in a lease agreement which prohibits or restricts the creation of a security interest generally is ineffective. This reflects the general policy of Section 9-406(d) [30-9A-406(4)] and former Section 9-318(4) [30-9-318(4), now repealed, see 30-9A-406]. This section has been conformed in several respects to analogous provisions in Sections 9-406, 9-408, and 9-409 [30-9A-406, 30-9A-408, and 30-9A-409], including the substitution of "ineffective" for "not enforceable" and the substitution of "assignment or transfer of, or the creation, attachment, perfection, or enforcement of a security interest" for "creation or enforcement of a security interest."

3. Exceptions for Certain Transfers and Delegations. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides exceptions to the general ineffectiveness of restrictions under subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. A term that otherwise is ineffective under subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] is effective to the extent that a lessee transfers its right to possession and use of goods or if either party delegates material performance of the lease contract in violation of the term. However, under subsection (c) [subsection (3)], as under former Section 2A-303(3) [30-2A-303(3)], a lessor's creation of a security interest in its interest in a lease contract or its residual interest in the leased goods is not a material impairment under Section 2A-303(4) [30-2A-303(4)] (former Section 2A-303(5) [30-2A-303(5)]), absent an actual delegation of the lessor's material performance. The terms of the lease contract determine whether the lessor, in fact, has any remaining obligations to perform. If it does, it is then necessary to determine whether there has been an actual delegation of "material performance." See Section 2A-303 [30-2A-303], Comments 3 and 4.

30-9A-408. Restrictions on assignment of promissory notes, health-care-insurance receivables, and certain general intangibles ineffective.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Free Assignability. This section makes ineffective any attempt to restrict the assignment of a general intangible, health-care-insurance receivable, or promissory note, whether the restriction appears in the terms of a promissory note or the agreement between an account debtor and a debtor (subsection (a) [subsection (1)]) or in a rule of law, including a statute or governmental rule or regulation (subsection (c) [subsection (3)]). This result allows the creation, attachment, and perfection of a security interest in a general intangible, such as an agreement for the nonexclusive license of software, as well as sales of certain receivables, such as a health-care-insurance receivable (which is an "account"), payment intangible, or promissory note, without giving rise to a default or breach by the assignor or from triggering a remedy of the account debtor or person obligated on a promissory note. This enhances the ability of certain debtors to obtain credit. On the other hand, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] protects the other party-the "account debtor" on a general intangible or the person obligated on a promissory note-from adverse effects arising from the security interest. It leaves the account debtor's or obligated person's rights and obligations unaffected in all material respects if a restriction rendered ineffective by subsection (a) or (c) [subsection (1) or (3)] would be effective under law other than Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A].

Example 1: A term of an agreement for the nonexclusive license of computer software prohibits the licensee from assigning any of its rights as licensee with respect to the software. The agreement also provides that an attempt to assign rights in violation of the restriction is a default entitling the licensor to terminate the license agreement. The licensee, as debtor, grants to a secured party a security interest in its rights under the license and in the computers in which it is installed. Under this section, the term prohibiting assignment and providing for a default upon an attempted assignment is ineffective to prevent the creation, attachment, or perfection of the security interest or entitle the licensor to terminate the license agreement. However, under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], the secured party (absent the licensor's agreement) is not entitled to enforce the license or to use, assign, or otherwise enjoy the benefits of the licensed software, and the licensor need not recognize (or pay any attention to) the secured party. Even if the secured party takes possession of the computers on the debtor's default, the debtor would remain free to remove the software from the computer, load it on another computer, and continue to use it, if the license so permits. If the debtor does not remove the software, other law may require the secured party to remove it before disposing of the computer. Disposition of the software with the computer could violate an effective prohibition on enforcement of the security interest. See subsection (d) [subsection (4)].

3. Nature of Debtor's Interest. Neither this section nor any other provision of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] determines whether a debtor has a property interest. The definition of the term "security interest" provides that it is an "interest in personal property." See Section 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)]. Ordinarily, a debtor can create a security interest in collateral only if it has "rights in the collateral." See Section 9-203(b) [30-9A-203(2)]. Other law determines whether a debtor has a property interest ("rights in the collateral") and the nature of that interest. For example, the nonexclusive license addressed in Example 1 may not create any property interest whatsoever in the intellectual property (e.g., copyright) that underlies the license and that effectively enables the licensor to grant the license. The debtor's property interest may be confined solely to its interest in the promises made by the licensor in the license agreement (e.g., a promise not to sue the debtor for its use of the software).

4. Scope: Sales of Payment Intangibles and Other General Intangibles; Assignments Unaffected by this Section. Subsections (a) and (c) [subsections (1) and (3)] render ineffective restrictions on assignments only "to the extent" that the assignments restrict the "creation, attachment, or perfection of a security interest," including sales of payment intangibles and promissory notes. This section does not render ineffective a restriction on an assignment that does not create a security interest. For example, if the debtor in Comment 2, Example 1 purported to assign the license to another entity that would use the computer software itself, other law would govern the effectiveness of the anti-assignment provisions.

Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] applies to a security interest in payment intangibles only if the security interest arises out of sale of the payment intangibles. Contractual restrictions directed to security interests in payment intangibles which secure an obligation are subject to Section 9-406(d) [30-9A-406(4)]. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] also deals with sales of promissory notes which also create security interests. See Section 9-109(a) [30-9A-109(1)]. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] deals with all security interests in payment intangibles or promissory notes, whether or not arising out of a sale.

Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] does not render ineffective any term, and subsection (c) [subsection (3)] does not render ineffective any law, statute or regulation, that restricts outright sales of general intangibles other than payment intangibles. They deal only with restrictions on security interests. The only sales of general intangibles that create security interests are sales of payment intangibles.

5. Terminology: "Account Debtor"; "Person Obligated on a Promissory Note." This section uses the term "account debtor" as it is defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. The term refers to the party, other than the debtor, to a general intangible, including a permit, license, franchise, or the like, and the person obligated on a health-care-insurance receivable, which is a type of account. The definition of "account debtor" does not limit the term to persons who are obligated to pay under a general intangible. Rather, the term includes all persons who are obligated on a general intangible, including those who are obligated to render performance in exchange for payment. In some cases, e.g., the creation of a security interest in a franchisee's rights under a franchise agreement, the principal payment obligation may be owed by the debtor (franchisee) to the account debtor (franchisor). This section also refers to a "person obligated on a promissory note," inasmuch as those persons do not fall within the definition of "account debtor."

Example 2: A licensor and licensee enter into an agreement for the nonexclusive license of computer software. The licensee's interest in the license agreement is a general intangible. If the licensee grants to a secured party a security interest in its rights under the license agreement, the licensee is the debtor and the licensor is the account debtor. On the other hand, if the licensor grants to a secured party a security interest in its right to payment (an account) under the license agreement, the licensor is the debtor and the licensee is the account debtor. (This section applies to the security interest in the general intangible but not to the security interest in the account, which is not a health-care-insurance receivable.)

6. Effects on Account Debtors and Persons Obligated on Promissory Notes. Subsections (a) and (c) [subsections (1) and (3)] affect two classes of persons. These subsections affect account debtors on general intangibles and health-care-insurance receivables and persons obligated on promissory notes. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] also affects governmental entities that enact or determine rules of law. However, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] ensures that these affected persons are not affected adversely. That provision removes any burdens or adverse effects on these persons for which any rational basis could exist to restrict the effectiveness of an assignment or to exercise any remedies. For this reason, the effects of subsections (a) and (c) [subsections (1) and (3)] are immaterial insofar as those persons are concerned.

Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] does not override terms that do not directly prohibit, restrict, or require consent to an assignment but which might, nonetheless, present a practical impairment of the assignment. Properly read, however, this section, like Section 9-406(d) [30-9A-406(4)], reaches only covenants that prohibit, restrict, or require consents to assignments; it does not override all terms that might "impair" an assignment in fact.

Example 3: A licensor and licensee enter into an agreement for the nonexclusive license of valuable business software. The license agreement includes terms (i) prohibiting the licensee from assigning its rights under the license, (ii) prohibiting the licensee from disclosing to anyone certain information relating to the software and the licensor, and (iii) deeming prohibited assignments and prohibited disclosures to be defaults. The licensee wishes to obtain financing and, in exchange, is willing to grant a security interest in its rights under the license agreement. The secured party, reasonably, refuses to extend credit unless the licensee discloses the information that it is prohibited from disclosing under the license agreement. The secured party cannot determine the value of the proposed collateral in the absence of this information. Under this section, the terms of the license prohibiting the assignment (grant of the security interest) and making the assignment a default are ineffective. However, the nondisclosure covenant is not a term that prohibits the assignment or creation of a security interest in the license. Consequently, the nondisclosure term is enforceable even though the practical effect is to restrict the licensee's ability to use its rights under the license agreement as collateral. The nondisclosure term also would be effective in the factual setting of Comment 2, Example 1. If the secured party's possession of the computers loaded with software would put it in a position to discover confidential information that the debtor was prohibited from disclosing, the licensor should be entitled to enforce its rights against the secured party. Moreover, the licensor could have required the debtor to obtain the secured party's agreement that (i) it would immediately return all copies of software loaded on the computers and that (ii) it would not examine or otherwise acquire any information contained in the software. This section does not prevent an account debtor from protecting by agreement its independent interests that are unrelated to the "creation, attachment, or perfection" of a security interest. In Example 1, moreover, the secured party is not in possession of copies of software by virtue of its security interest or in connection with enforcing its security interest in the debtor's license of the software. Its possession is incidental to its possession of the computers, in which it has a security interest. Enforcing against the secured party a restriction relating to the software in no way interferes with its security interest in the computers.

7. Effect in Assignor's Bankruptcy. This section could have a substantial effect if the assignor enters bankruptcy. Roughly speaking, Bankruptcy Code Section 552 invalidates security interests in property acquired after a bankruptcy petition is filed, except to the extent that the postpetition property constitutes proceeds of prepetition collateral.

Example 4: A debtor is the owner of a cable television franchise that, under applicable law, cannot be assigned without the consent of the municipal franchisor. A lender wishes to extend credit to the debtor, provided that the credit is secured by the debtor's "going business" value. To secure the loan, the debtor grants a security interest in all its existing and after-acquired property. The franchise represents the principal value of the business. The municipality refuses to consent to any assignment for collateral purposes. If other law were given effect, the security interest in the franchise would not attach; and if the debtor were to enter bankruptcy and sell the business, the secured party would receive but a fraction of the business's value. Under this section, however, the security interest would attach to the franchise. As a result, the security interest would attach to the proceeds of any sale of the franchise while a bankruptcy is pending. However, this section would protect the interests of the municipality by preventing the secured party from enforcing its security interest to the detriment of the municipality.

8. Effect Outside of Bankruptcy. The principal effects of this section will take place outside of bankruptcy. Compared to the relatively few debtors that enter bankruptcy, there are many more that do not. By making available previously unavailable property as collateral, this section should enable debtors to obtain additional credit. For purposes of determining whether to extend credit, under some circumstances a secured party may ascribe value to the collateral to which its security interest has attached, even if this section precludes the secured party from enforcing the security interest without the agreement of the account debtor or person obligated on the promissory note. This may be the case where the secured party sees a likelihood of obtaining that agreement in the future. This may also be the case where the secured party anticipates that the collateral will give rise to a type of proceeds as to which this section would not apply.

Example 5: Under the facts of Example 4, the debtor does not enter bankruptcy. Perhaps in exchange for a fee, the municipality agrees that the debtor may transfer the franchise to a buyer. As consideration for the transfer, the debtor receives from the buyer its check for part of the purchase price and its promissory note for the balance. The security interest attaches to the check and promissory note as proceeds. See Section 9-315(a)(2) [30-9A-315(1)(b)]. This section does not apply to the security interest in the check, which is not a promissory note, health-care-insurance receivable, or general intangible. Nor does it apply to the security interest in the promissory note, inasmuch as it was not sold to the secured party.

9. Contrary Federal Law. This section does not override federal law to the contrary. However, it does reflect an important policy judgment that should provide a template for future federal law reforms.

30-9A-409. Restrictions on assignment of letter-of-credit rights ineffective.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Purpose and Relevance. This section, patterned on Section 9-408 [30-9A-408], limits the effectiveness of attempts to restrict the creation, attachment, or perfection of a security interest in letter-of-credit rights, whether the restriction appears in the letter of credit or a rule of law, custom, or practice applicable to the letter of credit. It protects the creation, attachment, and perfection of a security interest while preventing these events from giving rise to a default or breach by the assignor or from triggering a remedy or defense of the issuer or other person obligated on a letter of credit. Letter-of-credit rights are a type of supporting obligation. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. Under Sections 9-203 and 9-308 [30-9A-203 and 30-9A-308], a security interest in a supporting obligation attaches and is perfected automatically if the security interest in the supported obligation attaches and is perfected. See Section 9-107 [30-9A-107], Comment 5. The automatic attachment and perfection under Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] would be anomalous or misleading if, under other law (e.g., Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5]), a restriction on transfer or assignment were effective to block attachment and perfection.

3. Relationship to Letter-of-Credit Law. Although restrictions on an assignment of a letter of credit are ineffective to prevent creation, attachment, and perfection of a security interest, subsection (b) [subsection (2)] protects the issuer and other parties from any adverse effects of the security interest by preserving letter-of-credit law and practice that limits the right of a beneficiary to transfer its right to draw or otherwise demand performance (Section 5-112 [see 30-8-128]) and limits the obligation of an issuer or nominated person to recognize a beneficiary's assignment of letter-of-credit proceeds (Section 5-114 [30-5-134]). Thus, this section's treatment of letter-of-credit rights differs from this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] treatment of instruments and investment property. Moreover, under Section 9-109(c)(4) [30-9A-109(3)(d)], this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not apply to the extent that the rights of a transferee beneficiary or nominated person are independent and superior under Section 5-114 [30-5-134], thereby preserving the "independence principle" of letter-of-credit law.

Part Compiler's Comments

Saving Clause: Section 169, Ch. 305, L. 1999, provided: "(1) Except as otherwise provided in [sections 164 through 169] [sections 162 through 167—30-9A-703 through 30-9A-706, 30-9A-708, and 30-9A-709], [this act] applies to a transaction or lien within its scope, even if the transaction or lien was entered into or created before [this act] takes effect.

(2) Except as otherwise provided in subsection (3) and [sections 164 through 169] [sections 162 through 167—30-9A-703 through 30-9A-706, 30-9A-708, and 30-9A-709]:

(a) transactions and liens that were not governed by [former chapter 9, now repealed] were validly entered into or created before [this act] takes effect and would be subject to [this act] if they had been entered into or created after [this act] takes effect, and the rights, duties, and interests flowing from those transactions and liens remain valid after [this act] takes effect; and

(b) the transactions and liens may be terminated, completed, consummated, or enforced as required or permitted by [this act] or by the law that otherwise would apply if [this act] did not take effect.

(3) [This act] does not affect an action, case, or proceeding commenced before [this act] takes effect."

30-9A-501. Filing office.

Official Comments

1. Source. Derived from former Section 9-401 [30-9-401, now repealed].

2. Where to File. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] indicates where in a given State a financing statement is to be filed. Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] afforded each State three alternative approaches, depending on the extent to which the State desires central filing (usually with the Secretary of State), local filing (usually with a county office), or both. As Comment 1 to former Section 9-401 [30-9-401, now repealed] observed, "The principal advantage of state-wide filing is ease of access to the credit information which the files exist to provide. Consider for example the national distributor who wishes to have current information about the credit standing of the thousands of persons he sells to on credit. The more completely the files are centralized on a state-wide basis, the easier and cheaper it becomes to procure credit information; the more the files are scattered in local filing units, the more burdensome and costly." Local filing increases the net costs of secured transactions also by increasing uncertainty and the number of required filings. Any benefit that local filing may have had in the 1950's is now insubstantial. Accordingly, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] dictates central filing for most situations, while retaining local filing for real-estate-related collateral and special filing provisions for transmitting utilities.

3. Minerals and Timber. Under subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)], a filing in the office where a record of a mortgage on the related real property would be filed will perfect a security interest in as-extracted collateral. Inasmuch as the security interest does not attach until extraction, the filing continues to be effective after extraction. A different result occurs with respect to timber to be cut, however. Unlike as-extracted collateral, standing timber may be goods before it is cut. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (defining "goods"). Once cut, however, it is no longer timber to be cut, and the filing in the real-property-mortgage office ceases to be effective. The timber then becomes ordinary goods, and filing in the office specified in subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] is necessary for perfection. Note also that after the timber is cut the law of the debtor's location, not the location of the timber, governs perfection under Section 9-301 [30-9A-301].

4. Fixtures. There are two ways in which a secured party may file a financing statement to perfect a security interest in goods that are or are to become fixtures. It may file in the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] records, as with most other goods. See subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)]. Or it may file the financing statement as a "fixture filing," defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102], in the office in which a record of a mortgage on the related real property would be filed. See subsection (a)(1)(B) [subsection (1)(a)(ii)].

5. Transmitting Utilities. The usual filing rules do not apply well for a transmitting utility (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]). Many pre-UCC statutes provided special filing rules for railroads and in some cases for other public utilities, to avoid the requirements for filing with legal descriptions in every county in which such debtors had property. Former Section 9-401(5) [30-9-401(5), now repealed] recreated and broadened these provisions, and subsection (b) [subsection (2)] follows this approach. The nature of the debtor will inform persons searching the record as to where to make a search.

30-9A-502. Contents of financing statement — mortgage as financing statement — time of filing financing statement.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-402(1), (5), (6) [30-9-402(1), (5), (6), now repealed].

2. "Notice Filing." This section adopts the system of "notice filing." What is required to be filed is not, as under pre-UCC chattel mortgage and conditional sales acts, the security agreement itself, but only a simple record providing a limited amount of information (financing statement). The financing statement may be filed before the security interest attaches or thereafter. See subsection (d) [subsection (4)]. See also Section 9-308(a) [30-9A-308(1)] (contemplating situations in which a financing statement is filed before a security interest attaches).

The notice itself indicates merely that a person may have a security interest in the collateral indicated. Further inquiry from the parties concerned will be necessary to disclose the complete state of affairs. Section 9-210 [30-9A-210] provides a statutory procedure under which the secured party, at the debtor's request, may be required to make disclosure. However, in many cases, information may be forthcoming without the need to resort to the formalities of that section.

Notice filing has proved to be of great use in financing transactions involving inventory, accounts, and chattel paper, because it obviates the necessity of refiling on each of a series of transactions in a continuing arrangement under which the collateral changes from day to day. However, even in the case of filings that do not necessarily involve a series of transactions (e.g., a loan secured by a single item of equipment), a financing statement is effective to encompass transactions under a security agreement not in existence and not contemplated at the time the notice was filed, if the indication of collateral in the financing statement is sufficient to cover the collateral concerned. Similarly, a financing statement is effective to cover after-acquired property of the type indicated and to perfect with respect to future advances under security agreements, regardless of whether after-acquired property or future advances are mentioned in the financing statement and even if not in the contemplation of the parties at the time the financing statement was authorized to be filed.

3. Debtor's Signature; Required Authorization. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] sets forth the simple formal requirements for an effective financing statement. These requirements are: (1) the debtor's name; (2) the name of a secured party or representative of the secured party; and (3) an indication of the collateral.

Whereas former Section 9-402(1) [30-9-402(1), now repealed] required the debtor's signature to appear on a financing statement, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] contains no signature requirement. The elimination of the signature requirement facilitates paperless filing. (However, as PEB Commentary No. 15 indicates, a paperless financing statement was sufficient under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed].) Elimination of the signature requirement also makes the exceptions provided by former Section 9-402(2) [30-9-402(2), now repealed] unnecessary.

The fact that this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not require that an authenticating symbol be contained in the public record does not mean that all filings are authorized. Rather, Section 9-509(a) [30-9A-509(1)] entitles a person to file an initial financing statement, an amendment that adds collateral, or an amendment that adds a debtor only if the debtor authorizes the filing, and Section 9-509(d) [30-9A-509(4)] entitles a person other than the debtor to file a termination statement only if the secured party of record authorizes the filing. Of course, a filing has legal effect only to the extent it is authorized. See Section 9-510 [30-9A-510].

Law other than this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], including the law with respect to ratification of past acts, generally determines whether a person has the requisite authority to file a record under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. See Section 1-103 [30-1-103]. However, under Section 9-509(b) [30-9A-509(2)], the debtor's authentication of (or becoming bound by) a security agreement ipso facto constitutes the debtor's authorization of the filing of a financing statement covering the collateral described in the security agreement. The secured party need not obtain a separate authorization.

Section 9-625 [30-9A-625] provides a remedy for unauthorized filings. Making an unauthorized filing also may give rise to civil or criminal liability under other law. In addition, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] contains provisions that assist in the discovery of unauthorized filings and the amelioration of their practical effect. For example, Section 9-518 [30-9A-518] provides a procedure whereby a person may add to the public record a statement to the effect that a financing statement indexed under the person's name was wrongfully filed, and Section 9-509(d) [30-9A-509(4)] entitles any person to file a termination statement if the secured party of record fails to comply with its obligation to file or send one to the debtor, the debtor authorizes the filing, and the termination statement so indicates. However, the filing office is neither obligated nor permitted to inquire into issues of authorization. See Section 9-520(a) [30-9A-520(1)].

4. Certain Other Requirements. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] deletes other provisions of former Section 9-402(1) [30-9-402(1), now repealed] because they seems unwise (real-property description for financing statements covering crops), unnecessary (adequacy of copies of financing statements), or both (copy of security agreement as financing statement). In addition, the filing office must reject a financing statement lacking certain other information formerly required as a condition of perfection (e.g., an address for the debtor or secured party). See Sections 9-516(b), 9-520(a) [30-9A-516(2) and 30-9A-520(1)]. However, if the filing office accepts the record, it is effective nevertheless. See Section 9-520(c) [30-9A-520(3)].

5. Real-Property-Related Filings. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] contains the requirements for financing statements filed as fixture filings and financing statements covering timber to be cut or minerals and minerals-related accounts constituting as-extracted collateral. A description of the related real property must be sufficient to reasonably identify it. See Section 9-108 [30-9A-108]. This formulation rejects the view that the real property description must be by metes and bounds, or otherwise conforming to traditional real-property practice in conveyancing, but, of course, the incorporation of such a description by reference to the recording data of a deed, mortgage or other instrument containing the description should suffice under the most stringent standards. The proper test is that a description of real property must be sufficient so that the financing statement will fit into the real-property search system and be found by a real-property searcher. Under the optional language in subsection (b)(3) [subsection (2)(c)], the test of adequacy of the description is whether it would be adequate in a record of a mortgage of the real property. As suggested in the Legislative Note, more detail may be required if there is a tract indexing system or a land registration system.

If the debtor does not have an interest of record in the real property, a real-property-related financing statement must show the name of a record owner, and Section 9-519(d) [30-9A-519(4)] requires the financing statement to be indexed in the name of that owner. This requirement also enables financing statements covering as-extracted collateral or timber to be cut and financing statements filed as fixture filings to fit into the real-property search system.

6. Record of Mortgage Effective as Financing Statement. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] explains when a record of a mortgage is effective as a financing statement filed as a fixture filing or to cover timber to be cut or as-extracted collateral. Use of the term "record of a mortgage" recognizes that in some systems the record actually filed is not the record pursuant to which a mortgage is created. Moreover, "mortgage" is defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] as an "interest in real property," not as the record that creates or evidences the mortgage or the record that is filed in the public recording systems. A record creating a mortgage may also create a security interest with respect to fixtures (or other goods) in conformity with this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. A single agreement creating a mortgage on real property and a security interest in chattels is common and useful for certain purposes. Under subsection (c) [subsection (3)], the recording of the record evidencing a mortgage (if it satisfies the requirements for a financing statement) constitutes the filing of a financing statement as to the fixtures (but not, of course, as to other goods). Section 9-515(g) [30-9A-515(7)] makes the usual five-year maximum life for financing statements inapplicable to mortgages that operate as fixture filings under Section 9-502(c) [30-9A-502(3)]. Such mortgages are effective for the duration of the real-property recording.

Of course, if a combined mortgage covers chattels that are not fixtures, a regular financing statement filing is necessary with respect to the chattels, and subsection (c) [subsection (3)] is inapplicable. Likewise, a financing statement filed as a "fixture filing"is not effective to perfect a security interest in personal property other than fixtures.

In some cases it may be difficult to determine whether goods are or will become fixtures. Nothing in this Part prohibits the filing of a "precautionary" fixture filing, which would provide protection in the event goods are determined to be fixtures. The fact of filing should not be a factor in the determining whether goods are fixtures. Cf. Section 9-505(b) [30-9A-505(2)].

This security agreement did not give the secured party a prior perfected security interest in the debtor's cattle that were purchased with a later loan from another bank and pastured in another location. 30-9A-503. Name of debtor and secured party.

Official Comments

1. Source. Subsections (a)(4)(A), (b), and (c) [subsections (1)(d)(i), (2), and (3)] derive from former Section 9-402(7) [30-9-402(7), now repealed]; otherwise, new.

2. Debtor's Name. The requirement that a financing statement provide the debtor's name is particularly important. Financing statements are indexed under the name of the debtor, and those who wish to find financing statements search for them under the debtor's name. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] explains what the debtor's name is for purposes of a financing statement. If the debtor is a "registered organization" (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] so as to ordinarily include corporations, limited partnerships, and limited liability companies), then the debtor's name is the name shown on the public records of the debtor's "jurisdiction of organization" (also defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]). Subsections (a)(2) and (a)(3) [subsections (1)(b) and (1)(c)] contain special rules for decedent's estates and common-law trusts. (Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] applies to business trusts that are registered organizations.)

Subsection (a)(4)(A) [subsection (1)(d)(i)] essentially follows the first sentence of former Section 9-402(7) [30-9-402(7), now repealed]. Section 1-201(28) [30-1-201(28)] defines the term "organization," which appears in subsection (a)(4) [subsection (1)(d)], very broadly, to include all legal and commercial entities as well as associations that lack the status of a legal entity. Thus, the term includes corporations, partnerships of all kinds, business trusts, limited liability companies, unincorporated associations, personal trusts, governments, and estates. If the organization has a name, that name is the correct name to put on a financing statement. If the organization does not have a name, then the financing statement should name the individuals or other entities who comprise the organization.

Together with subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)], subsection (a) [subsection (1)] reflects the view prevailing under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] that the actual individual or organizational name of the debtor on a financing statement is both necessary and sufficient, whether or not the financing statement provides trade or other names of the debtor and, if the debtor has a name, whether or not the financing statement provides the names of the partners, members, or associates who comprise the debtor.

Note that, even if the name provided in an initial financing statement is correct, the filing office nevertheless must reject the financing statement if it does not identify an individual debtor's last name (e.g., if it is not clear whether the debtor's name is Perry Mason or Mason Perry). See Section 9-516(b)(3)(C) [30-9A-516(2)(c)(iii)].

3. Secured Party's Name. New subsection (d) [subsection (4)] makes clear that when the secured party is a representative, a financing statement is sufficient if it names the secured party, whether or not it indicates any representative capacity. Similarly, a financing statement that names a representative of the secured party is sufficient, even if it does not indicate the representative capacity.

Example: Debtor creates a security interest in favor of Bank X, Bank Y, and Bank Z, but not to their representative, the collateral agent (Bank A). The collateral agent is not itself a secured party. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. Under Sections 9-502(a) and 9-503(d) [30-9A-502(1) and 30-9A-503(4)], however, a financing statement is effective if it names as secured party Bank A and not the actual secured parties, even if it omits Bank A's representative capacity. Each person whose name is provided in an initial financing statement as the name of the secured party or representative of the secured party is a secured party of record. See Section 9-511 [30-9A-511].

4. Multiple Names. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] makes explicit what is implicit under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]: a financing statement may provide the name of more than one debtor and secured party. See Section 1-102(5)(a) [30-1-102(5)(a)] (words in the singular include the plural). With respect to records relating to more than one debtor, see Section 9-520(d) [30-9A-520(4)]. With respect to financing statements providing the name of more than one secured party, see Sections 9-509(e) and 9-510(b) [30-9A-509(5) and 30-9A-510(2)].

30-9A-504. Indication of collateral.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-402(1) [30-9-402(1), now repealed].

2. Indication of Collateral. To comply with Section 9-502(a) [30-9A-502(1)], a financing statement must "indicate" the collateral it covers. This section explains what suffices for an indication.

Paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] provides that a "description" of the collateral (as the term is explained in Section 9-108 [30-9A-108]) suffices as an indication for purposes of the sufficiency of a financing statement.

Debtors sometimes create a security interest in all, or substantially all, of their assets. To accommodate this practice, paragraph (2) [subsection (2)] expands the class of sufficient collateral references to embrace "an indication that the financing statement covers all assets or all personal property." If the property in question belongs to the debtor and is personal property, any searcher will know that the property is covered by the financing statement. Of course, regardless of its breadth, a financing statement has no effect with respect to property indicated but to which a security interest has not attached. Note that a broad statement of this kind (e.g., "all debtor's personal property") would not be a sufficient "description" for purposes of a security agreement. See Sections 9-203(b)(3)(A), 9-108 [30-9A-203(2)(c)(i) and 30-9A-108]. It follows that a somewhat narrower description than "all assets," e.g., "all assets other than automobiles," is sufficient for purposes of this section, even if it does not suffice for purposes of a security agreement.

30-9A-505. Filing and compliance with other statutes and treaties for consignments, leases, bailments, and other transactions.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-408 [now repealed].

2. Precautionary Filing. Occasionally, doubts arise concerning whether a transaction creates a relationship to which this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] or its filing provisions apply. For example, questions may arise over whether a "lease" of equipment in fact creates a security interest or whether the "sale" of payment intangibles in fact secures an obligation, thereby requiring action to perfect the security interest. This section, which derives from former Section 9-408 [now repealed], affords the option of filing of a financing statement with appropriate changes of terminology but without affecting the substantive question of classification of the transaction.

3. Changes from Former Section 9-408 [now repealed]. This section expands the rule of Section 9-408 [30-9A-408] to embrace more generally other bailments and transactions, as well as sales transactions, primarily sales of payment intangibles and promissory notes. It provides the same benefits for compliance with a statute or treaty described in Section 9-311(a) [30-9A-311(1)] that former Section 9-408 [now repealed] provided for filing, in connection with the use of terms such as "lessor," "consignor," etc. The references to "owner" and "registered owner" are intended to address, for example, the situation where a putative lessor is the registered owner of an automobile covered by a certificate of title and the transaction is determined to create a security interest. Although this section provides that the security interest is perfected, the relevant certificate-of-title statute may expressly provide to the contrary or may be ambiguous. If so, it may be necessary or advisable to amend the certificate-of-title statute to ensure that perfection of the security interest will be achieved.

As does Section 1-201 [30-1-201], former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] referred to transactions, including leases and consignments, "intended as security." This misleading phrase created the erroneous impression that the parties to a transaction can dictate how the law will classify it (e.g., as a bailment or as a security interest) and thus affect the rights of third parties. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] deletes the phrase wherever it appears. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] expresses the principle more precisely by referring to a security interest that "secures an obligation."

4. Consignments. Although a "true" consignment is a bailment, the filing and priority provisions of former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] applied to "true" consignments. See former Sections 2-326(3), 9-114 [30-2-326(3), 30-9-114, now repealed]. A consignment "intended as security" created a security interest that was in all respects subject to former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] subsumes most true consignments under the rubric of "security interest." See Sections 9-102 [30-9A-102] (definition of "consignment"), 9-109(a)(4) [30-9A-109(1)(d)], 1-201(37) [30-1-201(37)] (definition of "security interest"). Nevertheless, it maintains the distinction between a (true) "consignment," as to which only certain aspects of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] apply, and a so-called consignment that actually "secures an obligation," to which Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] applies in full. The revisions to this section reflect the change in terminology.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-402(8) [30-9-402(8), now repealed].

2. Errors. Like former Section 9-402(8) [30-9-402(8), now repealed], subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is in line with the policy of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] to simplify formal requisites and filing requirements. It is designed to discourage the fanatical and impossibly refined reading of statutory requirements in which courts occasionally have indulged themselves. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides the standard applicable to indications of collateral. Subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)], which are new, concern the effectiveness of financing statements in which the debtor's name is incorrect. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] contains the general rule: a financing statement that fails sufficiently to provide the debtor's name in accordance with Section 9-503(a) [30-9A-503(1)] is seriously misleading as a matter of law. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides an exception: If the financing statement nevertheless would be discovered in a search under the debtor's correct name, using the filing office's standard search logic, if any, then as a matter of law the incorrect name does not make the financing statement seriously misleading. A financing statement that is seriously misleading under this section is ineffective even if it is disclosed by (i) using a search logic other than that of the filing office to search the official records, or (ii) using the filing office's standard search logic to search a data base other than that of the filing office.

In addition to requiring the debtor's name and an indication of the collateral, Section 9-502(a) [30-9A-502(1)] requires a financing statement to provide the name of the secured party or a representative of the secured party. Inasmuch as searches are not conducted under the secured party's name, and no filing is needed to continue the perfected status of security interest after it is assigned, an error in the name of the secured party or its representative will not be seriously misleading. However, in an appropriate case, an error of this kind may give rise to an estoppel in favor of a particular holder of a conflicting claim to the collateral. See Section 1-103 [30-1-103].

3. New Debtors. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides that, in determining the extent to which a financing statement naming an original debtor is effective against a new debtor, the sufficiency of the financing statement should be tested against the name of the new debtor.

30-9A-507. Effect of certain events on effectiveness of financing statement.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-402(7) [30-9-402(7), now repealed].

2. Scope of Section. This section deals with situations in which the information in a proper financing statement becomes inaccurate after the financing statement is filed. Compare Section 9-338 [30-9A-338], which deals with situations in which a financing statement contains a particular kind of information concerning the debtor (i.e., the information described in Section 9-516(b)(5) [30-9A-516(2)(e)]) that is incorrect at the time it is filed.

3. Post-Filing Disposition of Collateral. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1)], a financing statement remains effective even if the collateral is sold or otherwise disposed of. This subsection clarifies the third sentence of former Section 9-402(7) [30-9-402(7), now repealed] by providing that a financing statement remains effective following the disposition of collateral only when the security interest or agricultural lien continues in that collateral. This result is consistent with the conclusion of PEB Commentary No. 3. Normally, a security interest does continue after disposition of the collateral. See Section 9-315(a) [30-9A-315(1)]. Law other than this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] determines whether an agricultural lien survives disposition of the collateral.

As a consequence of the disposition, the collateral may be owned by a person other than the debtor against whom the financing statement was filed. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1)], the secured party remains perfected even if it does not correct the public record. For this reason, any person seeking to determine whether a debtor owns collateral free of security interests must inquire as to the debtor's source of title and, if circumstances seem to require it, search in the name of a former owner. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] addresses only the sufficiency of the information contained in the financing statement. A disposition of collateral may result in loss of perfection for other reasons. See Section 9-316 [30-9A-316].

Example: Dee Corp. is an Illinois corporation. It creates a security interest in its equipment in favor of Secured Party. Secured Party files a proper financing statement in Illinois. Dee Corp. sells an item of equipment to Bee Corp., a Pennsylvania corporation, subject to the security interest. The security interest continues, see Section 9-315(a) [30-9A-315(1)], and remains perfected, see Section 9-507(a) [30-9A-507(1)], notwithstanding that the financing statement is filed under "D" (for Dee Corp.) and not under "B." However, because Bee Corp. is located in Pennsylvania and not Illinois, see Section 9-307 [30-9A-307], unless Secured Party perfects under Pennsylvania law within one year after the transfer, its security interest will become unperfected and will be deemed to have been unperfected against purchasers of the collateral. See Section 9-316 [30-9A-316].

4. Other Post-Filing Changes. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that, as a general matter, post-filing changes that render a financing statement inaccurate and seriously misleading have no effect on a financing statement. The financing statement remains effective. It is subject to two exceptions: Section 9-508 [30-9A-508] and Section 9-507(c) [30-9A-507(3)]. Section 9-508 [30-9A-508] addresses the effectiveness of a financing statement filed against an original debtor when a new debtor becomes bound by the original debtor's security agreement. It is discussed in the Comments to that section. Section 9-507(c) [30-9A-507(3)] addresses a "pure" change of the debtor's name, i.e., a change that does not implicate a new debtor. It clarifies former Section 9-402(7) [30-9-402(7), now repealed]. If a name change renders a filed financing statement seriously misleading, the financing statement is not effective as to collateral acquired more than four months after the change, unless before the expiration of the four months an amendment is filed that specifies the debtor's new correct name (or provides an incorrect name that renders the financing statement not seriously misleading under Section 9-506 [30-9A-506]). As under former Section 9-402(7) [30-9-402(7), now repealed], the original financing statement would continue to be effective with respect to collateral acquired before the name change as well as collateral acquired within the four-month period.

30-9A-508. Effectiveness of financing statement if new debtor becomes bound by security agreement.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. The Problem. Section 9-203(d) and (e) [30-9A-203(4) and (5)] and this section deal with situations where one party (the "new debtor") becomes bound as debtor by a security agreement entered into by another person (the "original debtor"). These situations often arise as a consequence of changes in business structure. For example, the original debtor may be an individual debtor who operates a business as a sole proprietorship and then incorporates it. Or, the original debtor may be a corporation that is merged into another corporation. Under both former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] and this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], collateral that is transferred in the course of the incorporation or merger normally would remain subject to a perfected security interest. See Sections 9-315(a), 9-507(a) [30-9A-315(1) and 30-9A-507(1)]. Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] was less clear with respect to whether an after-acquired property clause in a security agreement signed by the original debtor would be effective to create a security interest in property acquired by the new corporation or the merger survivor and, if so, whether a financing statement filed against the original debtor would be effective to perfect the security interest. This section and Sections 9-203(d) and (e) [30-9A-203(4) and (5)] are a clarification.

3. How New Debtor Becomes Bound. Normally, a security interest is unenforceable unless the debtor has authenticated a security agreement describing the collateral. See Section 9-203(b) [30-9A-203(2)]. New Section 9-203(e) [30-9A-203(5)] creates an exception, under which a security agreement entered into by one person is effective with respect to the property of another. This exception comes into play if a "new debtor" becomes bound as debtor by a security agreement entered into by another person (the "original debtor"). (The quoted terms are defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102].) If a new debtor does become bound, then the security agreement entered into by the original debtor satisfies the security-agreement requirement of Section 9-203(b)(3) [30-9A-203(2)(c)] as to existing or after-acquired property of the new debtor to the extent the property is described in the security agreement. In that case, no other agreement is necessary to make a security interest enforceable in that property. See Section 9-203(e) [30-9A-203(5)].

Section 9-203(d) [30-9A-203(4)] explains when a new debtor becomes bound by an original debtor's security agreement. Under Section 9-203(d)(1) [30-9A-203(4)(a)], a new debtor becomes bound as debtor if, by contract or operation of other law, the security agreement becomes effective to create a security interest in the new debtor's property. For example, if the applicable corporate law of mergers provides that when A Corp merges into B Corp, B Corp becomes a debtor under A Corp's security agreement, then B Corp would become bound as debtor following such a merger. Similarly, B Corp would become bound as debtor if B Corp contractually assumes A's obligations under the security agreement.

Under certain circumstances, a new debtor becomes bound for purposes of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] even though it would not be bound under other law. Under Section 9-203(d)(2) [30-9A-203(4)(b)], a new debtor becomes bound when, by contract or operation of other law, it (i) becomes obligated not only for the secured obligation but also generally for the obligations of the original debtor and (ii) acquires or succeeds to substantially all the assets of the original debtor. For example, some corporate laws provide that, when two corporations merge, the surviving corporation succeeds to the assets of its merger partner and "has all liabilities" of both corporations. In the case where, for example, A Corp merges into B Corp (and A Corp ceases to exist), some people have questioned whether A Corp's grant of a security interest in its existing and after-acquired property becomes a "liability" of B Corp, such that B Corp's existing and after-acquired property becomes subject to a security interest in favor of A Corp's lender. Even if corporate law were to give a negative answer, under Section 9-203(d)(2) [30-9A-203(4)(b)], B Corp would become bound for purposes of Section 9-203(e) [30-9A-203(5)] and this section. The "substantially all of the assets" requirement of Section 9-203(d)(2) [30-9A-203(4)(b)] excludes sureties and other secondary obligors as well as persons who become obligated through veil piercing and other non-successorship doctrines. In most cases, it will exclude successors to the assets and liabilities of a division of a debtor.

4. When Financing Statement Effective Against New Debtor. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that a filing against the original debtor is effective to perfect a security interest in collateral that a new debtor has at the time it becomes bound by the original debtor's security agreement and collateral that it acquires before the expiration of four months after the new debtor becomes bound. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], however, if the filing against the original debtor is seriously misleading as to the new debtor's name, the filing is effective as to collateral acquired by the new debtor after the four-month period only if a person files during the four-month period an initial financing statement providing the name of the new debtor. Compare Section 9-507(c) [30-9A-507(3)] (four-month period of effectiveness with respect to collateral acquired by a debtor after the debtor changes its name).

5. Transferred Collateral. This section does not apply to collateral transferred by the original debtor to a new debtor. Under those circumstances, the filing against the original debtor continues to be effective until it lapses. See subsection (c) [subsection (3)]; Section 9-507(a) [30-9A-507(1)].

6. Priority. Section 9-326 [30-9A-326] governs the priority contest between a secured creditor of the original debtor and a secured creditor of the new debtor.

30-9A-509. Persons entitled to file record.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Scope and Approach of This Section. This section collects in one place most of the rules determining whether a record may be filed. Section 9-510 [30-9A-510] explains the extent to which a filed record is effective. Under these sections, the identity of the person who effects a filing is immaterial. The filing scheme contemplated by this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5] does not contemplate that the identity of a "filer" will be a part of the searchable records. This is consistent with, and a necessary aspect of, eliminating signatures or other evidence of authorization from the system. (Note that the 1972 amendments to this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] eliminated the requirement that a financing statement contain the signature of the secured party.) As long as the appropriate person authorizes the filing, or, in the case of a termination statement, the debtor is entitled to the termination, it is insignificant whether the secured party or another person files any given record. The question of authorization is one for the court, not the filing office. However, a filing office may choose to employ authentication procedures in connection with electronic communications, e.g., to verify the identity of a filer who seeks to charge the filing fee.

3. Unauthorized Filings. Records filed in the filing office do not require signatures for their effectiveness. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] substitutes for the debtor's signature on a financing statement the requirement that the debtor authorize in an authenticated record the filing of an initial financing statement or an amendment that adds collateral. Also, under subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)], if an amendment adds a debtor, the debtor who is added must authorize the amendment. A person who files an unauthorized record in violation of subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] is liable under Section 9-625 [30-9A-625] for actual and statutory damages. Of course, a filed financing statement is ineffective to perfect a security interest if the filing is not authorized. See Section 9-510(a) [30-9A-510(1)]. Law other than this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], including the law with respect to ratification of past acts, generally determines whether a person has the requisite authority to file a record under this section. See Sections 1-103, 9-502 [30-1-103, 30-9A-502], Comment 3.

4. Ipso Facto Authorization. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], the authentication of a security agreement ipso facto constitutes the debtor's authorization of the filing of a financing statement covering the collateral described in the security agreement. The secured party need not obtain a separate authorization. Similarly, a new debtor's becoming bound by a security agreement ipso facto constitutes the new debtor's authorization of the filing of a financing statement covering the collateral described in the security agreement by which the new debtor has become bound. And, under subsection (c) [not adopted in Montana], the acquisition of collateral in which a security interest continues after disposition under Section 9-315(a)(1) [30-9A-315(1)(a)] ipso facto constitutes an authorization to file an initial financing statement against the person who acquired the collateral. The authorization to file an initial financing statement also constitutes an authorization to file a record covering actual proceeds of the original collateral, even if the security agreement is silent as to proceeds.

Example 1: Debtor authenticates a security agreement creating a security interest in Debtor's inventory in favor of Secured Party. Secured Party files a financing statement covering inventory and accounts. The financing statement is authorized insofar as it covers inventory and unauthorized insofar as it covers accounts. (Note, however, that the financing statement will be effective to perfect a security interest in accounts constituting proceeds of the inventory to the same extent as a financing statement covering only inventory.)

Example 2: Debtor authenticates a security agreement creating a security interest in Debtor's inventory in favor of Secured Party. Secured Party files a financing statement covering inventory. Debtor sells some inventory, deposits the buyer's payment into a deposit account, and withdraws the funds to purchase equipment. As long as the equipment can be traced to the inventory, the security interest continues in the equipment. See Section 9-315(a)(2)

[30-9A-315(1)(b)]. However, because the equipment was acquired with cash proceeds, the financing statement becomes ineffective to perfect the security interest in the equipment on the 21st day after the security interest attaches to the equipment unless Secured Party continues perfection beyond the 20-day period by filing a financing statement against the equipment or amending the filed financing statement to cover equipment. See Section 9-315(d) [30-9A-315(4)]. Debtor's authentication of the security agreement authorizes the filing of an initial financing statement or amendment covering the equipment, which is "property that becomes collateral under Section 9-315(a)(2) [30-9A-315(1)(b)]." See Section 9-509(b)(2) [30-9A-509(2)(b)].

5. Agricultural Liens. Under subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)], the holder of an agricultural lien may file a financing statement covering collateral subject to the lien without obtaining the debtor's authorization. Because the lien arises as matter of law, the debtor's consent is not required. A person who files an unauthorized record in violation of this subsection is liable under Section 9-625(e) [30-9A-625(5)] for a statutory penalty and damages.

6. Amendments; Termination Statements Authorized by Debtor. Most amendments may not be filed unless the secured party of record, as determined under Section 9-511 [30-9A-511], authorizes the filing. See subsection (d)(1) [subsection (3)(a)]. However, under subsection (d)(2) [subsection (3)(b)], the authorization of the secured party of record is not required for the filing of a termination statement if the secured party of record failed to send or file a termination statement as required by Section 9-513 [30-9A-513], the debtor authorizes it to be filed, and the termination statement so indicates.

7. Multiple Secured Parties of Record. Subsection (e) [subsection (4)] deals with multiple secured parties of record. It permits each secured party of record to authorize the filing of amendments. However, Section 9-510(b) [30-9A-510(2)] protects the rights and powers of one secured party of record from the effects of filings made by another secured party of record. See Section 9-510 [30-9A-510], Comment 3.

8. Successor to Secured Party of Record. A person may succeed to the powers of the secured party of record by operation of other law, e.g., the law of corporate mergers. In that case, the successor has the power to authorize filings within the meaning of this section.

30-9A-510. Effectiveness of filed record.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Ineffectiveness of Unauthorized or Overbroad Filings. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] provides that a filed financing statement is effective only to the extent it was filed by a person entitled to file it.

Example 1: Debtor authorizes the filing of a financing statement covering inventory. Under Section 9-509 [30-9A-509], the secured party may file a financing statement covering only inventory; it may not file a financing statement covering other collateral. The secured party files a financing statement covering inventory and equipment. This section provides that the financing statement is effective only to the extent the secured party may file it. Thus, the financing statement is effective to perfect a security interest in inventory but ineffective to perfect a security interest in equipment.

3. Multiple Secured Parties of Record. Section 9-509(e) [30-9A-509(4)] permits any secured party of record to authorize the filing of most amendments. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] of this section prevents a filing authorized by one secured party of record from affecting the rights and powers of another secured party of record without the latter's consent.

Example 2: Debtor creates a security interest in favor of A and B. The filed financing statement names A and B as the secured parties. An amendment deleting some collateral covered by the financing statement is filed pursuant to B's authorization. Although B's security interest in the deleted collateral becomes unperfected, A's security interest remains perfected in all the collateral.

Example 3: Debtor creates a security interest in favor of A and B. The financing statement names A and B as the secured parties. A termination statement is filed pursuant to B's authorization. Although the effectiveness of the financing statement terminates with respect to B's security interest, A's rights are unaffected. That is, the financing statement continues to be effective to perfect A's security interest.

4. Continuation Statements. A continuation statement may be filed only within the six months immediately before lapse. See Section 9-515(d) [30-9A-515(4)]. The filing office is obligated to reject a continuation statement that is filed outside the six-month period. See Sections 9-520(a), 9-516(b)(7) [30-9A-520(1) and 30-9A-516(2)(g)]. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that if the filing office fails to reject a continuation statement that is not filed in a timely manner, the continuation statement is ineffective nevertheless.

30-9A-511. Secured party of record.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Secured Party of Record. This new section explains how the secured party of record is to be determined. If SP-1 is named as the secured party in an initial financing statement, it is the secured party of record. Similarly, if an initial financing statement reflects a total assignment from SP-0 to SP-1, then SP-1 is the secured party of record. See subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. If, subsequently, an amendment is filed assigning SP-1's status to SP-2, then SP-2 becomes the secured party of record in place of SP-1. The same result obtains if a subsequent amendment deletes the reference to SP-1 and substitutes therefor a reference to SP-2. If, however, a subsequent amendment adds SP-2 as a secured party but does not purport to remove SP-1 as a secured party, then SP-2 and SP-1 each is a secured party of record. See subsection (b) [subsection (2)]. An amendment purporting to remove the only secured party of record without providing a successor is ineffective. See Section 9-512(e) [30-9A-512(5)]. At any point in time, all effective records that comprise a financing statement must be examined to determine the person or persons that have the status of secured party of record.

3. Successor to Secured Party of Record. Application of other law may result in a person succeeding to the powers of a secured party of record. For example, if the secured party of record (A) merges into another corporation (B) and the other corporation (B) survives, other law may provide that B has all of A's powers. In that case, B is authorized to take all actions under this Part that A would have been authorized to take. Similarly, acts taken by a person who is authorized under generally applicable principles of agency to act on behalf of the secured party of record are effective under this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5].

30-9A-512. Amendment of financing statement.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former 9-402(4) [30-9-402(4), now repealed].

2. Changes to Financing Statements. This section addresses changes to financing statements, including addition and deletion of collateral. Although termination statements, assignments, and continuation statements are types of amendment, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] follows former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] and contains separate sections containing additional provisions applicable to particular types of amendments. See Section 9-513 [30-9A-513] (termination statements); 9-514 [30-9A-514] (assignments); 9-515 [30-9A-515] (continuation statements). One should not infer from this separate treatment that this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] requires a separate amendment to accomplish each change. Rather, a single amendment would be legally sufficient to, e.g., add collateral and continue the effectiveness of the financing statement.

3. Amendments. An amendment under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] may identify only the information contained in a financing statement that is to be changed; alternatively, it may take the form of an amended and restated financing statement. The latter would state, for example, that the financing statement "is amended and restated to read as follows: . . ." References in this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5] to an "amended financing statement" are to a financing statement as amended by an amendment using either technique.

This section revises former Section 9-402(4) [30-9-402(4), now repealed] to permit secured parties of record to make changes in the public record without the need to obtain the debtor's signature. However, the filing of an amendment that adds collateral or adds a debtor must be authorized by the debtor or it will not be effective. See Sections 9-509(a), 9-510(a) [30-9A-509(1), 30-9A-510(1)].

4. Amendment Adding Debtor. An amendment that adds a debtor is effective, provided that the added debtor authorizes the filing. See Section 9-509(a) [30-9A-509(1)]. However, filing an amendment adding a debtor to a previously filed financing statement affords no advantage over filing an initial financing statement against that debtor and may be disadvantageous. With respect to the added debtor, for purposes of determining the priority of the security interest, the time of filing is the time of the filing of the amendment, not the time of the filing of the initial financing statement. See subsection (d) [subsection (4)]. However, the effectiveness of the financing statement lapses with respect to added debtor at the time it lapses with respect to the original debtor. See subsection (b) [subsection (2)].

5. Deletion of All Debtors or Secured Parties of Record. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] assures that there will be a debtor and secured party of record for every financing statement.

Example: A filed financing statement names A and B as secured parties of record and covers inventory and equipment. An amendment deletes equipment and purports to delete A and B as secured parties of record without adding a substitute secured party. The amendment is ineffective to the extent it purports to delete the secured parties of record but effective with respect to the deletion of collateral. As a consequence, the financing statement, as amended, covers only inventory, but A and B remain as secured parties of record.

30-9A-513. Termination statement.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-404 [30-9-404, now repealed].

2. Duty to File or Send. This section specifies when a secured party must cause the secured party of record to file or send to the debtor a termination statement for a financing statement. Because most financing statements expire in five years unless a continuation statement is filed (Section 9-515 [30-9A-515]), no compulsion is placed on the secured party to file a termination statement unless demanded by the debtor, except in the case of consumer goods. Because many consumers will not realize the importance to them of clearing the public record, an affirmative duty is put on the secured party in that case. But many purchase-money security interests in consumer goods will not be filed, except for motor vehicles. See Section 9-309(1) [30-9A-309(1)]. Under Section 9-311(b) [30-9A-311(2)], compliance with a certificate-of-title statute is "equivalent to the filing of a financing statement under this article." Thus, this section applies to a certificate of title unless the section is superseded by a certificate-of-title statute that contains a specific rule addressing a secured party's duty to cause a notation of a security interest to be removed from a certificate of title. In the context of a certificate of title, however, the secured party could comply with this section by causing the removal itself or providing the debtor with documentation sufficient to enable the debtor to effect the removal.

Subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] apply to a financing statement covering consumer goods. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] applies to other financing statements. Subsection (a) and (c) [subsections (1) and (3)] each makes explicit what was implicit under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]: If the debtor did not authorize the filing of a financing statement in the first place, the secured party of record should file or send a termination statement. The liability imposed upon a secured party that fails to comply with subsection (a) or (c) [subsections (1) or (3)] is identical to that imposed for the filing of an unauthorized financing statement or amendment. See Section 9-625(e) [30-9A-625(5)].

3. "Bogus" Filings. A secured party's duty to send a termination statement arises when the secured party "receives" an authenticated demand from the debtor. In the case of an unauthorized financing statement, the person named as debtor in the financing statement may have no relationship with the named secured party and no reason to know the secured party's address. Inasmuch as the address in the financing statement is "held out by [the person named as secured party in the financing statement] as the place for receipt of such communications [i.e., communications relating to security interests]," the putative secured party is deemed to have "received" a notification delivered to that address. See Section 1-201(26) [30-1-201(26)]. If a termination statement is not forthcoming, the person named as debtor itself may authorize the filing of a termination statement, which will be effective if it indicates that the person authorized it to be filed. See Sections 9-509(d)(2), 9-510(c) [30-9A-509(3)(b), 30-9A-510(3)].

4. Buyers of Receivables. Applied literally, former Section 9-404(1) [30-9-404(1), now repealed] would have required many buyers of receivables to file a termination statement immediately upon filing a financing statement because "there is no outstanding secured obligation and no commitment to make advances, incur obligations, or otherwise give value." Subsections (c)(1) and (2) [subsections (3)(a) and (3)(b)] remedy this problem. While the security interest of a buyer of accounts or chattel paper (B-1) is perfected, the debtor is not deemed to retain an interest in the sold receivables and thus could transfer no interest in them to another buyer (B-2) or to a lien creditor (LC). However, for purposes of determining the rights of the debtor's creditors and certain purchasers of accounts or chattel paper from the debtor, while B-1's security interest is unperfected, the debtor-seller is deemed to have rights in the sold receivables, and a competing security interest or judicial lien may attach to those rights. See Sections 9-318, 9-109 [30-9A-318 and 30-9A-109], Comment 5. Suppose that B-1's security interest in certain accounts and chattel paper is perfected by filing, but the effectiveness of the financing statement lapses. Both before and after lapse, B-1 collects some of the receivables. After lapse, LC acquires a lien on the accounts and chattel paper. B-1's unperfected security interest in the accounts and chattel paper is subordinate to LC's rights. See Section 9-317(a)(2) [30-9A-317(1)(b)]. But collections on accounts and chattel paper are not "accounts" or "chattel paper." Even if B-1's security interest in the accounts and chattel paper is or becomes unperfected, neither the debtor nor LC acquires rights to the collections that B-1 collects (and owns) before LC acquires a lien.

5. Effect of Filing. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] states the effect of filing a termination statement: the related financing statement ceases to be effective. If one of several secured parties of record files a termination statement, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] applies only with respect to the rights of the person who authorized the filing of the termination statement. See Section 9-510(b) [30-9A-510(2)]. The financing statement remains effective with respect to the rights of the others. However, even if a financing statement is terminated (and thus no longer is effective) with respect to all secured parties of record, the financing statement, including the termination statement, will remain of record until at least one year after it lapses with respect to all secured parties of record. See Section 9-519(g) [30-9A-519(7)].

30-9A-514. Assignment powers of secured party of record.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-405 [30-9-405, now repealed].

2. Assignments. This section provides a permissive device whereby a secured party of record may effectuate an assignment of its power to affect a financing statement. It may also be useful for a secured party who has assigned all or part of its security interest or agricultural lien and wishes to have the fact noted of record, so that inquiries concerning the transaction would be addressed to the assignee. See Section 9-502 [30-9A-502], Comment 2. Upon the filing of an assignment, the assignee becomes the "secured party of record" and may authorize the filing of a continuation statement, termination statement, or other amendment. Note that under Section 9-310(c) [30-9A-310(3)] no filing of an assignment is required as a condition of continuing the perfected status of the security interest against creditors and transferees of the original debtor. However, if an assignment is not filed, the assignor remains the secured party of record, with the power (even if not the right) to authorize the filing of effective amendments. See Sections 9-511(c), 9-509(d) [30-9A-511(3) and 30-9A-509(4)].

Where a record of a mortgage is effective as a financing statement filed as a fixture filing (Section 9-502(c) [30-9A-502(3)]), then an assignment of record of the security interest may be made only in the manner in which an assignment of record of the mortgage may be made under local real-property law.

3. Comparison to Prior Law. Most of the changes reflected in this section are for clarification or to embrace medium-neutral drafting. As a general matter, this section preserves the opportunity given by former Section 9-405 [30-9-405, now repealed] to assign a security interest of record in one of two different ways. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1)], a secured party may assign all of its power to affect a financing statement by naming an assignee in the initial financing statement. The secured party of record may accomplish the same result under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] by making a subsequent filing. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] also may be used for an assignment of only some of the secured party of record's power to affect a financing statement, e.g., the power to affect the financing statement as it relates to particular items of collateral or as it relates to an undivided interest in a security interest in all the collateral. An initial financing statement may not be used to change the secured party of record under these circumstances. However, an amendment adding the assignee as a secured party of record may be used.

30-9A-515. Duration and effectiveness of financing statement — effect of lapsed financing statement.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-403(2), (3), (6) [30-9-403(2), (3), (6), now repealed].

2. Period of Financing Statement's Effectiveness. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] states the general rule: a financing statement is effective for a five-year period unless its effectiveness is continued under this section or terminated under Section 9-513 [30-9A-513]. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that if the financing statement relates to a public-finance transaction or a manufactured-home transaction and so indicates, the financing statement is effective for 30 years. These financings typically extend well beyond the standard, five-year period. Under subsection (f) [subsection (6)], a financing statement filed against a transmitting utility remains effective indefinitely, until a termination statement is filed. Likewise, under subsection (g) [subsection (7)], a mortgage effective as a fixture filing remains effective until its effectiveness terminates under real-property law.

3. Lapse. When the period of effectiveness under subsection (a) or (b) [subsection (1) or (2)] expires, the effectiveness of the financing statement lapses. The last sentence of subsection (c) [subsection (3)] addresses the effect of lapse. The deemed retroactive unperfection applies only with respect to purchasers for value; unlike former Section 9-403(2) [30-9-403(2), now repealed], it does not apply with respect to lien creditors.

Example 1: SP-1 and SP-2 both hold security interests in the same collateral. Both security interests are perfected by filing. SP-1 filed first and has priority under Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)]. The effectiveness of SP-1's filing lapses. As long as SP-2's security interest remains perfected thereafter, SP-2 is entitled to priority over SP-1's security interest, which is deemed never to have been perfected as against a purchaser for value (SP-2). See Section 9-322(a)(2) [30-9A-322(1)(b)].

Example 2: SP holds a security interest perfected by filing. On July 1, LC acquires a judicial lien on the collateral. Two weeks later, the effectiveness of the financing statement lapses. Although the security interest becomes unperfected upon lapse, it was perfected when LC acquired its lien. Accordingly, notwithstanding the lapse, the perfected security interest has priority over the rights of LC, who is not a purchaser. See Section 9-317(a)(2) [30-9A-317(1)(b)].

4. Effect of Debtor's Bankruptcy. Under former Section 9-403(2) [30-9-403(2), now repealed], lapse was tolled if the debtor entered bankruptcy or another insolvency proceeding. Nevertheless, being unaware that insolvency proceedings had been commenced, filing offices routinely removed records from the files as if lapse had not been tolled. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] deletes the former tolling provision and thereby imposes a new burden on the secured party: to be sure that a financing statement does not lapse during the debtor's bankruptcy. The secured party can prevent lapse by filing a continuation statement, even without first obtaining relief from the automatic stay. See Bankruptcy Code Section 362(b)(3). Of course, if the debtor enters bankruptcy before lapse, the provisions of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] with respect to lapse would be of no effect to the extent that federal bankruptcy law dictates a contrary result (e.g., to the extent that the Bankruptcy Code determines rights as of the date of the filing of the bankruptcy petition).

5. Continuation Statements. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] explains when a continuation statement may be filed. A continuation statement filed at a time other than that prescribed by subsection (d) [subsection (4)] is ineffective, see Section 9-510(c) [30-9A-510(3)], and the filing office may not accept it. See Sections 9-520(a), 9-516(b) [30-9A-520(1) and 30-9A-516(2)]. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] specifies the effect of a continuation statement and provides for successive continuation statements.

DECISIONS UNDER UNIFORM TRUST RECEIPTS ACT

Continuation Statement: A valid continuation statement becomes effective upon the conclusion of the 5-year initial period during which a financing statement is effective or upon the conclusion of any previous 5-year extension of that initial period. To be valid, continuation statements must be filed during the 6-month period preceding conclusion of the initial 5-year financing statement period or any extension thereof. 40 A.G. Op. 60 (1984).

Filing and Effect of Continuation Statement: Under 30-9-403(3) (section now repealed, see 30-9A-515): (1) the 5-year extension period effected by a valid continuation statement begins to run upon conclusion of the initial 5-year financing statement period and any previous 5-year extension period; (2) conversely, extension periods do not begin on the date a continuation statement is filed; (3) to be effective, a continuation statement must be filed during the 6-month period preceding termination of the original 5-year financing statement period and any 5-year extension period; and (4) County Clerk and Recorders are not required to accept for filing continuation statements tendered outside the 6-month period. 40 A.G. Op. 60 (1984).

30-9A-516. What constitutes filing — effectiveness of filing.

Official Comments

1. Source. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)]: former Section 9-403(1) [30-9-403(1), now repealed]; the remainder is new.

2. What Constitutes Filing. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] deals generically with what constitutes filing of a record, including an initial financing statement and amendments of all kinds (e.g., assignments, termination statements, and continuation statements). It follows former Section 9-403(1) [30-9-403(1), now repealed], under which either acceptance of a record by the filing office or presentation of the record and tender of the filing fee constitutes filing.

3. Effectiveness of Rejected Record. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides an exclusive list of grounds upon which the filing office may reject a record. See Section 9-520(a) [30-9A-520(1)]. Although some of these grounds would also be grounds for rendering a filed record ineffective (e.g., an initial financing statement does not provide a name for the debtor), many others would not be (e.g., an initial financing statement does not provide a mailing address for the debtor or secured party of record). Neither this section nor Section 9-520 [30-9A-520] requires or authorizes the filing office to determine, or even consider, the accuracy of information provided in a record. For example, the State A filing office may not reject under subsection (b)(5)(C) [subsection (2)(e)(iii)] an initial financing statement indicating that the debtor is a State A corporation and providing a three-digit organizational identification number, even if all State A organizational identification numbers contain at least five digits and two letters.

A financing statement or other record that is communicated to the filing office but which the filing office refuses to accept provides no public notice, regardless of the reason for the rejection. However, this section distinguishes between records that the filing office rightfully rejects and those that it wrongfully rejects. A filer is able to prevent a rightful rejection by complying with the requirements of subsection (b) [subsection (2)]. No purpose is served by giving effect to records that justifiably never find their way into the system, and subsection (b) [subsection (2)] so provides.

Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] deals with the filing office's unjustified refusal to accept a record. Here, the filer is in no position to prevent the rejection and as a general matter should not be prejudiced by it. Although wrongfully rejected records generally are effective, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] contains a special rule to protect a third-party purchaser of the collateral (e.g., a buyer or competing secured party) who gives value in reliance upon the apparent absence of the record from the files. As against a person who searches the public record and reasonably relies on what the public record shows, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] imposes upon the filer the risk that a record failed to make its way into the filing system because of the filing office's wrongful rejection of it. (Compare Section 9-517 [30-9A-517], under which a mis-indexed financing statement is fully effective.) This risk is likely to be small, particularly when a record is presented electronically, and the filer can guard against this risk by conducting a post-filing search of the records. Moreover, Section 9-520(b) [30-9A-520(2)] requires the filing office to give prompt notice of its refusal to accept a record for filing.

4. Method or Medium of Communication. Rejection pursuant to subsection (b) (1) [subsection (2)(a)] for failure to communicate a record properly should be understood to mean noncompliance with procedures relating to security, authentication, or other communication-related requirements that the filing office may impose. Subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] does not authorize a filing office to impose additional substantive requirements. See Section 9-520 [30-9A-520], Comment 2.

5. Address for Secured Party of Record. Under subsection (b)(4) [subsection (2)(d)] and Section 9-520(a) [30-9A-520(1)], the lack of a mailing address for the secured party of record requires the filing office to reject an initial financing statement. The failure to include an address for the secured party of record no longer renders a financing statement ineffective. See Section 9-502(a) [30-9A-502(1)]. The function of the address is not to identify the secured party of record but rather to provide an address to which others can send required notifications, e.g., of a purchase-money security interest in inventory or of the disposition of collateral. Inasmuch as the address shown on a filed financing statement is an "address that is reasonable under the circumstances," a person required to send a notification to the secured party may satisfy the requirement by sending a notification to that address, even if the address is or becomes incorrect. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (definition of "send"). Similarly, because the address is "held out by [the secured party] as the place for receipt of such communications [i.e., communications relating to security interests]," the secured party is deemed to have received a notification delivered to that address. See Section 1-201(26) [30-1-201(26)].

6. Uncertainty Concerning Individual Debtor's Last Name. Subsection (b)(3)(C) [subsection (2)(c)(iii)] requires the filing office to reject an initial financing statement or amendment adding an individual debtor if the office cannot index the record because it does not identify the debtor's last name (e.g., it is unclear whether the debtor's name is Elton John or John Elton).

7. Inability of Filing Office to Read or Decipher Information. Under subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a)] , if the filing office cannot read or decipher information, the information is not provided by a record for purposes of subsection (b) [subsection (2)].

8. Classification of Records. For purposes of subsection (b) [subsection (2)], a record that does not indicate it is an amendment or identify an initial financing statement to which it relates is deemed to be an initial financing statement. See subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)].

9. Effectiveness of Rejectable But Unrejected Record. Section 9-520(a) [30-9A-520(1)] requires the filing office to refuse to accept an initial financing statement for a reason set forth in subsection (b) [subsection (2)]. However, if the filing office accepts such a financing statement nevertheless, the financing statement generally is effective if it complies with the requirements of Section 9-502(a) and (b) [30-9A-502(1) and (2)]. See Section 9-520(c) [30-9A-520(3)]. Similarly, an otherwise effective financing statement generally remains so even though the information in the financing statement becomes incorrect. See Section 9-507(b) [30-9A-507(2)]. (Note that if the information required by subsection (b)(5) [subsection (2)(e)] is incorrect when the financing statement is filed, Section 9-338 [30-9A-338] applies.)

2. Effectiveness of Mis-Indexed Records. This section provides that the filing office's error in mis-indexing a record does not render ineffective an otherwise effective record. 30-9A-518. Claim concerning inaccurate or wrongfully filed record.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Correction Statements. Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] did not afford a nonjudicial means for a debtor to correct a financing statement or other record that was inaccurate or wrongfully filed. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] affords the debtor the right to file a correction statement. Among other requirements, the correction statement must provide the basis for the debtor's belief that the public record should be corrected. See subsection (b) [subsection (2)]. These provisions, which resemble the analogous remedy in the Fair Credit Reporting Act, 15 U.S.C. §1681i, afford an aggrieved person the opportunity to state its position on the public record. They do not permit an aggrieved person to change the legal effect of the public record. Thus, although a filed correction statement becomes part of the "financing statement," as defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102], the filing does not affect the effectiveness of the initial financing statement or any other filed record. See subsection (c) [subsection (3)].

This section does not displace other provisions of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] that impose liability for making unauthorized filings or failing to file or send a termination statement (see Section 9-625(e) [30-9A-625(5)]), nor does it displace any available judicial remedies.

3. Resort to Other Law. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] cannot provide a satisfactory or complete solution to problems caused by misuse of the public records. The problem of "bogus" filings is not limited to the UCC filing system but extends to the real-property records, as well. A summary judicial procedure for correcting the public record and criminal penalties for those who misuse the filing and recording systems are likely to be more effective and put less strain on the filing system than provisions authorizing or requiring action by filing and recording offices.

30-9A-519. Numbering, maintaining, and indexing records — communicating information provided in records.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Sections 9-403(4), (7), 9-405(2) [30-9-403(4), (7), 30-9-405(2), both now repealed].

2. Filing Office's Duties. Subsections (a) through (e) [subsections (1) through (5)] set forth the duties of the filing office with respect to filed records. Subsection (h) [subsection (8)], which is new, imposes a minimum standard of performance for those duties. Prompt indexing is crucial to the effectiveness of any filing system. An accepted but un-indexed record affords no public notice. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] requires the filing office to maintain appropriate storage and retrieval facilities, and subsection (g) [subsection (7)] contains minimum requirements for the retention of records.

3. File Number. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] requires the filing office to assign a unique number to each filed record. That number is the "file number" only if the record is an initial financing statement. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102].

4. Time of Filing. Subsection (a)(2) and Section 9-523 [subsection (1)(b) and 30-9A-523] refer to the "date and time" of filing. The statutory text does not contain any instructions to a filing office as to how the time of filing is to be determined. The method of determining or assigning a time of filing is an appropriate matter for filing-office rules to address.

5. Related Records. Subsections (c) and (f) [subsections (3) and (6)] are designed to ensure that an initial financing statement and all filed records relating to it are associated with one another, indexed under the name of the debtor, and retrieved together. To comply with subsection (f) [subsection (6)], a filing office (other than a real-property recording office in a State that enacts subsection (f) [subsection (6)], Alternative B) must be capable of retrieving records in each of two ways: by the name of the debtor and by the file number of the initial financing statement to which the record relates.

6. Prohibition on Deleting Names from Index. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] contemplates that the filing office will not delete the name of a debtor from the index until at least one year passes after the effectiveness of the financing statement lapses as to all secured parties of record. See subsection (g) [subsection (7)]. This rule applies even if the filing office accepts an amendment purporting to delete or modify the name of a debtor or terminate the effectiveness of the financing statement. If an amendment provides a modified name for a debtor, the amended name should be added to the index, see subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)], but the pre-amendment name should remain in the index.

Compared to former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], the rule in subsection (g) [subsection (7)] increases the amount of information available to those who search the public records. The rule also contemplates that searchers-not the filing office-will determine the significance and effectiveness of filed records.

30-9A-520. Acceptance and refusal to record.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Refusal to Accept Record for Filing. In some States, filing offices considered themselves obligated by former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] to review the form and content of a financing statement and to refuse to accept those that they determine are legally insufficient. Some filing offices imposed requirements for or conditions to filing that do not appear in the statute. Under this section, the filing office is not expected to make legal judgments and is not permitted to impose additional conditions or requirements.

Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] both prescribes and limits the bases upon which the filing office must and may reject records by reference to the reasons set forth in Section 9-516(b) [30-9A-516(2)]. For the most part, the bases for rejection are limited to those that prevent the filing office from dealing with a record that it receives-because some of the requisite information (e.g., the debtor's name) is missing or cannot be deciphered, because the record is not communicated by a method (e.g., it is MIME- rather than UU-encoded) or medium (e.g., it is written rather than electronic) that the filing office accepts, or because the filer fails to tender an amount equal to or greater than the filing fee.

3. Consequences of Accepting Rejectable Record. Section 9-516(b) [30-9A-516(2)] includes among the reasons for rejecting an initial financing statement the failure to give certain information that is not required as a condition of effectiveness. In conjunction with Section 9-516(b)(5) [30-9A-516(2)(e)], this section requires the filing office to refuse to accept a financing statement that is legally sufficient to perfect a security interest under Section 9-502 [30-9A-502] but does not contain a mailing address for the debtor, does not disclose whether the debtor is an individual or an organization (e.g., a partnership or corporation) or, if the debtor is an organization, does not give certain specified information concerning the organization. The information required by Section 9-516(b)(5) [30-9A-516(2)(e)] assists searchers in weeding out "false positives," i.e., records that a search reveals but which do not pertain to the debtor in question. It assists filers by helping to ensure that the debtor's name is correct and that the financing statement is filed in the proper jurisdiction.

If the filing office accepts a financing statement that does not give this information at all, the filing is fully effective. Section 9-520(c) [30-9A-520(3)]. The financing statement also generally is effective if the information is given but is incorrect; however, Section 9-338 [30-9A-338] affords protection to buyers and holders of perfected security interests who give value in reasonable reliance upon the incorrect information.

4. Filing Office's Duties with Respect to Rejected Record. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] requires the filing office to communicate the fact of rejection and the reason therefor within a fixed period of time. Inasmuch as a rightfully rejected record is ineffective and a wrongfully rejected record is not fully effective, prompt communication concerning any rejection is important.

5. Partial Effectiveness of Record. Under subsection (d) [subsection (4)], the provisions of this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 5] apply to each debtor separately. Thus, a filing office may reject an initial financing statement or other record as to one named debtor but accept it as to the other.

Example: An initial financing statement is communicated to the filing office. The financing statement names two debtors, John Smith and Jane Smith. It contains all of the information described in Section 9-516(b)(5) [30-9A-516(2)(e)] with respect to John but lacks some of the information with respect to Jane. The filing office must accept the financing statement with respect to John, reject it with respect to Jane, and notify the filer of the rejection.

30-9A-521. Uniform form of written financing statement and amendment.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. "Safe Harbor" Written Forms. Although Section 9-520 [30-9A-520] limits the bases upon which the filing office can refuse to accept records, this section provides sample written forms that must be accepted in every filing office in the country, as long as the filing office's rules permit it to accept written communications. By completing one of the forms in this section, a secured party can be certain that the filing office is obligated to accept it.

The forms in this section are based upon national financing statement forms that were in use under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. Those forms were developed over an extended period and reflect the comments and suggestions of filing officers, secured parties and their counsel, and service companies. The formatting of those forms and of the ones in this section has been designed to reduce error by both filers and filing offices.

A filing office that accepts written communications may not reject, on grounds of form or format, a filing using these forms. Although filers are not required to use the forms, they are encouraged and can be expected to do so, inasmuch as the forms are well designed and avoid the risk of rejection on the basis of form or format. As their use expands, the forms will rapidly become familiar to both filers and filing-office personnel. Filing offices may and should encourage the use of these forms by declaring them to be the "standard" (but not exclusive) forms for each jurisdiction, albeit without in any way suggesting that alternative forms are unacceptable.

The multi-purpose form in subsection (b) [subsection (2), form not adopted in Montana—Secretary of State authorized to adopt model form] covers changes with respect to the debtor, the secured party, the collateral, and the status of the financing statement (termination and continuation). A single form may be used for several different types of amendments at once (e.g., both to change a debtor's name and continue the effectiveness of the financing statement).

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-403(3) [30-9-403(3), now repealed], revised substantially.

2. Maintenance of Records. Section 9-523 [30-9A-523] requires the filing office to provide information concerning certain lapsed financing statements. Accordingly, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] requires the filing office to maintain a record of the information in a financing statement for at least one year after lapse. During that time, the filing office may not delete any information with respect to a filed financing statement; it may only add information. This approach relieves the filing office from any duty to determine whether to substitute or delete information upon receipt of an amendment. It also assures searchers that they will receive all information with respect to financing statements filed against a debtor and thereby be able themselves to determine the state of the public record.

The filing office may maintain this information in any medium. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] permits the filing office immediately to destroy written records evidencing a financing statement, provided that the filing office maintains another record of the information contained in the financing statement as required by subsection (a) [subsection (1)].

30-9A-523. Information from filing office — sale or license of records.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-407 [30-9-407, now repealed]; subsections (d) and (e) [subsections (4) and (5)] are new.

2. Filing Office's Duty to Provide Information. Former Section 9-407 [30-9-407, now repealed], dealing with obtaining information from the filing office, was bracketed to suggest to legislatures that its enactment was optional. Experience has shown that the method by which interested persons can obtain information concerning the public records should be uniform. Accordingly, the analogous provisions of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] are not in brackets.

Most of the other changes from former Section 9-407 [30-9-407, now repealed] are for clarification, to embrace medium-neutral drafting, or to impose standards of performance on the filing office.

3. Acknowledgments of Filing. Subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] require the filing office to acknowledge the filing of a record. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1)], the filing office is required to acknowledge the filing of a written record only upon request of the filer. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] requires the filing office to acknowledge the filing of a non-written record even in the absence of a request from the filer.

4. Response to Search Request. Subsection (c)(3) [subsection (3)(c)] requires the filing office to provide "the information contained in each financing statement" to a person who requests it. This requirement can be satisfied by providing copies, images, or reports. The requirement does not in any manner inhibit the filing office from also offering to provide less than all of the information (presumably for a lower fee) to a person who asks for less. Thus, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] accommodates the practice of providing only the type of record (e.g., initial financing statement, continuation statement), number assigned to the record, date and time of filing, and names and addresses of the debtor and secured party when a requesting person asks for no more (i.e., when the person does not ask for copies of financing statements). In contrast, the filing office's obligation under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] to provide an acknowledgment containing "the information contained in the record" is not defined by a customer's request. Thus unless the filer stipulates otherwise, to comply with subsection (b) [subsection (2)] the filing office's acknowledgment must contain all of the information in a record.

Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] assures that a minimum amount of information about filed records will be available to the public. It does not preclude a filing office from offering additional services.

5. Lapsed and Terminated Financing Statements. This section reflects the policy that terminated financing statements will remain part of the filing office's data base. The filing office may remove from the data base only lapsed financing statements, and then only when at least a year has passed after lapse. See Section 9-519(g) [30-9A-519(7)]. Subsection (c)(1)(C) [subsection (3)(a)(iii)] requires a filing office to conduct a search and report as to lapsed financing statements that have not been removed from the data base, when requested.

6. Search by Debtor's Address. Subsection (c)(1)(A) [subsection (3)(a)(i)] contemplates that, by making a single request, a searcher will receive the results of a search of the entire public record maintained by any given filing office. Addition of the bracketed language in subsection (c)(1)(A) [subsection (3)(a)(i)] would permit a search report limited to financing statements showing a particular address for the debtor, but only if the search request is so limited. With or without the bracketed language, this subsection does not permit the filing office to compel a searcher to limit a request by address.

7. Medium of Communication; Certificates. Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] provided that the filing office respond to a request for information by providing a certificate. The principle of medium-neutrality would suggest that the statute not require a written certificate. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] follows this principle by permitting the filing office to respond by communicating "in any medium." By permitting communication "in any medium," subsection (d) [subsection (4)] is not inconsistent with a system in which persons other than filing office staff conduct searches of the filing office's (computer) records.

Some searchers find it necessary to introduce the results of their search into evidence. Because official written certificates might be introduced into evidence more easily than official communications in another medium, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] affords States the option of requiring the filing office to issue written certificates upon request. The alternative bracketed language in subsection (d) [subsection (4)] recognizes that some States may prefer to permit the filing office to respond in another medium, as long as the response can be admitted into evidence in the courts of that State without extrinsic evidence of its authenticity.

8. Performance Standard. The utility of the filing system depends on the ability of searchers to get current information quickly. Accordingly, subsection (e) [subsection (5)] requires that the filing office respond to a request for information no later than two business days after it receives the request. The information contained in the response must be current as of a date no earlier than three business days before the filing office receives the request. See subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a)]. The failure of the filing office to comply with performance standards, such as subsection (e) [subsection (5)], has no effect on the private rights of persons affected by the filing of records.

9. Sales of Records in Bulk. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)], which is new, mandates that the appropriate official or the filing office sell or license the filing records to the public in bulk, on a nonexclusive basis, in every medium available to the filing office. The details of implementation are left to filing-office rules.

Official Comments

1. Source. Various sections of former Part 4 [Title 30, chapter 9, part 4, now repealed].

2. Fees. This section contains all fee requirements for filing, indexing, and responding to requests for information. Uniformity in the fee structure (but not necessarily in the amount of fees) makes this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] easier for secured parties to use and reduces the likelihood that a filed record will be rejected for failure to pay at least the correct amount of the fee. See Section 9-516(b)(2) [30-9A-516(2)(b)].

The costs of processing electronic records are less than those with respect to written records. Accordingly, this section mandates a lower fee as an incentive to file electronically and imposes the additional charge (if any) for multiple debtors only with respect to written records. When written records are used, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] encourages the use of the uniform forms in Section 9-521 [30-9A-521, forms not adopted in Montana]. The fee for filing these forms should be no greater than the fee for other written records.

To make the relevant information included in a filed record more accessible once the record is found, this section mandates a higher fee for longer written records than for shorter ones. Finally, recognizing that financing statements naming more than one debtor are most often filed against a husband and wife, any additional charge for multiple debtors applies to records filed with respect to more than two debtors, rather than with respect to more than one.

Senate Bill No. 23 was passed and approved as Ch. 179, L. 2001. Section 29, Ch. 396, substituted (1) concerning fees to be set and deposited in accordance with 2-15-405 for former (1) through (4) that read: "(1) Except as otherwise provided in subsection (5), the fee for filing and indexing a record under this part, other than an initial financing statement of the kind described in 30-9-522(3), must be commensurate with costs and must be established by rule.

(2) Except as otherwise provided in subsection (5), the fee for filing and indexing an initial financing statement of the kind described in 30-9-522(3) must be commensurate with costs and must be established by rule.

(3) The number of names required to be indexed does not affect the amount of the fees in subsections (1) and (2).

(4) The fee for responding to a request for information from the filing office, including for communicating whether there is on file any financing statement naming a particular debtor,

30-9A-526. Filing-office rules.

Official Comments

1. Source. New; subsection (b) [subsection (2)] derives in part from the Uniform Consumer Credit Code (1974).

2. Rules Required. Operating a filing office is a complicated business, requiring many more rules and procedures than this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] can usefully provide. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] requires the adoption of rules to carry out the provisions of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A]. The filing-office rules must be consistent with the provisions of the statute and adopted in accordance with local procedures. The publication requirement informs secured parties about filing-office practices, aids secured parties in evaluating filing-related risks and costs, and promotes regularity of application within the filing office.

3. Importance of Uniformity. In today's national economy, uniformity of the policies and practices of the filing offices will reduce the costs of secured transactions substantially. The International Association of Corporate Administrators (IACA), referred to in subsection (b) [subsection (2)], is an organization whose membership includes filing officers from every State. These individuals are responsible for the proper functioning of the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] filing system and have worked diligently to develop model filing-office rules, with a view toward efficiency and uniformity.

Although uniformity is an important desideratum, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] affords considerable flexibility in the adoption of filing-office rules. Each State may adopt a version of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] that reflects the desired relationship between the statewide filing office described in Section 9-501(a)(2) [30-9A-501(1)(b)] and the local filing offices described in Section 9-501(a)(1) [30-9A-501(1)(a)] and that takes into account the practices of its filing offices. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] need not designate a single official or agency to adopt rules applicable to all filing offices, and the rules applicable to the statewide filing office need not be identical to those applicable to the local filing office. For example, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] might provide for the statewide filing office to adopt filing-office rules, and, if not prohibited by other law, the filing office might adopt one set of rules for itself and another for local offices. Or, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] might designate one official or agency to adopt rules for the statewide filing office and another to adopt rules for local filing offices.

Part Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Cancellation of Promissory Notes — Erases Security Interest: In fashioning judgment in a case involving fraud and misrepresentation, the District Court awarded the bank all of plaintiff's property and canceled all of the promissory notes from plaintiffs to the bank. The bank contended this violated its rights as a secured creditor. It contended it was entitled to a variety of options in enforcing its security interest and could not be forced to satisfy its claim by taking possession of the property. On appeal, the Supreme Court upheld the award. By finding the bank guilty of fraud and misrepresentation, the trial court could properly cancel the promissory notes. Canceling the notes erased the bank's specific security interests. Having canceled the notes, the trial court, sitting in equity, had a great deal of leeway in fashioning a remedy. The remedy allowed the bank to mitigate its losses and was proper. Crystal Springs Trout Co. v. First State Bank of Froid, 225 M 122, 732 P2d 819, 44 St. Rep. 90 (1987).

30-9A-601. Rights after default — judicial enforcement — consignor or buyer of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-501(1), (2), (5) [30-9-501(1), (2), (5), now repealed].

2. Enforcement: In General. The rights of a secured party to enforce its security interest in collateral after the debtor's default are an important feature of a secured transaction. (Note that the term "rights," as defined in Section 1-201 [30-1-201], includes "remedies.") This Part provides those rights as well as certain limitations on their exercise for the protection of the defaulting debtor, other creditors, and other affected persons. However, subsections (a) and (d) [subsections (1) and (4)] make clear that the rights provided in this Part do not exclude other rights provided by agreement.

3. When Remedies Arise. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] the secured party's rights arise "[a]fter default." As did former Section 9-501 [30-9-501, now repealed], this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] leaves to the agreement of the parties the circumstances giving rise to a default. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not determine whether a secured party's post-default conduct can constitute a waiver of default in the face of an agreement stating that such conduct shall not constitute a waiver. Rather, it continues to leave to the parties' agreement, as supplemented by law other than this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], the determination whether a default has occurred or has been waived. See Section 1-103 [30-1-103].

4. Possession of Collateral; Section 9-207 [30-9A-207]. After a secured party takes possession of collateral following a default, there is no longer any distinction between a security interest that before default was nonpossessory and a security interest that was possessory before default, as under a common-law pledge. This Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] generally does not distinguish between the rights of a secured party with a nonpossessory security interest and those of a secured party with a possessory security interest. However, Section 9-207 [30-9A-207] addresses rights and duties with respect to collateral in a secured party's possession. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] of this section, Section 9-207 [30-9A-207] applies not only to possession before default but also to possession after default. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] also has been conformed to Section 9-207 [30-9A-207], which, unlike former Section 9-207 [30-9-207, now repealed, see 30-9A-207], applies to secured parties having control of collateral.

5. Cumulative Remedies. Former Section 9-501(1) [30-9-501(1), now repealed] provided that the secured party's remedies were cumulative, but it did not explicitly provide whether the remedies could be exercised simultaneously. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] permits the simultaneous exercise of remedies if the secured party acts in good faith. The liability scheme of Subpart 2 [30-9A-625 through 30-9A-628] affords redress to an aggrieved debtor or obligor.

Moreover, permitting the simultaneous exercise of remedies under subsection (c) [subsection (3)] does not override any non-UCC law, including the law of tort and statutes regulating collection of debts, under which the simultaneous exercise of remedies in a particular case constitutes abusive behavior or harassment giving rise to liability.

6. Judicial Enforcement. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] a secured party may reduce its claim to judgment or foreclose its interest by any available procedure outside this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] under applicable law. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] generally follows former Section 9-501(5) [30-9-501(5), now repealed]. It makes clear that any judicial lien that the secured party may acquire against the collateral effectively is a continuation of the original security interest (if perfected) and not the acquisition of a new interest or a transfer of property on account of a preexisting obligation. Under former Section 9-501(5) [30-9-501(5), now repealed], the judicial lien was stated to relate back to the date of perfection of the security interest. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)], however, provides that the lien relates back to the earlier of the date of filing or the date of perfection. This provides a secured party who enforces a security interest by judicial process with the benefit of the "first-to-file-or-perfect" priority rule of Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)].

7. Agricultural Liens. Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] provides parallel treatment for the enforcement of agricultural liens and security interests. Because agricultural liens are statutory rather than consensual, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does draw a few distinctions between these liens and security interests. Under subsection (e) [subsection (5)], the statute creating an agricultural lien would govern whether and the date to which an execution lien relates back. Section 9-606 [30-9A-606] explains when a "default" occurs in the agricultural lien context.

8. Execution Sales. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] also follows former Section 9-501(5) [30-9-501(5), now repealed]. It makes clear that an execution sale is an appropriate method of foreclosure contemplated by this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. However, the sale is governed by other law and not by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], and the limitations under Section 9-610 [30-9A-610] on the right of a secured party to purchase collateral do not apply.

9. Sales of Receivables; Consignments. Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] provides that, except as provided in Section 9-607(c) [30-9A-607(3)], the duties imposed on secured parties do not apply to buyers of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes. Although denominated "secured parties," these buyers own the entire interest in the property sold and so may enforce their rights without regard to the seller ("debtor") or the seller's creditors. Likewise, a true consignor may enforce its ownership interest under other law without regard to the duties that this Part imposes on secured parties. Note, however, that Section 9-615 [30-9A-615] governs cases in which a consignee's secured party (other than a consignor) is enforcing a security interest that is senior to the security interest (i.e., ownership interest) of a true consignor.

30-9A-602. Waiver and variance of rights and duties.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-501(3) [30-9-501(3), now repealed].

2. Waiver: In General. Section 1-102(3) [30-1-102(3)] addresses which provisions of the UCC are mandatory and which may be varied by agreement. With exceptions relating to good faith, diligence, reasonableness, and care, immediate parties, as between themselves, may vary its provisions by agreement. However, in the context of rights and duties after default, our legal system traditionally has looked with suspicion on agreements that limit the debtor's rights and free the secured party of its duties. As stated in former Section 9-501 [30-9-501, now repealed], Comment 4, "no mortgage clause has ever been allowed to clog the equity of redemption." The context of default offers great opportunity for overreaching. The suspicious attitudes of the courts have been grounded in common sense. This section, like former Section 9-501(3) [30-9-501(3), now repealed], codifies this long-standing and deeply rooted attitude. The specified rights of the debtor and duties of the secured party may not be waived or varied except as stated. Provisions that are not specified in this section are subject to the general rules in Section 1-102(3) [30-1-102(3)].

3. Nonwaivable Rights and Duties. This section revises former Section 9-501(3) [30-9-501(3), now repealed] by restricting the ability to waive or modify additional specified rights and duties: (i) duties under Section 9-207(b)(4)(C) [30-9A-207(2)(d)(iii)], which deals with the use and operation of consumer goods, (ii) the right to a response to a request for an accounting, concerning a list of collateral, or concerning a statement of account (Section 9-210 [30-9A-210]), (iii) the duty to collect collateral in a commercially reasonable manner (Section 9-607 [30-9A-607]), (iv) the implicit duty to refrain from a breach of the peace in taking possession of collateral under Section 9-609 [30-9A-609], (v) the duty to apply noncash proceeds of collection or disposition in a commercially reasonable manner (Sections 9-608 and 9-615 [30-9A-608 and 30-9A-615]), (vi) the right to a special method of calculating a surplus or deficiency in certain dispositions to a secured party, a person related to secured party, or a secondary obligor (Section 9-615 [30-9A-615]), (vii) the duty to give an explanation of the calculation of a surplus or deficiency (Section 9-616 [30-9A-616]), (viii) the right to limitations on the effectiveness of certain waivers (Section 9-624 [30-9A-624]), and (ix) the right to hold a secured party liable for failure to comply with this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] (Sections 9-625 and 9-626 [30-9A-625 and 30-9A-626]). For clarity and consistency, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] uses the term "waive or vary" instead of "renounc[e] or modify[]," which appeared in former Section 9-504(3) [30-9-504(3), now repealed].

This section provides generally that the specified rights and duties "may not be waived or varied." However, it does not restrict the ability of parties to agree to settle, compromise, or renounce claims for past conduct that may have constituted a violation or breach of those rights and duties, even if the settlement involves an express "waiver."

4. Waiver by Debtors and Obligors. The restrictions on waiver contained in this section apply to obligors as well as debtors. This resolves a question under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] as to whether secondary obligors, assuming that they were "debtors" for purposes of former Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9, part 5, now repealed], were permitted to waive, under the law of suretyship, rights and duties under that Part.

5. Certain Post-Default Waivers. Section 9-624 [30-9A-624] permits post-default waivers in limited circumstances. These waivers must be made in agreements that are authenticated. Under Section 1-201 [30-1-201], an "'agreement' means the bargain of the parties in fact." In considering waivers under Section 9-624 [30-9A-624] and analogous agreements in other contexts, courts should carefully scrutinize putative agreements that appear in records that also address many additional or unrelated matters.

2. Limitation on Ability to Set Standards. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)], like former Section 9-501(3) [30-9-501(3), now repealed], permits the parties to set standards for compliance with the rights and duties under this Part if the standards are not "manifestly unreasonable." Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], the parties are not permitted to set standards measuring fulfillment of the secured party's duty to take collateral without breaching the peace.

Official Comments

2. Real-Property-Related Collateral. The collateral in many transactions consists of both real and personal property. In the interest of simplicity, speed, and economy, subsection (a) [subsection (1)], like former Section 9-501(4) [30-9-501(4), now repealed], permits (but does not require) the secured party to proceed as to both real and personal property in accordance with its rights and remedies with respect to the real property. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] also makes clear that a secured party who exercises rights under Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] with respect to personal property does not prejudice any rights under real-property law.

This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not address certain other real-property-related problems. In a number of States, the exercise of remedies by a creditor who is secured by both real property and non-real property collateral is governed by special legal rules. For example, under some anti-deficiency laws, creditors risk loss of rights against personal property collateral if they err in enforcing their rights against the real property. Under a "one-form-of-action" rule (or rule against splitting a cause of action), a creditor who judicially enforces a real property mortgage and does not proceed in the same action to enforce a security interest in personalty may (among other consequences) lose the right to proceed against the personalty. Although statutes of this kind create impediments to enforcement of security interests, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not override these limitations under other law.

3. Fixtures. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is new. It makes clear that a security interest in fixtures may be enforced either under real-property law or under any of the applicable provisions of Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6], including sale or other disposition either before or after removal of the fixtures (see subsection (c) [subsection (3)]). Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] also serves to overrule cases holding that a secured party's only remedy after default is the removal of the fixtures from the real property. See, e.g., Maplewood Bank & Trust v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 625 A.2d 537 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 1993).

Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] generally follows former Section 9-313(8) [30-9-313(8), now repealed]. It gives the secured party the right to remove fixtures under certain circumstances. A secured party whose security interest in fixtures has priority over owners and encumbrancers of the real property may remove the collateral from the real property. However, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] requires the secured party to reimburse any owner (other than the debtor) or encumbrancer for the cost of repairing any physical injury caused by the removal. This right to reimbursement is implemented by the last sentence of subsection (d) [subsection (4)], which gives the owner or encumbrancer a right to security or indemnity as a condition for giving permission to remove.

CASES DECIDED AFTER 1999 REVISION

Evidence of Malicious Attachment — Motion to Dismiss Properly Denied: In Spooner Constr. & Tree Serv., Inc. v. Maner, 2000 MT 161, 300 M 268, 3 P3d 641 (2000), it was held that plaintiff admitted no entitlement to any money from a logging agreement or any rental fees associated with defendant's use of a logging skidder. Nevertheless, plaintiff made no attempt to contact defendant to submit a bill, request payment, or discuss the logging contract, but instead, after disabling the skidder, plaintiff filed a lien against and later attached the skidder, with the intent to bid on it at a Sheriff's sale. Defendant presented both direct and circumstantial evidence that, without probable cause, plaintiff wrongfully attached the skidder with an improper motive and with reckless disregard for the facts, constituting a prima facie case of malicious wrongful attachment. Plaintiff's motion to dismiss was properly denied. Spooner Constr. & Tree Serv., Inc. v. Maner, 2003 MT 43, 314 M 268, 66 P3d 263 (2003).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Filing of Quitclaim Deed Not Precluding Deficiency Judgment in Foreclosure Proceeding: To secure a bank loan in a different transaction, the Haugens gave the bank a quitclaim deed to a motel that they had agreed to purchase under a contract for deed. The Haugens defaulted on the bank loan. The bank's filing of the deed did not preclude the bank from a deficiency judgment in its foreclosure action in regard to the other transaction. Prior to that default and the bank's filing of the deed, the Haugens had defaulted on the contract for deed and had relinquished any interest in the motel. The Haugens contended that once the bank filed the deed, it could not collect a deficiency judgment. However, because the Haugens no longer had an interest in the motel, the bank could take nothing from the deed and the bank's filing of the deed had no legal effect. Blaine Bank of Mont. v. Haugen, 249 M 381, 816 P2d 447, 48 St. Rep. 777 (1991), affirmed in Blaine Bank of Mont. v. Haugen, 260 M 29, 858 P2d 14, 50 St. Rep. 927 (1993).

Remedies Provided by Agreement Not Precluded: The statement of rights and remedies of the Uniform Commercial Code does not exclude other remedies provided by agreement. Ottersen v. Rubick, 246 M 93, 803 P2d 1066, 47 St. Rep. 2274 (1990).

Promissory Note Secured by Alleged Mortgage on Real Property as Well as Collateral — Writ of Attachment for Possession of Collateral Harmless Error: Defendants, who borrowed $5,000, claimed the District Court erred in issuing a Writ of Attachment when the promissory note was secured by an alleged mortgage on real property as well as other collateral. The Supreme Court found a grave question as to whether the wording of the note constituted a hypothecation for real estate mortgage purposes, but noted that the parties did not dispute a security interest in the other collateral. Under the Uniform Commercial Code, plaintiff as secured party had the right to take possession of the collateral upon default, and the alleged erroneous issuance of the Writ of Attachment to take possession of the collateral was harmless error. Montgomery v. Hunt, 227 M 279, 738 P2d 887, 44 St. Rep. 1081 (1987).

Failure to Give Required Notice of Sale of Collateral — Deficiency Judgment Precluded: Plaintiffs defaulted on loan. Pursuant to an order of the Blackfeet Tribal Court enforceable in the Montana courts as a matter of comity, the creditor sold the collateral and applied the proceeds to the amount due, leaving a deficiency. The loan agreement required notice of sale of collateral to be given at least 5 days before the sale and to state the time and place of the sale. The notice stated neither the time nor the place. This failure of notice precluded the creditor from obtaining a deficiency judgment in the Montana courts. Wippert v. The Blackfeet Tribe of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, 215 M 85, 695 P2d 461, 42 St. Rep. 200 (1985).

Repossession Not Required of Secured Creditor as Condition Precedent to Judgment Against Other Property: The defendant defaulted on a secured loan from the plaintiff, and the plaintiff, rather than repossessing the defendant's personal property in which it had been given a security interest, obtained a judgment against the defendant for the amount owed and brought a declaratory judgment action to determine if the judgment constituted a lien on the defendant's real property. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's ruling that there was no effective lien, holding that the plaintiff was not required to first repossess the secured property and then sue for the deficiency. AVCO Financial Serv. of Billings One, Inc. v. Christiaens, 201 M 117, 651 P2d 220, 39 St. Rep. 1993 (1982).

Guaranty Distinguished From Other Contracts: Guarantors are not "debtors" within meaning of section of Uniform Commercial Code prohibiting waiver of rules granting rights to debtor and imposing duties on the secured party. First Nat'l Park Bank v. Johnson, 553 F2d 599 (C.A. Mont. 1977), distinguished in Westmont Tractor Co. v. Continental I, Inc., 224 M 516, 731 P2d 327, 43 St. Rep. 2380 (1986).

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Duties to Unknown Persons. This section relieves a secured party from duties owed to a debtor or obligor, if the secured party does not know about the debtor or obligor. Similarly, it relieves a secured party from duties owed to a secured party or lienholder who has filed a financing statement against the debtor, if the secured party does not know about the debtor. For example, a secured party may be unaware that the original debtor has sold the collateral subject to the security interest and that the new owner has become the debtor. If so, the secured party owes no duty to the new owner (debtor) or to a secured party who has filed a financing statement against the new owner. This section should be read in conjunction with the exculpatory provisions in Section 9-628 [30-9A-628]. Note that it relieves a secured party not only from duties arising under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] but also from duties arising under other law by virtue of the secured party's status as such under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], unless the other law otherwise provides.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Time of Default. Remedies under this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] become available upon the debtor's "default." See Section 9-601 [30-9A-601]. This section explains when "default" occurs in the agricultural-lien context. It requires one to consult the enabling statute to determine when the lienholder is entitled to enforce the lien.

30-9A-607. Collection and enforcement by secured party.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-502 [30-9-502, now repealed]; subsections (b), (d), and (e) [subsections (2), (4), and (5)] are new.

2. Collections: In General. Collateral consisting of rights to payment is not only the most liquid asset of a typical debtor's business but also is property that may be collected without any interruption of the debtor's business This situation is far different from that in which collateral is inventory or equipment, whose removal may bring the business to a halt. Furthermore, problems of valuation and identification, present with collateral that is tangible personal property, frequently are not as serious in the case of rights to payment and other intangible collateral. Consequently, this section, like former Section 9-502 [30-9-502, now repealed], recognizes that financing through assignments of intangibles lacks many of the complexities that arise after default in other types of financing. This section allows the assignee to liquidate collateral by collecting whatever may become due on the collateral, whether or not the method of collection contemplated by the security arrangement before default was direct (i.e., payment by the account debtor to the assignee, "notification" financing) or indirect (i.e., payment by the account debtor to the assignor, "nonnotification" financing).

3. Scope. The scope of this section is broader than that of former Section 9-502 [30-9-502, now repealed]. It applies not only to collections from account debtors and obligors on instruments but also to enforcement more generally against all persons obligated on collateral. It explicitly provides for the secured party's enforcement of the debtor's rights in respect of the account debtor's (and other third parties') obligations and for the secured party's enforcement of supporting obligations with respect to those obligations. (Supporting obligations are components of the collateral under Section 9-203(f) [30-9A-203(6)].) The rights of a secured party under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] include the right to enforce claims that the debtor may enjoy against others. For example, the claims might include a breach- of-warranty claim arising out of a defect in equipment that is collateral or a secured party's action for an injunction against infringement of a patent that is collateral. Those claims typically would be proceeds of original collateral under Section 9-315 [30-9A-315].

4. Collection and Enforcement Before Default. Like Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] generally, this section deals with the rights and duties of secured parties following default. However, as did former Section 9-502 [30-9-502, now repealed] with respect to collection rights, this section also applies to the collection and enforcement rights of secured parties even if a default has not occurred, as long as the debtor has so agreed. It is not unusual for debtors to agree that secured parties are entitled to collect and enforce rights against account debtors prior to default.

5. Collections by Junior Secured Party. A secured party who holds a security interest in a right to payment may exercise the right to collect and enforce under this section, even if the security interest is subordinate to a conflicting security interest in the same right to payment. Whether the junior secured party has priority in the collected proceeds depends on whether the junior secured party qualifies for priority as a purchaser of an instrument (e.g., the account debtor's check) under Section 9-330(d) [30-9A-330(4)], as a holder in due course of an instrument under Sections 3-305 and 9-331(a) [30-3-305 and 30-9A-331(1)], or as a transferee of money under Section 9-332(a) [30-9A-332(1)]. See Sections 9-330 [30-9A-330], Comment 7; 9-331 [30-9A-331], Comment 5; and 9-332 [30-9A-332].

6. Relationship to Rights and Duties of Persons Obligated on Collateral. This section permits a secured party to collect and enforce obligations included in collateral in its capacity as a secured party. It is not necessary for a secured party first to become the owner of the collateral pursuant to a disposition or acceptance. However, the secured party's rights, as between it and the debtor, to collect from and enforce collateral against account debtors and others obligated on collateral under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] are subject to Section 9-341 [30-9A-341], Part 4 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 4], and other applicable law. Neither this section nor former Section 9-502 [30-9-502, now repealed] should be understood to regulate the duties of an account debtor or other person obligated on collateral. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] makes this explicit. For example, the secured party may be unable to exercise the debtor's rights under an instrument if the debtor is in possession of the instrument, or under a non-transferable letter of credit if the debtor is the beneficiary. Unless a secured party has control over a letter-of-credit right and is entitled to receive payment or performance from the issuer or a nominated person under Article 5 [Title 30, chapter 5], its remedies with respect to the letter-of-credit right may be limited to the recovery of any identifiable proceeds from the debtor. This section establishes only the baseline rights of the secured party vis-a-vis the debtor-the secured party is entitled to enforce and collect after default or earlier if so agreed.

7. Deposit Account Collateral. Subsections (a)(4) and (5) [subsections (1)(d) and (1)(e)] set forth the self-help remedy for a secured party whose collateral is a deposit account. Subsection (a)(4) [subsection (1)(d)] addresses the rights of a secured party that is the bank with which the deposit account is maintained. That secured party automatically has control of the deposit account under Section 9-104(a)(1) [30-9A-104(1)(a)]. After default, and otherwise if so agreed, the bank/secured party may apply the funds on deposit to the secured obligation.

If a security interest of a third party is perfected by control (Section 9-104(a)(2) or (a)(3) [30-9A-104(1)(b) or (1)(c)]), then after default, and otherwise if so agreed, the secured party may instruct the bank to pay out the funds in the account. If the third party has control under Section 9-104(a)(3) [30-9A-104(1)(c)], the depositary institution is obliged to obey the instruction because the secured party is its customer. See Section 4-401 [30-4-401]. If the third party has control under Section 9-104(a)(2) [30-9A-104(1)(b)], the control agreement determines the depositary institution's obligation to obey.

If a security interest in a deposit account is unperfected, or is perfected by filing by virtue of the proceeds rules of Section 9-315 [30-9A-315], the depositary institution ordinarily owes no obligation to obey the secured party's instructions. See Section 9-341 [30-9A-341]. To reach the funds without the debtor's cooperation, the secured party must use an available judicial procedure.

8. Rights Against Mortgagor of Real Property. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] addresses the situation in which the collateral consists of a mortgage note (or other obligation secured by a mortgage on real property). After the debtor's (mortgagee's) default, the secured party (assignee) may wish to proceed with a nonjudicial foreclosure of the mortgage securing the note but may be unable to do so because it has not become the assignee of record. The assignee/secured party may not have taken a recordable assignment at the commencement of the transaction (perhaps the mortgage note in question was one of hundreds assigned to the secured party as collateral). Having defaulted, the mortgagee may be unwilling to sign a recordable assignment. This section enables the secured party (assignee) to become the assignee of record by recording in the applicable real-property records the security agreement and an affidavit certifying default. Of course, the secured party's rights derive from those of its debtor. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] would not entitle the secured party to proceed with a foreclosure unless the mortgagor also were in default or the debtor (mortgagee) otherwise enjoyed the right to foreclose.

9. Commercial Reasonableness. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that the secured party's collection and enforcement rights under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] must be exercised in a commercially reasonable manner. These rights include the right to settle and compromise claims against the account debtor. The secured party's failure to observe the standard of commercial reasonableness could render it liable to an aggrieved person under Section 9-625 [30-9A-625], and the secured party's recovery of a deficiency would be subject to Section 9-626 [30-9A-626]. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] does not apply if, as is characteristic of most sales of accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, and promissory notes, the secured party (buyer) has no right of recourse against the debtor (seller) or a secondary obligor. However, if the secured party does have a right of recourse, the commercial-reasonableness standard applies to collection and enforcement even though the assignment to the secured party was a "true" sale. The obligation to proceed in a commercially reasonable manner arises because the collection process affects the extent of the seller's recourse liability, not because the seller retains an interest in the sold collateral (the seller does not).

10. Attorney's Fees and Legal Expenses. The phrase "reasonable attorney's fees and legal expenses," which appears in subsection (d) [subsection (4)], includes only those fees and expenses incurred in proceeding against account debtors or other third parties. The secured party's right to recover these expenses from the collections arises automatically under this section. The secured party also may incur other attorney's fees and legal expenses in proceeding against the debtor or obligor. Whether the secured party has a right to recover those fees and expenses depends on whether the debtor or obligor has agreed to pay them, as is the case with respect to attorney's fees and legal expenses under Sections 9-608(a)(1)(A) and 9-615(a)(1) [30-9A-608(1)(a)(i) and 30-9A-615(1)(a)]. The parties also may agree to allocate a portion of the secured party's overhead to collection and enforcement under subsection (d) or Section 9-608(a) [subsection (4) or 30-9A-608(1)].

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Notification of Account Debtor by Secured Party Not Interference With Third-Party Contracts: A bank that was an undisputed secured party contacted the debtor's customers and instructed them to pay their debts directly to the bank, which the debtor contended was tortious interference with its third-party contracts. However, under 30-9-502 (now repealed, see 30-9A-607 and 30-9A-608), a secured party is entitled to notify an account debtor to make payment to the secured party in the event of default, and such notification does not constitute tortious interference. Citizens First Nat'l Bank of Wolf Point v. Moe Motor Co., 248 M 495, 813 P2d 400, 48 St. Rep. 528 (1991).

30-9A-608. Application of proceeds of collection or enforcement — liability for deficiency and right to surplus.

Official Comments

1. Source. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is new; subsection (b) [subsection (2)] derives from former Section 9-502(2) [30-9-502(2), now repealed].

2. Modifications of Prior Law. Subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] modify former Section 9-502(2) [30-9-502(2), now repealed] by explicitly providing for the application of proceeds recovered by the secured party in substantially the same manner as provided in Section 9-615(a) and (e) [30-9A-615(1) and (5)] for dispositions of collateral.

3. Surplus and Deficiency. Subsections (a)(4) and (b) [subsections (1)(d) and (2)] omit, as unnecessary, the references contained in former Section 9-502(2) [30-9-502(2), now repealed] to agreements varying the baseline rules on surplus and deficiency. The parties are always free to agree that an obligor will not be liable for a deficiency, even if the collateral secures an obligation, and that an obligor is liable for a deficiency, even if the transaction is a sale of receivables. For parallel provisions, see Section 9-615(d) and (e) [30-9A-615(4) and (5)].

4. Noncash Proceeds. Subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)] addresses the situation in which an enforcing secured party receives noncash proceeds.

Example: An enforcing secured party receives a promissory note from an account debtor who is unable to pay an account when it is due. The secured party accepts the note in exchange for extending the date on which the account debtor's obligation is due. The secured party may wish to credit its debtor (the assignor) with the principal amount of the note upon receipt of the note, but probably will prefer to credit the debtor only as and when the note is paid.

Under subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)], the secured party is under no duty to apply the note or its value to the outstanding obligation unless its failure to do so would be commercially unreasonable. If the secured party does apply the note to the outstanding obligation, however, it must do so in a commercially reasonable manner. The parties may provide for the method of application of noncash proceeds by agreement, if the method is not manifestly unreasonable. See Section 9-603 [30-9A-603]. This section does not explain when the failure to apply noncash proceeds would be commercially unreasonable; it leaves that determination to case-by-case adjudication. In the example, the secured party appears to have accepted the account debtor's note in order to increase the likelihood of payment and decrease the likelihood that the account debtor would dispute its obligation. Under these circumstances, it may well be commercially reasonable for the secured party to credit its debtor's obligations only as and when cash proceeds are collected from the account debtor, especially given the uncertainty that attends the account debtor's eventual payment. For an example of a secured party's receipt of noncash proceeds in which it may well be commercially unreasonable for the secured party to delay crediting its debtor's obligations with the value of noncash proceeds, see Section 9-615 [30-9A-615], Comment 3.

When the secured party is not required to "apply or pay over for application noncash proceeds," the proceeds nonetheless remain collateral subject to this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. If the secured party were to dispose of them, for example, appropriate notification would be required (see Section 9-611 [30-9A-611]), and the disposition would be subject to the standards provided in this Part (see Section 9-610 [30-9A-610]). Moreover, a secured party in possession of the noncash proceeds would have the duties specified in Section 9-207 [30-9A-207].

5. No Effect on Priority of Senior Security Interest. The application of proceeds required by subsection (a) [subsection (1)] does not affect the priority of a security interest in collateral which is senior to the interest of the secured party who is collecting or enforcing collateral under Section 9-607 [30-9A-607]. Although subsection (a) [subsection (1)] imposes a duty to apply proceeds to the enforcing secured party's expenses and to the satisfaction of the secured obligations owed to it and to subordinate secured parties, that duty applies only among the enforcing secured party and those persons. Concerning the priority of a junior secured party who collects and enforces collateral, see Section 9-607 [30-9A-607], Comment 5.

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Absence of Claim for Foreclosure of Security Interest — Award of Attorney Fees Improper: The Supreme Court vacated an award of attorney fees made pursuant to 30-9-511 (now repealed) in the absence of a claim regarding foreclosure of a security interest in personal property. Schulke v. Gemar, 264 M 184, 870 P2d 1378, 51 St. Rep. 220 (1994).

Stipulation by Parties Not Binding: In an action to foreclose a mortgage of real property or a security interest in personal property the court must allow as a part of the costs a reasonable attorney's fee which shall be fixed by the court notwithstanding any stipulation in the instrument of any agreement between the parties to the contrary. Stewart v. Casey, 182 M 185, 595 P2d 1176 (1979).

Tortious Conversion in Foreclosure: When a complaint alleged a tortious conversion against some defendants in a foreclosure action against another defendant, 30-9-511 (now repealed) was not applicable to the former. However, defendants in the alleged tortious conversion were entitled to attorney fees by virtue of 28-3-704, even though such action arose out of events that occurred prior to that section's effective date. Belgrade St. Bank v. Swainson, 172 M 350, 564 P2d 174 (1977).

Deficiency After Foreclosure: The provision for allowance of attorney's fees did not apply to an action in personam on the note after exhaustion of the security. Goggins v. Bookout, 141 M 449, 378 P2d 212 (1963).

Priority of Claim: The cost of extending abstract and attorney fees borne by mortgagee seeking foreclosure took priority over federal tax liens, which attached after the mortgage was in default. Streeter Bros. v. Overfelt, 202 F. Supp. 143 (D.C. Mont. 1962).

Defense Attorney's Fees: Section 30-9-511 (now repealed) making it incumbent upon the District Court in a mortgage foreclosure action to allow a reasonable attorney's fee applies as well to the fees of defense counsel when the action has been dismissed. Graham v. Superior Mines, 100 M 427, 49 P2d 443 (1935), distinguished in Valeo v. Tabish, 1999 MT 146, 295 M 34, 983 P2d 334, 56 St. Rep. 579 (1999).

Power of Sale in Mortgage: Where a chattel mortgage provides that in case of default in payment of the note secured, the mortgagee may have the property sold and out of the proceeds retain a reasonable attorney's fee, the only method of recovering it is by sale, and therefore the mortgagor may not assert that the fee intended was one to be fixed by the court in its discretion on institution of foreclosure proceedings. Nett v. Stockgrowers' Fin. Corp., 84 M 116, 274 P 497 (1929).

Evidence as to Fees: In fixing an attorney's fee in a foreclosure proceeding the District Court may consider the practice of the court and its own knowledge of the usual compensation for such services, and while it also may call to its aid attorneys as expert witnesses, it is not required to make its decision in accordance with their testimony. Bohan v. Harris, 71 M 495, 230 P 586 (1924).

Pleadings as to Fees: Under 30-9-511 (now repealed), the District Court must allow a reasonable attorney's fee in a foreclosure action, and with its determination in that respect the parties have nothing to do; hence allegations in the pleadings with reference thereto present no issues of fact and are surplusage. Bohan v. Harris, 71 M 495, 230 P 586 (1924).

30-9A-609. Secured party's right to take possession after default.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-503 [30-9-503, now repealed].

2. Secured Party's Right to Possession. This section follows former Section 9-503 [30-9-503, now repealed] and earlier uniform legislation. It provides that the secured party is entitled to take possession of collateral after default.

3. Judicial Process; Breach of Peace. Subsection (b) [subsection (2)] permits a secured party to proceed under this section without judicial process if it does so "without breach of the peace." Although former Section 9-503 [30-9-503, now repealed] placed the same condition on a secured party's right to take possession of collateral, subsection (b) [subsection (2)] extends the condition to the right provided in subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] as well. Like former Section 9-503 [30-9-503, now repealed], this section does not define or explain the conduct that will constitute a breach of the peace, leaving that matter for continuing development by the courts. In considering whether a secured party has engaged in a breach of the peace, however, courts should hold the secured party responsible for the actions of others taken on the secured party's behalf, including independent contractors engaged by the secured party to take possession of collateral.

This section does not authorize a secured party who repossesses without judicial process to utilize the assistance of a law-enforcement officer. A number of cases have held that a repossessing secured party's use of a law-enforcement officer without benefit of judicial process constituted a failure to comply with former Section 9-503 [30-9-503, now repealed].

4. Damages for Breach of Peace. Concerning damages that may be recovered based on a secured party's breach of the peace in connection with taking possession of collateral, see Section 9-625 [30-9A-625], Comment 3.

5. Multiple Secured Parties. More than one secured party may be entitled to take possession of collateral under this section. Conflicting rights to possession among secured parties are resolved by the priority rules of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Thus, a senior secured party is entitled to possession as against a junior claimant. Non-UCC law governs whether a junior secured party in possession of collateral is liable to the senior in conversion. Normally, a junior who refuses to relinquish possession of collateral upon the demand of a secured party having a superior possessory right to the collateral would be liable in conversion.

6. Secured Party's Right to Disable and Dispose of Equipment on Debtor's Premises. In the case of some collateral, such as heavy equipment, the physical removal from the debtor's plant and the storage of the collateral pending disposition may be impractical or unduly expensive. This section follows former Section 9-503 [30-9-503, now repealed] by providing that, in lieu of removal, the secured party may render equipment unusable or may dispose of collateral on the debtor's premises. Unlike former Section 9-503 [30-9-503, now repealed], however, this section explicitly conditions these rights on the debtor's default. Of course, this section does not validate unreasonable action by a secured party. Under Section 9-610 [30-9A-610], all aspects of a disposition must be commercially reasonable.

7. Debtor's Agreement to Assemble Collateral. This section follows former Section 9-503 [30-9-503, now repealed] also by validating a debtor's agreement to assemble collateral and make it available to a secured party at a place that the secured party designates. Similar to the treatment of agreements to permit collection prior to default under Section 9-607 [30-9A-607] and former 9-502 [30-9-502, now repealed], however, this section validates these agreements whether or not they are conditioned on the debtor's default. For example, a debtor might agree to make available to a secured party, from time to time, any instruments or negotiable documents that the debtor receives on account of collateral. A court should not infer from this section's validation that a debtor's agreement to assemble and make available collateral would not be enforceable under other applicable law.

8. Agreed Standards. Subject to the limitation imposed by Section 9-603(b) [30-9A-603(2)], this section's provisions concerning agreements to assemble and make available collateral and a secured party's right to disable equipment and dispose of collateral on a debtor's premises are likely topics for agreement on standards as contemplated by Section 9-603 [30-9A-603].

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED AFTER 1999 REVISION

Evidence of Malicious Attachment — Motion to Dismiss Properly Denied: In Spooner Constr. & Tree Serv., Inc. v. Maner, 2000 MT 161, 300 M 268, 3 P3d 641 (2000), it was held that plaintiff admitted no entitlement to any money from a logging agreement or any rental fees associated with defendant's use of a logging skidder. Nevertheless, plaintiff made no attempt to contact defendant to submit a bill, request payment, or discuss the logging contract, but instead, after disabling the skidder, plaintiff filed a lien against and later attached the skidder, with the intent to bid on it at a Sheriff's sale. Defendant presented both direct and circumstantial evidence that, without probable cause, plaintiff wrongfully attached the skidder with an improper motive and with reckless disregard for the facts, constituting a prima facie case of malicious wrongful attachment. Plaintiff's motion to dismiss was properly denied. Spooner Constr. & Tree Serv., Inc. v. Maner, 2003 MT 43, 314 M 268, 66 P3d 263 (2003).

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Possession Upon Default: Debtor farmers brought suit against the Farmers Home Administration for alleged failure to properly notify farmers prior to disposing of collateral on debtor farmers' default. Under Montana law, a second creditor may take possession of loan collateral upon default without judicial process. Love v. U.S. 60 F3d 642 (9th Cir. 1995).

Lock Cutting Breach of Peace: The Supreme Court reversed the lower court's ruling that the defendant, Dorn Equipment Company, Inc., had not breached the peace when it cut a lock on the Martins' property to repossess certain farm equipment. The Supreme Court held that any form of forcible entry constitutes a breach of the peace. Martin v. Dorn Equip. Co., Inc., 250 M 422, 821 P2d 1025, 48 St. Rep. 978 (1991).

Obligations of Escrow Holder — Strict Adherence to Agreement: A bank acted as escrow agent in an agreement for the purchase of property. The escrow agreement provided that upon default, the seller was "entitled to the immediate return from the escrow agent of the contract for deed, warranty deeds and abstracts" in order to facilitate foreclosure. The agreement further held the escrow agent "liable only to account for the money received by it and for the delivery of the instruments and documents escrowed". The only obligation of the bank was to adhere strictly to the instructions in the agreement. The bank was not obligated to ascertain whether: (1) the demand for return of the documents was technically correct; (2) the notice of default to the buyer was legally sufficient; (3) performance of the contract was impossible; or (4) the contract and default notice were void for vagueness. Turbiville v. Hansen, 233 M 487, 761 P2d 389, 45 St. Rep. 1665 (1988).

Promissory Note Secured by Alleged Mortgage on Real Property as Well as Collateral — Writ of Attachment for Possession of Collateral Harmless Error: Defendants, who borrowed $5,000, claimed the District Court erred in issuing a Writ of Attachment when the promissory note was secured by an alleged mortgage on real property as well as other collateral. The Supreme Court found a grave question as to whether the wording of the note constituted a hypothecation for real estate mortgage purposes, but noted that the parties did not dispute a security interest in the other collateral. Under the Uniform Commercial Code, plaintiff as secured party had the right to take possession of the collateral upon default, and the alleged erroneous issuance of the Writ of Attachment to take possession of the collateral was harmless error. Montgomery v. Hunt, 227 M 279, 738 P2d 887, 44 St. Rep. 1081 (1987).

Defense: Action for breach of contract and conversion will not prevail where secured party had right to take possession and sell security interest on default. Fairchild v. Williams Feed, Inc., 169 M 18, 544 P2d 1216 (1976).

30-9A-610. Disposition of collateral after default.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-504(1), (3) [30-9-504(1), (3), now repealed].

2. Commercially Reasonable Dispositions. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] follows former Section 9-504 [30-9-504, now repealed] by permitting a secured party to dispose of collateral in a commercially reasonable manner following a default. Although subsection (b) [subsection (2)] permits both public and private dispositions, "every aspect of a disposition . . . must be commercially reasonable." This section encourages private dispositions on the assumption that they frequently will result in higher realization on collateral for the benefit of all concerned. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] does not restrict dispositions to sales; collateral may be sold, leased, licensed, or otherwise disposed. Section 9-627 [30-9A-627] provides guidance for determining the circumstances under which a disposition is "commercially reasonable."

3. Time of Disposition. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not specify a period within which a secured party must dispose of collateral. This is consistent with this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] policy to encourage private dispositions through regular commercial channels. It may, for example, be prudent not to dispose of goods when the market has collapsed. Or, it might be more appropriate to sell a large inventory in parcels over a period of time instead of in bulk. Of course, under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] every aspect of a disposition of collateral must be commercially reasonable. This requirement explicitly includes the "method, manner, time, place and other terms." For example, if a secured party does not proceed under Section 9-620 [30-9A-620] and holds collateral for a long period of time without disposing of it, and if there is no good reason for not making a prompt disposition, the secured party may be determined not to have acted in a "commercially reasonable" manner. See also Section 1-203 [30-1-203] (general obligation of good faith).

4. Pre-Disposition Preparation and Processing. Former Section 9-504(1) [30-9-504(1), now repealed] appeared to give the secured party the choice of disposing of collateral either "in its then condition or following any commercially reasonable preparation or processing." Some courts held that the "commercially reasonable" standard of former Section 9-504(3) [30-9-504(3), now repealed] nevertheless could impose an affirmative duty on the secured party to process or prepare the collateral prior to disposition. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] retains the substance of the quoted language. Although courts should not be quick to impose a duty of preparation or processing on the secured party, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] does not grant the secured party the right to dispose of the collateral "in its then condition" under all circumstances. A secured party may not dispose of collateral "in its then condition" when, taking into account the costs and probable benefits of preparation or processing and the fact that the secured party would be advancing the costs at its risk, it would be commercially unreasonable to dispose of the collateral in that condition.

5. Disposition by Junior Secured Party. Disposition rights under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] are not limited to first-priority security interests. Rather, any secured party as to whom there has been a default enjoys the right to dispose of collateral under this subsection. The exercise of this right by a secured party whose security interest is subordinate to that of another secured party does not of itself constitute a conversion or otherwise give rise to liability in favor of the holder of the senior security interest. Section 9-615 [30-9A-615] addresses application of the proceeds of a disposition by a junior secured party. Under Section 9-615(a) [30-9A-615(1)], a junior secured party owes no obligation to apply the proceeds of disposition to the satisfaction of obligations secured by a senior security interest. Section 9-615(g) [30-9A-615(7)] builds on this general rule by protecting certain juniors from claims of a senior concerning cash proceeds of the disposition. Even if a senior were to have a non-Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] claim to proceeds of a junior's disposition, Section 9-615(g) [30-9A-615(7)] would protect a junior that acts in good faith and without knowledge that its actions violate the rights of a senior party. Because the disposition by a junior would not cut off a senior's security interest or other lien (see Section 9-617 [30-9A-617]), in many (probably most) cases the junior's receipt of the cash proceeds would not violate the rights of the senior.

The holder of a senior security interest is entitled, by virtue of its priority, to take possession of collateral from the junior secured party and conduct its own disposition, provided that the senior enjoys the right to take possession of the collateral from the debtor. See Section 9-609 [30-9A-609]. The holder of a junior security interest normally must notify the senior secured party of an impending disposition. See Section 9-611 [30-9A-611]. Regardless of whether the senior receives a notification from the junior, the junior's disposition does not of itself discharge the senior's security interest. See Section 9-617 [30-9A-617]. Unless the senior secured party has authorized the disposition free and clear of its security interest, the senior's security interest ordinarily will survive the disposition by the junior and continue under Section 9-315(a) [30-9A-315(1)]. If the senior enjoys the right to repossess the collateral from the debtor, the senior likewise may recover the collateral from the transferee.

When a secured party's collateral is encumbered by another security interest or other lien, one of the claimants may seek to invoke the equitable doctrine of marshaling. As explained by the Supreme Court, that doctrine "rests upon the principle that a creditor having two funds to satisfy his debt, may not by his application of them to his demand, defeat another creditor, who may resort to only one of the funds." Meyer v. United States, 375 U.S. 233, 236 (1963), quoting Sowell v. Federal Reserve Bank, 268 U.S. 449, 456-57 (1925). The purpose of the doctrine is "to prevent the arbitrary action of a senior lienor from destroying the rights of a junior lienor or a creditor having less security." Id. at 237. Because it is an equitable doctrine, marshaling "is applied only when it can be equitably fashioned as to all of the parties" having an interest in the property. Id. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] leaves courts free to determine whether marshaling is appropriate in any given case. See Section 1-103 [30-1-103].

6. Security Interests of Equal Rank. Sometimes two security interests enjoy the same priority. This situation may arise by contract, e.g., pursuant to "equal and ratable" provisions in indentures, or by operation of law. See Section 9-328(6) [30-9A-328(6)]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] treats a security interest having equal priority like a senior security interest in many respects. Assume, for example, that SP-X and SP-Y enjoy equal priority, SP-W is senior to them, and SP-Z is junior. If SP-X disposes of the collateral under this section, then (i) SP-W's and SP-Y's security interests survive the disposition but SP-Z's does not, see Section 9-617 [30-9A-617], and (ii) neither SP-W nor SP-Y is entitled to receive a distribution of proceeds, but SP-Z is. See Section 9-615(a)(3) [30-9A-615(1)(c)].

When one considers the ability to obtain possession of the collateral, a secured party with equal priority is unlike a senior secured party. As the senior secured party, SP-W should enjoy the right to possession as against SP-X. See Section 9-609 [30-9A-609], Comment 5. If SP-W takes possession and disposes of the collateral under this section, it is entitled to apply the proceeds to satisfy its secured claim. SP-Y, however, should not have such a right to take possession from SP-X; otherwise, once SP-Y took possession from SP-X, SP-X would have the right to get possession from SP-Y, which would be obligated to redeliver possession to SP-X, and so on. Resolution of this problem is left to the parties and, if necessary, the courts.

7. Public vs. Private Dispositions. This Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] maintains two distinctions between "public" and other dispositions: (i) the secured party may buy at the former, but normally not at the latter (Section 9-610(c) [30-9A-610(3)]), and (ii) the debtor is entitled to notification of "the time and place of a public disposition" and notification of "the time after which" a private disposition or other intended disposition is to be made (Section 9-613(1)(E) [30-9A-613(1)(a)(v)]). It does not retain the distinction under former Section 9-504(4) [30-9-504(4), now repealed], under which transferees in a noncomplying public disposition could lose protection more easily than transferees in other noncomplying dispositions. Instead, Section 9-617(b) [30-9A-617(2)] adopts a unitary standard. Although the term is not defined, as used in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], a "public disposition" is one at which the price is determined after the public has had a meaningful opportunity for competitive bidding. "Meaningful opportunity" is meant to imply that some form of advertisement or public notice must precede the sale (or other disposition) and that the public must have access to the sale (disposition).

8. Investment Property. Dispositions of investment property may be regulated by the federal securities laws. Although a "public" disposition of securities under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] may implicate the registration requirements of the Securities Act of 1933, it need not do so. A disposition that qualifies for a "private placement" exemption under the Securities Act of 1933 nevertheless may constitute a "public" disposition within the meaning of this section. Moreover, the "commercially reasonable" requirements of subsection (b) [subsection (2)] need not prevent a secured party from conducting a foreclosure sale without the issuer's compliance with federal registration requirements.

9. "Recognized Market." A "recognized market," as used in subsection (c) [subsection (3)] and Section 9-611(d) [30-9A-611(4)], is one in which the items sold are fungible and prices are not subject to individual negotiation. For example, the New York Stock Exchange is a recognized market. A market in which prices are individually negotiated or the items are not fungible is not a recognized market, even if the items are the subject of widely disseminated price guides or are disposed of through dealer auctions.

10. Relevance of Price. While not itself sufficient to establish a violation of this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6], a low price suggests that a court should scrutinize carefully all aspects of a disposition to ensure that each aspect was commercially reasonable. Note also that even if the disposition is commercially reasonable, Section 9-615(f) [30-9A-615(6)] provides a special method for calculating a deficiency or surplus if (i) the transferee in the disposition is the secured party, a person related to the secured party, or a secondary obligor, and (ii) the amount of proceeds of the disposition is significantly below the range of proceeds that a complying disposition to a person other than the secured party, a person related to the secured party, or a secondary obligor would have brought.

11. Warranties. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] affords the transferee in a disposition under this section the benefit of any title, possession, quiet enjoyment, and similar warranties that would have accompanied the disposition by operation of non-Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] law had the disposition been conducted under other circumstances. For example, the Article 2 [Title 30, chapter 2] warranty of title would apply to a sale of goods, the analogous warranties of Article 2A [Title 30, chapter 2A] would apply to a lease of goods, and any common-law warranties of title would apply to dispositions of other types of collateral. See, e.g., Restatement (2d), Contracts §333 (warranties of assignor).

Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] explicitly provides that these warranties can be disclaimed either under other applicable law or by communicating a record containing an express disclaimer. The record need not be written, but an oral communication would not be sufficient. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] (definition of "record"). Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] provides a sample of wording that will effectively exclude the warranties in a disposition under this section, whether or not the exclusion would be effective under non-Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] law.

The warranties incorporated by subsection (d) [subsection (4)] are those relating to "title, possession, quiet enjoyment, and the like." Depending on the circumstances, a disposition under this section also may give rise to other statutory or implied warranties, e.g., warranties of quality or fitness for purpose. Law other than this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] determines whether such other warranties apply to a disposition under this section. Other law also determines issues relating to disclaimer of such warranties. For example, a foreclosure sale of a car by a car dealer could give rise to an implied warranty of merchantability (Section 2-314 [30-2-314]) unless effectively disclaimed or modified (Section 2-316 [30-2-316]).

This section's approach to these warranties conflicts with the former Comment to Section 2-312 [30-2-312]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] rejects the baseline assumption that commercially reasonable dispositions under this section are out of the ordinary commercial course or peculiar. The Comment to Section 2-312 [30-2-312] has been revised accordingly.

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Determination of Commercially Reasonable Sale — Obligation of Seller to Protect Rights of Debtor — $150 for Sale of Car Held Not Reasonable Fair Market Value: The Longs purchased a Ford Escort from Auto Credit for $2,795, made timely payments, put 3,500 miles on the car, and returned it to Auto Credit 6 weeks after purchase, notifying Auto Credit that they would be making no more payments on the car. At the time that the car was returned to Auto Credit, the balance owed by the Longs was $2,594.02. Auto Credit notified the Longs that if they failed to make further payments, the car would be sold the next business day after June 27, 1992. The car was eventually sold August 12, 1992, at a private sale for $150. After credit for that amount and deduction of its expenses, Auto Credit calculated that the Longs owed $2,934.15. Auto Credit brought an action to recover the amount owed, and the Longs counterclaimed for damages on the basis that the sale was not commercially reasonable and that Auto Credit had violated the federal Truth in Lending Act. The Supreme Court reviewed its previous opinions holding that a low price obtained for the sale of loan collateral does not alone establish that the sale was commercially unreasonable and that reasonableness is determined on a case-by-case basis. The Supreme Court also noted that Montana, unlike some other jurisdictions, has not held that a seller has an express obligation to protect the debtor's interests. However, the Supreme Court held that "collateral cannot be disposed of, as it was in this case, in total disregard of the debtor's interests". The court further held that: (1) the fact that Auto Credit secured the $2,795 transaction with the vehicle as collateral serves as an admission of the value of the vehicle; (2) there is nothing in the record showing that the vehicle had mechanical difficulty when turned back to Auto Credit or that the 3,500 miles put on the vehicle by the Longs diminished its value by 95%, and therefore the sale for $150 did not represent reasonable fair market value for the car; (3) commercial unreasonableness is also demonstrated by the fact that after the sale, the Longs owed more to Auto Credit than they did before the sale and that the Longs would therefore have been better off destroying the vehicle, a result that is contrary to the requirements of the Uniform Commercial Code that the sale be conducted in a manner that takes into account the interests of both parties to the contract; and (4) depending upon the facts of the case, the price received for the collateral may provide prima facie evidence of whether the sale was reasonable and protected the rights of the debtor. Auto Credit, Inc. v. Long, 1998 MT 327, 292 M 238, 971 P2d 1237, 55 St. Rep. 1326 (1998).

Notice Exception — Commercial Reasonableness in Sale of Horses: Section 30-9-504 (now repealed, see 30-9A-610, 30-9A-611, 30-9A-615, 30-9A-617, 30-9A-618, and 30-9A-624) requires the secured party to give the debtor reasonable notice of the time after which any private sale is to be made unless the collateral is perishable or threatens to decline speedily in value. In this case, when the collateral was thoroughbred horses, private sale was commercially reasonable in light of expert testimony that the private sale of horses often results in higher prices than sale by public auction. The notice requirement was inapplicable because the price of thoroughbred horses dropped rapidly during the time when the sale was to occur. In re Estate of Michael v. Glacier Gen. Assurance Co., 264 M 261, 871 P2d 272, 51 St. Rep. 252 (1994), distinguishing Agricredit Acceptance Corp. v. Michels, 250 M 23, 817 P2d 704 (1991).

Commercial Reasonableness of Notification of Sale: It is not required that a debtor receive actual notice of a sale, only that the creditor take reasonable steps to assure that the debtor is notified. When a bank sent notice to defendant at his last-known address, the bank satisfied the statutory requirements for notice. First Nat'l Bank of Lewistown v. Mork, 257 M 495, 850 P2d 954, 50 St. Rep. 379 (1993).

Denial of Directed Verdict Proper — Sufficient Evidence to Create Question of Whether U.C.C. Notice Given: Defendant, Tezak, moved for a directed verdict on the basis that he was told by plaintiff's attorney to ignore the notice that his repossessed trucks were to be sold. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's denial of the motion, stating that there was sufficient evidence to let the jury decide if Tezak's right to ignore the notice was conditional. Mack Financial Corp. v. Tezak, 253 M 492, 834 P2d 396, 49 St. Rep. 556 (1992).

Failure to Consider Affidavit of Expert on Value of Farm Equipment — Question of Whether Sales Were Commercially Reasonable as Precluding Summary Judgment: The District Court granted summary judgment to creditor who sold farm equipment to satisfy deficiencies, finding that the sales were commercially reasonable because the creditor properly notified debtor Michels of the pending sales pursuant to 30-9-504 (now repealed, see 30-9A-610, 30-9A-611, 30-9A-615, 30-9A-617, 30-9A-618, and 30-9A-624). In opposing summary judgment, Michels submitted the affidavit of a former farm implement dealer who was familiar with the equipment and who testified that the amount sought through the sales was far below the value of the equipment. The affidavit raised a genuine issue of material fact concerning whether the sales were commercially reasonable that was sufficient to constitute error in the grant of summary judgment. Agricredit Acceptance Corp. v. Michels, 250 M 23, 817 P2d 704, 48 St. Rep. 874 (1991).

Court Amending Special Verdict Not Error: The jury returned a special verdict, finding that the defendant had breached a car purchase contract and that the plaintiff had acted reasonably in repossessing and reselling the vehicle. The verdict awarded the plaintiff only $22 for the notice of sale publication costs. The lower court amended the verdict to include court costs, attorney fees, and the balance due under the contract. The Supreme Court held that amending the verdict was not error because once the jury decided that the plaintiff had acted in a commercially reasonable manner, a judgment for any deficiency followed as a matter of law. Sportco, Inc. v. Thompson, 247 M 379, 806 P2d 1039, 48 St. Rep. 236 (1991).

Effective Notice of Repossession: The defendants argued that the notice of repossession sent them by the plaintiff was not sufficient. The Supreme Court held that the notice was more than adequate because it contained the name of the prospective buyer and the price, both of which were not required by the statute. Lilly v. Terwilliger, 244 M 93, 796 P2d 199, 47 St. Rep. 1413 (1990).

Sale of Fishing Business Commercially Reasonable: The plaintiff failed to advertise, solicit bids, or secure an appraisal before selling a fishing business he had repossessed from the defendants. The Supreme Court held that the sale price was reasonable because the evidence showed that the fishing season was imminent and the plaintiff had to act quickly and that the state of the business was such that the defendants were unable to make even modest payments. Lilly v. Terwilliger, 244 M 93, 796 P2d 199, 47 St. Rep. 1413 (1990).

Equipment Sale — No Surplus: Under the authority of 30-9-504 (now repealed, see 30-9A-610, 30-9A-611, 30-9A-615, 30-9A-617, 30-9A-618, and 30-9A-624), the secured parties properly disposed of certain printing equipment by selling it in a commercially reasonable manner and applying the proceeds to the indebtedness secured by the security interest. No surplus proceeds remained to distribute to the defaulting debtor. Gay v. Cabinet Publishing, Inc., 239 M 179, 779 P2d 77, 46 St. Rep. 1601 (1989).

Commercial Reasonableness of Agisters' Lien Sale: Appellants claimed the sale of horses at an agisters' lien sale was not commercially reasonable because the horses were sold in lots at less than their value. Looking to 30-9-507 (now repealed, see 30-9A-625 and 30-9A-627) for guidance, the Supreme Court stated that the sale of horses at a low price in lots instead of individually did not make the sale commercially unreasonable. Testimony indicated that horses were often sold in this manner and could have been sold individually if a bidder had so requested. Rose v. Myers, 223 M 13, 724 P2d 176, 43 St. Rep. 1493 (1986).

Unreasonable Notice — Wrong Date — No Notice of Sealed Bids — No Notice of Certain Sales: Plaintiff defaulted on two bank loans, and bank sold the livestock, farm machinery, and equipment put up as collateral, then obtained a deficiency judgment for the remainder of the debt. The judgment was reversed, and the bank could not recover the deficiency. The bank sold half the machinery and equipment upon a notice to the plaintiff which gave the wrong auction date and failed to state that sealed bids were to be submitted. This was not a commercially reasonable notice, and neither notices published in newspapers nor notice posted in the bank's lobby constituted sufficient notice. The remainder of the equipment and machinery was later sold with no notice whatsoever to plaintiff. Bank of Sheridan v. Devers, 217 M 173, 702 P2d 1388, 42 St. Rep. 1107 (1985). See also Westmont Tractor Co. v. Leighty, 222 M 336, 722 P2d 617, 43 St. Rep. 1309 (1986), and Auto Credit, Inc. v. Long, 1998 MT 327, 292 M 238, 971 P2d 1237, 55 St. Rep. 1326 (1998).

Failure to Give Required Notice of Sale of Collateral — Deficiency Judgment Precluded: Plaintiffs defaulted on loan. Pursuant to an order of the Blackfeet Tribal Court enforceable in the Montana courts as a matter of comity, the creditor sold the collateral and applied the proceeds to the amount due, leaving a deficiency. The loan agreement required notice of sale of collateral to be given at least 5 days before the sale and to state the time and place of the sale. The notice stated neither the time nor the place. This failure of notice precluded the creditor from obtaining a deficiency judgment in the Montana courts. Wippert v. The Blackfeet Tribe of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, 215 M 85, 695 P2d 461, 42 St. Rep. 200 (1985). See also Westmont Tractor Co. v. Continental I, Inc., 224 M 516, 731 P2d 327, 43 St. Rep. 2380 (1986).

Foreclosure by Secured Party Who Is Also Escrow Agent: Plaintiff bought a photography business and executed a promissory note with defendant. As collateral he assigned stock in the business. Plaintiff sold the business to Wolfe. Wolfe was to make payments to defendant to discharge his obligations, and these payments were to be directly applied to plaintiff's obligation under the promissory note. Defendant was escrow agent. Plaintiff later signed a financing statement granting defendant a security interest in the stock held in escrow. The defendant filed the security agreement. Wolfe became delinquent in his payments, and defendant notified plaintiff his payments were therefore delinquent. A later letter was sent by certified mail to the same address advising plaintiff the stock would be sold and applied to plaintiff's past-due loan. At the sale Wolfe bought the stock for the amount due on plaintiff's note. Plaintiff claimed defendant had breached its fiduciary duty by foreclosing on the stock. The security interest became binding before the parties entered the escrow agreement. The security interest continued in the collateral notwithstanding the sale to Wolfe. Upon default defendant acted within its statutory rights to foreclose on the collateral to satisfy plaintiff's obligation. The escrow arrangement did not prevent defendant as a secured party from exercising its rights to foreclose on collateral on which the debtor defaulted. Dulan v. Mont. Nat'l Bank of Roundup, 203 M 177, 661 P2d 28, 40 St. Rep. 376 (1983), followed in Weldon v. First Citizens Bank of Billings, 259 M 305, 856 P2d 225, 50 St. Rep. 807 (1993).

Price Discrepancy Bearing on Commercial Reasonableness: Plaintiff bought a photography business and executed a promissory note with defendant. As collateral he assigned stock in the business. Plaintiff sold the business to Wolfe. Wolfe was to make payments to defendant to discharge his obligations, and these payments were to be directly applied to plaintiff's obligation under the promissory note. Defendant was escrow agent. Plaintiff later signed a financing statement granting defendant a security interest in the stock held in escrow. The defendant filed the security agreement. Wolfe became delinquent in his payments, and defendant notified plaintiff his payments were therefore delinquent. A later letter was sent by certified mail to the same address advising plaintiff the stock would be sold and applied to plaintiff's past-due loan. At the sale Wolfe bought the stock for the amount due on plaintiff's note. Plaintiff contended the sale of the collateral was not conducted in a commercially reasonable manner as indicated by the low price received. The Supreme Court held that a large discrepancy in price may be considered in determining commercial reasonableness but that the complaining party has the burden of showing the price received was less than the fair market value of the collateral. The court did not find substantial evidence to support the contention. Dulan v. Mont. Nat'l Bank of Roundup, 203 M 177, 661 P2d 28, 40 St. Rep. 376 (1983), followed in Owen v. Ostrum, 259 M 249, 855 P2d 1015, 50 St. Rep. 779 (1993). See also Auto Credit, Inc. v. Long, 1998 MT 327, 292 M 238, 971 P2d 1237, 55 St. Rep. 1326 (1998).

Reasonable Steps to Notify: Plaintiff bought a photography business and executed a promissory note with defendant. As collateral he assigned stock in the business. Plaintiff sold the business to Wolfe. Wolfe was to make payments to defendant to discharge his obligations, and these payments were to be directly applied to plaintiff's obligation under the promissory note. Defendant was escrow agent. Plaintiff later signed a financing statement granting defendant a security interest in the stock held in escrow. The defendant filed the security agreement. Wolfe became delinquent in his payments, and defendant notified plaintiff his payments were therefore delinquent. A later letter was sent by certified mail to the same address advising plaintiff the stock would be sold and applied to plaintiff's past-due loan. At the sale Wolfe bought the stock for the amount due on plaintiff's note. Plaintiff contended that notice of the foreclosure was deficient because he had moved and had not received the letter. The Supreme Court held that a creditor must only take reasonable steps to notify the debtor. Plaintiff received notice when the letter was delivered to the address. The actions of defendant were those reasonably required to notify plaintiff. Dulan v. Mont. Nat'l Bank of Roundup, 203 M 177, 661 P2d 28, 40 St. Rep. 376 (1983).

Repossession Not Required of Secured Creditor as Condition Precedent to Judgment Against Other Property: The defendant defaulted on a secured loan from the plaintiff, and the plaintiff, rather than repossessing the defendant's personal property in which it had been given a security interest, obtained a judgment against the defendant for the amount owed and brought a declaratory judgment action to determine if the judgment constituted a lien on the defendant's real property. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's ruling that there was no effective lien, holding that the plaintiff was not required to first repossess the secured property and then sue for the deficiency. AVCO Financial Serv. of Billings One, Inc. v. Christiaens, 201 M 117, 651 P2d 220, 39 St. Rep. 1993 (1982).

Proving Commercial Reasonableness: The burden of proving the commercial reasonableness of the disposition of collateral is on the secured party. Farmers St. Bank v. Mobile Homes Unlimited, 181 M 342, 593 P2d 734 (1979). See also Auto Credit, Inc. v. Long, 1998 MT 327, 292 M 238, 971 P2d 1237, 55 St. Rep. 1326 (1998).

Failure to Give Notice: A secured creditor's failure to give the notice required under 30-9-504 (now repealed, see 30-9A-610, 30-9A-611, 30-9A-615, 30-9A-617, 30-9A-618, and 30-9A-624) prior to disposition of collateral precludes or limits the creditor's right to recover a deficiency judgment. Farmers St. Bank v. Mobile Homes Unlimited, 181 M 342, 593 P2d 734 (1979), followed in Ottersen v. Rubick, 246 M 93, 803 P2d 1066, 47 St. Rep. 2274 (1990). See also Owen v. Ostrum, 259 M 249, 855 P2d 1015, 50 St. Rep. 779 (1993).

Guaranties Covering Costs and Expenses: Language in guaranty agreement referring to recovery of attorney fees incidental to collection of debt from the principal debtor did not authorize recovery of attorney fees from guarantors who were sued to recover deficiency after repossession and sale of collateral. First Nat'l Park Bank v. Johnson, 553 F2d 599 (1977), distinguished in Westmont Tractor Co. v. Continental I, Inc., 224 M 516, 731 P2d 327, 43 St. Rep. 2380 (1986).

Guaranty Distinguished From Other Contracts: Guarantors are not "debtors" within meaning of section of Uniform Commercial Code prohibiting waiver of rules granting rights to debtor and imposing duties on the secured party. First Nat'l Park Bank v. Johnson, 553 F2d 599 (1977), distinguished in Westmont Tractor Co. v. Continental I, Inc., 224 M 516, 731 P2d 327, 43 St. Rep. 2380 (1986).

Possession as Defense: Action for breach of contract and conversion will not prevail where secured party had right to take possession and sell security interest on default. Fairchild v. Williams Feed, Inc., 169 M 18, 544 P2d 1216 (1976).

Notice: Oral notice to debtor of time and, in case of public sale, place of disposition of goods after foreclosure is sufficient under 30-9-504(3) (section now repealed, see 30-9A-610, 30-9A-611, 30-9A-615, 30-9A-617, 30-9A-618, and 30-9A-624). Fairchild v. Williams Feed, Inc., 169 M 18, 544 P2d 1216 (1976), followed in Schulke v. Gemar, 264 M 184, 870 P2d 1378, 51 St. Rep. 220 (1994).

Sale as a Unit Not Unreasonable: Indication that a better price could have been received at foreclosure sale of a mountain logger, if it had been sold for parts, was not evidence that the sale was unreasonable, since the Uniform Commercial Code does not require the secured creditor to disassemble the collateral and sell it piece by piece. James Talcott, Inc. v. Reynolds, 165 M 404, 529 P2d 352 (1974).

Commercially Reasonable Disposition of Property: Sale of business machinery at private sale for $300 was not commercially unreasonable where guarantors of lease were given advance notice of the sale and declined to bid over $300 for the property; that one of the business machines was later placed on sale to the public for $295 failed to show the sale to be commercially unreasonable since the increase in price was normal, taking into account the expenses of preparation for sale and the commercial markup common to the particular trade. Business Fin. Co., Inc. v. Red Barn, Inc., 163 M 263, 517 P2d 383 (1973).

30-9A-611. Notification before disposition of collateral.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-504(3) [30-9A-504(3), now repealed].

2. Reasonable Notification. This section requires a secured party who wishes to dispose of collateral under Section 9-610 [30-9A-610] to send "a reasonable authenticated notification of disposition" to specified interested persons, subject to certain exceptions. The notification must be reasonable as to the manner in which it is sent, its timeliness (i.e., a reasonable time before the disposition is to take place), and its content. See Sections 9-612 [30-9A-612] (timeliness of notification), 9-613 [30-9A-613] (contents of notification generally), 9-614 [30-9A-614] (contents of notification in consumer-goods transactions).

3. Notification to Debtors and Secondary Obligors. This section imposes a duty to send notification of a disposition not only to the debtor but also to any secondary obligor. Subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)] resolve an uncertainty under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] by providing that secondary obligors (sureties) are entitled to receive notification of an intended disposition of collateral, regardless of who created the security interest in the collateral. If the surety created the security interest, it would be the debtor. If it did not, it would be a secondary obligor. (This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] also resolves the question of the secondary obligor's ability to waive, pre-default, the right to notification-waiver generally is not permitted. See Section 9-602 [30-9A-602].) Section 9-605 [30-9A-605] relieves a secured party from any duty to send notification to a debtor or secondary obligor unknown to the secured party.

Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], the principal obligor (borrower) is not always entitled to notification of disposition.

Example: Behnfeldt borrows on an unsecured basis, and Bruno grants a security interest in her car to secure the debt. Behnfeldt is a primary obligor, not a secondary obligor. As such, she is not entitled to notification of disposition under this section.

4. Notification to Other Secured Parties. Prior to the 1972 amendments to Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A], former Section 9-504(3) [30-9-504(3), now repealed] required the enforcing secured party to send reasonable notification of the disposition:

except in the case of consumer goods to any other person who has a security interest in the collateral and who has duly filed a financing statement indexed in the name of the debtor in this State or who is known by the secured party to have a security interest in the collateral. The 1972 amendments eliminated the duty to give notice to secured parties other than those from whom the foreclosing secured party had received written notice of a claim of an interest in the collateral.

Many of the problems arising from dispositions of collateral encumbered by multiple security interests can be ameliorated or solved by informing all secured parties of an intended disposition and affording them the opportunity to work with one another. To this end, subsection (c)(3)(B) [subsection (3)(c)(ii)] expands the duties of the foreclosing secured party to include the duty to notify (and the corresponding burden of searching the files to discover) certain competing secured parties. The subsection imposes a search burden that in some cases may be greater than the pre-1972 burden on foreclosing secured parties but certainly is more modest than that faced by a new secured lender.

To determine who is entitled to notification, the foreclosing secured party must determine the proper office for filing a financing statement as of a particular date, measured by reference to the "notification date," as defined in subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. This determination requires reference to the choice-of-law provisions of Part 3 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 3]. The secured party must ascertain whether any financing statements covering the collateral and indexed under the debtor's name, as the name existed as of that date, in fact were filed in that office. The foreclosing secured party generally need not notify secured parties whose effective financing statements have become more difficult to locate because of changes in the location of the debtor, proceeds rules, or changes in the debtor's name.

Under subsection (c)(3)(C) [subsection (3)(c)(iii)], the secured party also must notify a secured party who has perfected a security interest by complying with a statute or treaty described in Section 9-311(a) [30-9A-311(1)], such as a certificate-of-title statute.

Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] provides a "safe harbor" that takes into account the delays that may be attendant to receiving information from the public filing offices. It provides, generally, that the secured party will be deemed to have satisfied its notification duty under subsection (c)(3)(B) [subsection (3)(c)(ii)] if it requests a search from the proper office at least 20 but not more than 30 days before sending notification to the debtor and if it also sends a notification to all secured parties (and other lienholders) reflected on the search report. The secured party's duty under subsection (c)(3)(B) [subsection (3)(c)(ii)] also will be satisfied if the secured party requests but does not receive a search report before the notification is sent to the debtor. Thus, if subsection (e) [subsection (5)] applies, a secured party who is entitled to notification under subsection (c)(3)(B) [subsection (3)(c)(ii)] has no remedy against a foreclosing secured party who does not send the notification. The foreclosing secured party has complied with the notification requirement. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] has no effect on the requirements of the other paragraphs of subsection (c) [subsection (3)]. For example, if the foreclosing secured party received a notification from the holder of a conflicting security interest in accordance with subsection (c)(3)(A) [subsection (3)(c)(i)] but failed to send to the holder a notification of the disposition, the holder of the conflicting security interest would have the right to recover any loss under Section 9-625(b) [30-9A-625(2)].

5. Authentication Requirement. Subsections (b) and (c) [subsections (2) and (3)] explicitly provide that a notification of disposition must be "authenticated." Some cases read former Section 9-504(3) [30-9-504(3), now repealed] as validating oral notification.

6. Second Try. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] leaves to judicial resolution, based upon the facts of each case, the question whether the requirement of "reasonable notification" requires a "second try," i.e., whether a secured party who sends notification and learns that the debtor did not receive it must attempt to locate the debtor and send another notification.

7. Recognized Market; Perishable Collateral. New subsection (d) [subsection (4)] makes it clear that there is no obligation to give notification of a disposition in the case of perishable collateral or collateral customarily sold on a recognized market (e.g., marketable securities). Former Section 9-504(3) [30-9-504(3), now repealed] might be read (incorrectly) to relieve the secured party from its duty to notify a debtor but not from its duty to notify other secured parties in connection with dispositions of such collateral.

8. Failure to Conduct Notified Disposition. Nothing in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] prevents a secured party from electing not to conduct a disposition after sending a notification. Nor does this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] prevent a secured party from electing to send a revised notification if its plans for disposition change. This assumes, however, that the secured party acts in good faith, the revised notification is reasonable, and the revised plan for disposition and any attendant delay are commercially reasonable.

9. Waiver. A debtor or secondary obligor may waive the right to notification under this section only by a post-default authenticated agreement. See Section 9-624(a) [30-9A-624(1)].

2. Reasonable Notification. Section 9-611(b) [30-9A-611(2)] requires the secured party to send a "reasonable authenticated notification." Under that section, as under former Section 9-504(3) [30-9-504(3), now repealed, see 30-9A-610, 30-9A-611, and 30-9A-624], one aspect of a reasonable notification is its timeliness. This generally means that the notification must be sent at a reasonable time in advance of the date of a public disposition or the date after which a private disposition is to be made. A notification that is sent so near to the disposition date that a notified person could not be expected to act on or take account of the notification would be unreasonable.

3. Timeliness of Notification: Safe Harbor. The 10-day notice period in subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is intended to be a "safe harbor" and not a minimum requirement. To qualify for the "safe harbor" the notification must be sent after default. A notification also must be sent in a commercially reasonable manner. See Section 9-611(b) [30-9A-611(2)] ("reasonable authenticated notification"). These requirements prevent a secured party from taking advantage of the "safe harbor" by, for example, giving the debtor a notification at the time of the original extension of credit or sending the notice by surface mail to a debtor overseas.

2. Contents of Notification. To comply with the "reasonable authenticated notification" requirement of Section 9-611(b) [30-9A-611(2)], the contents of a notification must be reasonable. Except in a consumer-goods transaction, the contents of a notification that includes the information set forth in paragraph (1) [subsection (1)(a)] are sufficient as a matter of law, unless the parties agree otherwise. (The reference to "time" of disposition means here, as it did in former Section 9-504(3) [30-9-504(3), now repealed, see 30-9A-610, 30-9A-611, and 30-9A-624], not only the hour of the day but also the date.) Although a secured party may choose to include additional information concerning the transaction or the debtor's rights and obligations, no additional information is required unless the parties agree otherwise. A notification that lacks some of the information set forth in paragraph (1) [subsection (1)(a)] nevertheless may be sufficient if found to be reasonable by the trier of fact, under paragraph (2) [subsection (1)(b)]. A properly completed sample form of notification in paragraph (5) [subsection (2)] or in Section 9-614(a)(3) [30-9A-614(3)] is an example of a notification that would contain the information set forth in paragraph (1) [subsection (1)(a)]. Under paragraph (4) [subsection (1)(d)], however, no particular phrasing of the notification is required.

2. Notification in Consumer-Goods Transactions. Paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] sets forth the information required for a reasonable notification in a consumer-goods transaction. A notification that lacks any of the information set forth in paragraph (1) [subsection (1)] is insufficient as a matter of law. Compare Section 9-613(2) [30-9A-613(1)(b)], under which the trier of fact may find a notification to be sufficient even if it lacks some information listed in paragraph (1) [subsection (1)(a)] of that section.

3. Safe-Harbor Form of Notification; Errors in Information. Although paragraph (2) [subsection (2)] provides that a particular phrasing of a notification is not required, paragraph (3) [subsection (3)] specifies a safe-harbor form that, when properly completed, satisfies paragraph (1) [subsection (1)]. Paragraphs (4), (5), and (6) [subsections (4), (5), and (6)] contain special rules applicable to erroneous and additional information. Under paragraph (4) [subsection (4)], a notification in the safe-harbor form specified in paragraph (3) [subsection (3)] is not rendered insufficient if it contains additional information at the end of the form. Paragraph (5) [subsection (5)] provides that non-misleading errors in information contained in a notification are permitted if the safe-harbor form is used and if the errors are in information not required by paragraph (1) [subsection (1)]. Finally, if a notification is in a form other than the paragraph (3) [subsection (3)] safe-harbor form, other law determines the effect of including in the notification information other than that required by paragraph (1) [subsection (1)].

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Deficiency Judgment After Foreclosure Sale: Deficiency judgment after foreclosure sale was proper even though sale was not public and contract contained clause that "notice [be] given in the manner provided in 30-9-508 [now repealed]", since mortgagee was given power of sale by contract, with contract setting forth statute as an acceptable method of sale. Bell v. Cole, 154 M 43, 459 P2d 692 (1969).

Change of Possession Not Accomplished by Pendency of the Foreclosure Action: That the pendency of the action to foreclose the mortgage did not ipso facto work a constructive change of possession from the mortgagor to the mortgagee is made plain by 30-9-508 (now repealed), which authorized the joinder in a foreclosure action of one for the recovery of the possession of the mortgaged property. If the institution of foreclosure proceedings worked a constructive change of possession, there would have been no object in authorizing the joinder of an action for the recovery of the possession of the mortgaged property. Griffiths v. Thrasher, 95 M 238, 26 P2d 983 (1933).

Mortgage Foreclosure Action Mortgage Joined With Conversion Action: As an exception to the general rule that an action in tort may not be joined with one on contract, an action to foreclose a chattel mortgage may be united with one in conversion against the purchaser of the mortgaged chattels. Beers v. W. P. Devereux Co., 87 M 210, 286 P 406 (1930).

Strict Statutory Compliance Necessary: The requirements of 30-9-508 (now repealed), under which a mortgagee of chattels may have the same sold on default of the mortgagor in execution of the power granted to him by the terms of the mortgage, must be strictly complied with. Otherwise, jurisdiction to make the sale is absent and it does not divest the mortgagor of title. Trudell v. Hingham St. Bank, 62 M 557, 205 P 667 (1922).

Action to Recover Balance Due After Sale: Where the parties to a chattel mortgage stipulated that the mortgagee might take possession of and sell the property under a power of sale whenever foreclosure became necessary, as they could properly do under 30-9-508 (now repealed), the complaint in an action to recover a balance due after sale, alleging that the property was so sold, was sufficient in the absence of a demurrer, an allegation that demand for payment had been made and notice of sale given not having been necessary. Union Bank & Trust Co. v. Himmelbauer, 56 M 82, 181 P 332 (1919).

Authority of Sheriff:

A sheriff had full authority to contract through his deputy with an individual for the keeping of cattle seized under a power of sale contained in a chattel mortgage, inasmuch as he was authorized to perform all his official acts, either personally or by deputy, and was held to be in the performance of an official duty under the requirements of a section similar to the above. Vose v. Whitney, 7 M 385, 16 P 846 (1888). See also Maddox v. Rader, 9 M 126, 22 P 386 (1889).

Money received by a sheriff from a sale of chattels under a mortgage containing a clause, authorized by statute, empowering the sheriff of the county to execute the power of sale therein granted, is received by him in his official capacity, and a failure to pay over such money is a breach of official duty for which his bondsmen are liable. Maddox v. Rader, 9 M 126, 22 P 386 (1889).

30-9A-615. Application of proceeds of disposition — liability for deficiency and right to surplus.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-504(1), (2) [30-9-504(1), (2), now repealed].

2. Application of Proceeds. This section contains the rules governing application of proceeds and the debtor's liability for a deficiency following a disposition of collateral. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] sets forth the basic order of application. The proceeds are applied first to the expenses of disposition, second to the obligation secured by the security interest that is being enforced, and third, in the specified circumstances, to interests that are subordinate to that security interest.

Subsections (a) and (d) [subsections (1) and (4)] also address the right of a consignor to receive proceeds of a disposition by a secured party whose interest is senior to that of the consignor. Subsection (a) [subsection (1)] requires the enforcing secured party to pay excess proceeds first to subordinate secured parties or lienholders whose interests are senior to that of a consignor and, finally, to a consignor. Inasmuch as a consignor is the owner of the collateral, secured parties and lienholders whose interests are junior to the consignor's interest will not be entitled to any proceeds. In like fashion, under subsection (d)(1) [subsection (4)(a)] the debtor is not entitled to a surplus when the enforcing secured party is required to pay over proceeds to a consignor.

3. Noncash Proceeds. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] addresses the application of noncash proceeds of a disposition, such as a note or lease. The explanation in Section 9-608 [30-9A-608], Comment 4, generally applies to this subsection.

Example: A secured party in the business of selling or financing automobiles takes possession of collateral (an automobile) following its debtor's default. The secured party decides to sell the automobile in a private disposition under Section 9-610 [30-9A-610] and sends appropriate notification under Section 9-611 [30-9A-611]. After undertaking its normal credit investigation and in accordance with its normal credit policies, the secured party sells the automobile on credit, on terms typical of the credit terms normally extended by the secured party in the ordinary course of its business. The automobile stands as collateral for the remaining balance of the price. The noncash proceeds received by the secured party are chattel paper. The secured party may wish to credit its debtor (the assignor) with the principal amount of the chattel paper or may wish to credit the debtor only as and when the payments are made on the chattel paper by the buyer. Under subsection (c) [subsection (3)], the secured party is under no duty to apply the noncash proceeds (here, the chattel paper) or their value to the secured obligation unless its failure to do so would be commercially unreasonable. If a secured party elects to apply the chattel paper to the outstanding obligation, however, it must do so in a commercially reasonable manner. The facts in the example indicate that it would be commercially unreasonable for the secured party to fail to apply the value of the chattel paper to the original debtor's secured obligation. Unlike the example in Comment 4 to Section 9-608 [30-9A-608], the noncash proceeds received in this example are of the type that the secured party regularly generates in the ordinary course of its financing business in nonforeclosure transactions. The original debtor should not be exposed to delay or uncertainty in this situation. Of course, there will be many situations that fall between the examples presented in the Comment to Section 9-608 [30-9A-608] and in this Comment. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] leaves their resolution to the court based on the facts of each case.

One would expect that where noncash proceeds are or may be material, the secured party and debtor would agree to more specific standards in an agreement entered into before or after default. The parties may agree to the method of application of noncash proceeds if the method is not manifestly unreasonable. See Section 9-603 [30-9A-603].

When the secured party is not required to "apply or pay over for application noncash proceeds," the proceeds nonetheless remain collateral subject to this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. See Section 9-608 [30-9A-608], Comment 4.

4. Surplus and Deficiency. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] deals with surplus and deficiency. It revises former Section 9-504(2) [30-9-504(2), now repealed] by imposing an explicit requirement that the secured party "pay" the debtor for any surplus, while retaining the secured party's duty to "account." Inasmuch as the debtor may not be an obligor, subsection (d) [subsection (4)] provides that the obligor (not the debtor) is liable for the deficiency. The special rule governing surplus and deficiency when receivables have been sold likewise takes into account the distinction between a debtor and an obligor. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] also addresses the situation in which a consignor has an interest that is subordinate to the security interest being enforced.

5. Collateral Under New Ownership. When the debtor sells collateral subject to a security interest, the original debtor (creator of the security interest) is no longer a debtor inasmuch as it no longer has a property interest in the collateral; the buyer is the debtor. See Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]. As between the debtor (buyer of the collateral) and the original debtor (seller of the collateral), the debtor (buyer) normally would be entitled to the surplus following a disposition. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] therefore requires the secured party to pay the surplus to the debtor (buyer), not to the original debtor (seller) with which it has dealt. But, because this situation typically arises as a result of the debtor's wrongful act, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not expose the secured party to the risk of determining ownership of the collateral. If the secured party does not know about the buyer and accordingly pays the surplus to the original debtor, the exculpatory provisions of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] exonerate the secured party from liability to the buyer. See Sections 9-605, 9-628(a), (b) [30-9A-605 and 30-9A-628(1) and (2)]. If a debtor sells collateral free of a security interest, as in a sale to a buyer in ordinary course of business (see Section 9-320(a) [30-9-320(1)]), the property is no longer collateral and the buyer is not a debtor.

6. Certain "Low-Price" Dispositions. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] provides a special method for calculating a deficiency or surplus when the secured party, a person related to the secured party (defined in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102]), or a secondary obligor acquires the collateral at a foreclosure disposition. It recognizes that when the foreclosing secured party or a related party is the transferee of the collateral, the secured party sometimes lacks the incentive to maximize the proceeds of disposition. As a consequence, the disposition may comply with the procedural requirements of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] (e.g., it is conducted in a commercially reasonable manner following reasonable notice) but nevertheless fetch a low price.

Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] adjusts for this lack of incentive. If the proceeds of a disposition of collateral to a secured party, a person related to the secured party, or a secondary obligor are "significantly below the range of proceeds that a complying disposition to a person other than the secured party, a person related to the secured party, or a secondary obligor would have brought," then instead of calculating a deficiency (or surplus) based on the actual net proceeds, the calculation is based upon the amount that would have been received in a commercially reasonable disposition to a person other than the secured party, a person related to the secured party, or a secondary obligor. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] thus rejects the view that the secured party's receipt of such a price necessarily constitutes noncompliance with Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. However, such a price may suggest the need for greater judicial scrutiny. See Section 9-610 [30-9A-610], Comment 10.

7. "Person Related To." Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] defines "person related to." That term is a key element of the system provided in subsection (f) [subsection (6)] for low-price dispositions. One part of the definition applies when the secured party is an individual, and the other applies when the secured party is an organization. The definition is patterned closely on the corresponding definition in Section 1.301(32) of the Uniform Consumer Credit Code.

30-9A-616. Explanation of calculation of surplus or deficiency.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Duty to Send Information Concerning Surplus or Deficiency. This section reflects the view that, in every consumer-goods transaction, the debtor or obligor is entitled to know the amount of a surplus or deficiency and the basis upon which the surplus or deficiency was calculated. Under subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)], a secured party is obligated to provide this information (an "explanation," defined in subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)]) no later than the time that it accounts for and pays a surplus or the time of its first written attempt to collect the deficiency. The obligor need not make a request for an accounting in order to receive an explanation. A secured party who does not attempt to collect a deficiency in writing or account for and pay a surplus has no obligation to send an explanation under subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] and, consequently, cannot be liable for noncompliance.

A debtor or secondary obligor need not wait until the secured party commences written collection efforts in order to receive an explanation of how a deficiency or surplus was calculated. Subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)] obliges the secured party to send an explanation within 14 days after it receives a "request" (defined in subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)]).

3. Explanation of Calculation of Surplus or Deficiency. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] contains the requirements for how a calculation of a surplus or deficiency must be explained in order to satisfy subsection (a)(1)(B) [subsection (1)(a)(ii)]. It gives a secured party some discretion concerning rebates of interest or credit service charges. The secured party may include these rebates in the aggregate amount of obligations secured, under subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a)], or may include them with other types of rebates and credits under subsection (c)(5) [subsection (3)(e)]. Rebates of interest or credit service charges are the only types of rebates for which this discretion is provided. If the secured party provides an explanation that includes rebates of pre-computed interest, its explanation must so indicate. The expenses and attorney's fees to be described pursuant to subsection (c)(4) [subsection (3)(d)] are those relating to the most recent disposition, not those that may have been incurred in connection with earlier enforcement efforts and which have been resolved by the parties.

4. Liability for Noncompliance. A secured party who fails to comply with subsection (b)(2) [subsection (2)(b)] is liable for any loss caused plus $500. See Section 9-625(b), (c), (e)(6) [30-9A-625(2), (3), and (5)(f)]. A secured party who fails to send an explanation under subsection (b)(1) [subsection (2)(a)] is liable for any loss caused plus, if the noncompliance was "part of a pattern, or consistent with a practice of noncompliance," $500. See Section 9-625(b), (c), (e)(5) [30-9A-625(2), (3), and (5)(e)]. However, a secured party who fails to comply with this section is not liable for statutory minimum damages under Section 9-625(c)(2) [30-9A-625(3)(b)]. See Section 9-628(d) [30-9A-628(4)].

30-9A-617. Rights of transferee of collateral.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-504(4) [30-9-504(4), now repealed].

2. Title Taken by Good-Faith Transferee. Subsection (a) [subsection 1] sets forth the rights acquired by persons who qualify under subsection (b) [subsection (2)]-transferees who act in good faith. Such a person is a "transferee," inasmuch as a buyer at a foreclosure sale does not meet the definition of "purchaser" in Section 1-201 [30-1-201] (the transfer is not, vis-a-vis the debtor, "voluntary"). By virtue of the expanded definition of the term "debtor" in Section 9-102 [30-9A-102], subsection (a) [subsection (1)] makes clear that the ownership interest of a person who bought the collateral subject to the security interest is terminated by a subsequent disposition under this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. Such a person is a debtor under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], the result arguably was the same, but the statute was less clear. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1)], a disposition normally discharges the security interest being foreclosed and any subordinate security interests and other liens.

A disposition has the effect specified in subsection (a) [subsection (1)], even if the secured party fails to comply with this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. An aggrieved person (e.g., the holder of a subordinate security interest to whom a notification required by Section 9-611 [30-9A-611] was not sent) has a right to recover any loss under Section 9-625(b) [30-9A-625(2)].

3. Unitary Standard in Public and Private Dispositions. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] now contains a unitary standard that applies to transferees in both private and public dispositions—acting in good faith. However, this change from former Section 9-504(4) [30-9-504(4), now repealed] should not be interpreted to mean that a transferee acts in good faith even though it has knowledge of defects or buys in collusion, standards applicable to public dispositions under the former section. Properly understood, those standards were specific examples of the absence of good faith.

4. Title Taken by Nonqualifying Transferee. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] specifies the consequences for a transferee who does not qualify for protection under subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] (i.e., a transferee who does not act in good faith). The transferee takes subject to the rights of the debtor, the enforcing secured party, and other security interests or other liens.

30-9A-618. Rights and duties of certain secondary obligors.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-504(5) [30-9-504(5), now repealed].

2. Scope of This Section. Under this section, assignments of secured obligations and other transactions (regardless of form) that function like assignments of secured obligations are not dispositions to which Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] applies. Rather, they constitute assignments of rights and (occasionally) delegations of duties. Application of this section may require an investigation into the agreement of the parties, which may not be reflected in the words of the repurchase agreement (e.g., when the agreement requires a recourse party to "purchase the collateral" but contemplates that the purchaser will then conduct an Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] foreclosure disposition).

This section, like former Section 9-504(5) [30-9-504(5), now repealed], does not constitute a general and comprehensive rule for allocating rights and duties upon assignment of a secured obligation. Rather, it applies only in situations involving a secondary obligor described in subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. In other contexts, the agreement of the parties and applicable law other than Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] determine whether the assignment imposes upon the assignee any duty to the debtor and whether the assignor retains its duties to the debtor after the assignment.

Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] applies when there has been an assignment of an obligation that is secured at the time it is assigned. Thus, if a secondary obligor acquires the collateral at a disposition under Section 9-610 [30-9A-610] and simultaneously or subsequently discharges the unsecured deficiency claim, subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] is not implicated. Similarly, subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)] applies only when the secondary obligor is subrogated to the secured party's rights with respect to collateral. Thus, this subsection will not be implicated if a secondary obligor discharges the debtor's unsecured obligation for a post-disposition deficiency. Similarly, if the secured party disposes of some of the collateral and the secondary obligor thereafter discharges the remaining obligation, subsection (a) [subsection (1)] applies only with respect to rights and duties concerning the remaining collateral, and, under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], the subrogation is not a disposition of the remaining collateral.

As discussed more fully in Comment 3, a secondary obligor may receive a transfer of collateral in a disposition under Section 9-610 [30-9A-610] in exchange for a payment that is applied against the secured obligation. However, a secondary obligor who pays and receives a transfer of collateral does not necessarily become subrogated to the rights of the secured party as contemplated by subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)]. Only to the extent the secondary obligor makes a payment in satisfaction of its secondary obligation would it become subrogated. To the extent its payment constitutes the price of the collateral in a Section 9-610 [30-9A-610] disposition by the secured party, the secondary obligor would not be subrogated. Thus, if the amount paid by the secondary obligor for the collateral in a Section 9-610 [30-9A-610] disposition is itself insufficient to discharge the secured obligation, but the secondary obligor makes an additional payment that satisfies the remaining balance, the secondary obligor would be subrogated to the secured party's deficiency claim. However, the duties of the secured party as such would have come to an end with respect to that collateral. In some situations the capacity in which the payment is made may be unclear. Accordingly, the parties should in their relationship provide clear evidence of the nature and circumstances of the payment by the secondary obligor.

3. Transfer of Collateral to Secondary Obligor. It is possible for a secured party to transfer collateral to a secondary obligor in a transaction that is a disposition under Section 9-610 [30-9A-610] and that establishes a surplus or deficiency under Section 9-615 [30-9A-615]. Indeed, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] includes a special rule, in Section 9-615(f) [30-9A-615(6)], for establishing a deficiency in the case of some dispositions to, inter alia, secondary obligors. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] rejects the view, which some may have ascribed to former Section 9-504(5) [30-9-504(5), now repealed], that a transfer of collateral to a recourse party can never constitute a disposition of collateral which discharges a security interest. Inasmuch as a secured party could itself buy collateral at its own public sale, it makes no sense to prohibit a recourse party ever from buying at the sale.

4. Timing and Scope of Obligations. Under subsection (a) [subsection (1)], a recourse party acquires rights and incurs obligations only "after" one of the specified circumstances occurs. This makes clear that when a successor assignee, transferee, or subrogee becomes obligated it does not assume any liability for earlier actions or inactions of the secured party whom it has succeeded unless it agrees to do so. Once the successor becomes obligated, however, it is responsible for complying with the secured party's duties thereafter. For example, if the successor is in possession of collateral, then it has the duties specified in Section 9-207 [30-9A-207].

Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], the same event (assignment, transfer, or subrogation) that gives rise to rights to, and imposes obligations on, a successor relieves its predecessor of any further duties under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. For example, if the security interest is enforced after the secured obligation is assigned, the assignee-but not the assignor-has the duty to comply with this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. Similarly, the assignment does not excuse the assignor from liability for failure to comply with duties that arose before the event or impose liability on the assignee for the assignor's failure to comply.

30-9A-619. Transfer of record or legal title.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Transfer of Record or Legal Title. Potential buyers of collateral that is covered by a certificate of title (e.g., an automobile) or is subject to a registration system (e.g., a copyright) typically require as a condition of their purchase that the certificate or registry reflect their ownership. In many cases, this condition can be met only with the consent of the record owner. If the record owner is the debtor and, as may be the case after the default, the debtor refuses to cooperate, the secured party may have great difficulty disposing of the collateral.

Subsection (b) [subsection 2] provides a simple mechanism for obtaining record or legal title, for use primarily when other law does not provide one. Of course, use of this mechanism will not be effective to clear title to the extent that subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is preempted by federal law. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] contemplates a transfer of record or legal title to a third party, following a secured party's exercise of its disposition or acceptance remedies under this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6], as well as a transfer by a debtor to a secured party prior to the secured party's exercise of those remedies. Under subsection (c) [subsection (3)], a transfer of record or legal title (under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] or under other law) to a secured party prior to the exercise of those remedies merely puts the secured party in a position to pass legal or record title to a transferee at foreclosure. A secured party who has obtained record or legal title retains its duties with respect to enforcement of its security interest, and the debtor retains its rights as well.

3. Title-Clearing Systems Under Other Law. Applicable non-UCC law (e.g., a certificate-of-title statute, federal registry rules, or the like) may provide a means by which the secured party may obtain or transfer record or legal title for the purpose of a disposition of the property under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. The mechanism provided by this section is in addition to any title-clearing provision under law other than this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A].

30-9A-620. Acceptance of collateral in full or partial satisfaction — compulsory disposition of collateral.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-505 [30-9-505, now repealed].

2. Overview. This section and the two sections following deal with strict foreclosure, a procedure by which the secured party acquires the debtor's interest in the collateral without the need for a sale or other disposition under Section 9-610 [30-9A-610]. Although these provisions derive from former Section 9-505 [30-9-505, now repealed], they have been entirely reorganized and substantially rewritten. The more straightforward approach taken in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] eliminates the fiction that the secured party always will present a "proposal" for the retention of collateral and the debtor will have a fixed period to respond. By eliminating the need (but preserving the possibility) for proceeding in that fashion, this section eliminates much of the awkwardness of former Section 9-505 [30-9-505, now repealed]. It reflects the belief that strict foreclosures should be encouraged and often will produce better results than a disposition for all concerned.

Subsection (a) [subsection 1] sets forth the conditions necessary to an effective acceptance (formerly, retention) of collateral in full or partial satisfaction of the secured obligation. Section 9-621 [30-9A-621] requires in addition that a secured party who wishes to proceed under this section notify certain other persons who have or claim to have an interest in the collateral. Unlike the failure to meet the conditions in subsection (a) [subsection (1)], under Section 9-622(b) [30-9A-622(2)] the failure to comply with the notification requirement of Section 9-621 [30-9A-621] does not render the acceptance of collateral ineffective. Rather, the acceptance can take effect notwithstanding the secured party's noncompliance. A person to whom the required notice was not sent has the right to recover damages under Section 9-625(b) [30-9A-625(2)]. Section 9-622(a) [30-9A-622(1)] sets forth the effect of an acceptance of collateral.

3. Conditions to Effective Acceptance. Subsection (a) [subsection 1] contains the conditions necessary to the effectiveness of an acceptance of collateral. Subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)] requires the debtor's consent. Under subsections (c)(1) and (c)(2) [subsections (3)(a) and (3)(b)], the debtor may consent by agreeing to the acceptance in writing after default. Subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)] contains an alternative method by which to satisfy the debtor's-consent condition in subsection (a)(1) [subsection (1)(a)]. It follows the proposal-and-objection model found in former Section 9-505 [30-9-505, now repealed]: The debtor consents if the secured party sends a proposal to the debtor and does not receive an objection within 20 days. Under subsection (c)(1) [subsection (3)(a)], however, that silence is not deemed to be consent with respect to acceptances in partial satisfaction. Thus, a secured party who wishes to conduct a "partial strict foreclosure" must obtain the debtor's agreement in a record authenticated after default. In all other respects, the conditions necessary to an effective partial strict foreclosure are the same as those governing acceptance of collateral in full satisfaction. (But see subsection (g) [subsection (7)], prohibiting partial strict foreclosure of a security interest in consumer transactions.)

The time when a debtor consents to a strict foreclosure is significant in several circumstances under this section and the following one. See Sections 9-620(a)(1), (d)(2), 9-621(a)(1), (a)(2), (a)(3) [30-9A-620(1)(a) and (4)(b) and 30-9A-621(1)(a), (1)(b), and (1)(c)]. For purposes of determining the time of consent, a debtor's conditional consent constitutes consent.

Subsection (a)(2) [subsection (1)(b)] contains the second condition to the effectiveness of an acceptance under this section-the absence of a timely objection from a person holding a junior interest in the collateral or from a secondary obligor. Any junior party-secured party or lienholder-is entitled to lodge an objection to a proposal, even if that person was not entitled to notification under Section 9-621 [30-9A-621]. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)], discussed below, indicates when an objection is timely.

Subsections (a)(3) and (a)(4) [subsections (1)(c) and (1)(d)] contain special rules for transactions in which consumers are involved. See Comment 12.

4. Proposals. Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] defines the term "proposal." It is necessary to send a "proposal" to the debtor only if the debtor does not agree to an acceptance in an authenticated record as described in subsection (c)(1) or (c)(2) [subsection (3)(a) or (3)(b)]. Section 9-621(a) [30-9A-621(1)] determines whether it is necessary to send a proposal to third parties. A proposal need not take any particular form as long as it sets forth the terms under which the secured party is willing to accept collateral in satisfaction. A proposal to accept collateral should specify the amount (or a means of calculating the amount, such as by including a per diem accrual figure) of the secured obligations to be satisfied, state the conditions (if any) under which the proposal may be revoked, and describe any other applicable conditions. Note, however, that a conditional proposal generally requires the debtor's agreement in order to take effect. See subsection (c) [subsection (3)].

5. Secured Party's Agreement; No "Constructive" Strict Foreclosure. The conditions of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] relate to actual or implied consent by the debtor and any secondary obligor or holder of a junior security interest or lien. To ensure that the debtor cannot unilaterally cause an acceptance of collateral, subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that compliance with these conditions is necessary but not sufficient to cause an acceptance of collateral. Rather, under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], acceptance does not occur unless, in addition, the secured party consents to the acceptance in an authenticated record or sends to the debtor a proposal. For this reason, a mere delay in collection or disposition of collateral does not constitute a "constructive" strict foreclosure. Instead, delay is a factor relating to whether the secured party acted in a commercially reasonable manner for purposes of Section 9-607 or 9-610 [30-9A-607 or 30-9A-610]. A debtor's voluntary surrender of collateral to a secured party and the secured party's acceptance of possession of the collateral does not, of itself, necessarily raise an implication that the secured party intends or is proposing to accept the collateral in satisfaction of the secured obligation under this section.

6. When Acceptance Occurs. This section does not impose any formalities or identify any steps that a secured party must take in order to accept collateral once the conditions of subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] have been met. Absent facts or circumstances indicating a contrary intention, the fact that the conditions have been met provides a sufficient indication that the secured party has accepted the collateral on the terms to which the secured party has consented or proposed and the debtor has consented or failed to object. Following a proposal, acceptance of the collateral normally is automatic upon the secured party's becoming bound and the time for objection passing. As a matter of good business practice, an enforcing secured party may wish to memorialize its acceptance following a proposal, such as by notifying the debtor that the strict foreclosure is effective or by placing a written record to that effect in its files. The secured party's agreement to accept collateral is self-executing and cannot be breached. The secured party is bound by its agreement to accept collateral and by any proposal to which the debtor consents.

7. No Possession Requirement. This section eliminates the requirement in former Section 9-505 [30-9-505, now repealed] that the secured party be "in possession" of collateral. It clarifies that intangible collateral, which cannot be possessed, may be subject to a strict foreclosure under this section. However, under subsection (a)(3) [subsection (1)(c)], if the collateral is consumer goods, acceptance does not occur unless the debtor is not in possession.

8. When Objection Timely. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] explains when an objection is timely and thus prevents an acceptance of collateral from taking effect. An objection by a person to which notification was sent under Section 9-621 [30-9A-621] is effective if it is received by the secured party within 20 days from the date the notification was sent to that person. Other objecting parties (i.e., third parties who are not entitled to notification) may object at any time within 20 days after the last notification is sent under Section 9-621 [30-9A-621]. If no such notification is sent, third parties must object before the debtor agrees to the acceptance in writing or is deemed to have consented by silence. The former may occur any time after default, and the latter requires a 20-day waiting period. See subsection (c) [subsection (3)].

9. Applicability of Other Law. This section does not purport to regulate all aspects of the transaction by which a secured party may become the owner of collateral previously owned by the debtor. For example, a secured party's acceptance of a motor vehicle in satisfaction of secured obligations may require compliance with the applicable motor vehicle certificate-of-title law. State legislatures should conform those laws so that they mesh well with this section and Section 9-610 [30-9A-610], and courts should construe those laws and this section harmoniously. A secured party's acceptance of collateral in the possession of the debtor also may implicate statutes dealing with a seller's retention of possession of goods sold.

10. Accounts, Chattel Paper, Payment Intangibles, and Promissory Notes. If the collateral is accounts, chattel paper, payment intangibles, or promissory notes, then a secured party's acceptance of the collateral in satisfaction of secured obligations would constitute a sale to the secured party. That sale normally would give rise to a new security interest (the ownership interest) under Sections 1-201(37) and 9-109 [30-1-201(37) and 30-9A-109]. In the case of accounts and chattel paper, the new security interest would remain perfected by a filing that was effective to perfect the secured party's original security interest. In the case of payment intangibles or promissory notes, the security interest would be perfected when it attaches. See Section 9-309 [30-9A-309]. However, the procedures for acceptance of collateral under this section satisfy all necessary formalities and a new security agreement authenticated by the debtor would not be necessary.

11. Role of Good Faith. Section 1-203 [30-1-203] imposes an obligation of good faith on a secured party's enforcement under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. This obligation may not be disclaimed by agreement. See Section 1-102 [30-1-102]. Thus, a proposal and acceptance made under this section in bad faith would not be effective. For example, a secured party's proposal to accept marketable securities worth $1,000 in full satisfaction of indebtedness in the amount of $100, made in the hopes that the debtor might inadvertently fail to object, would be made in bad faith. On the other hand, in the normal case proposals and acceptances should be not second-guessed on the basis of the "value" of the collateral involved. Disputes about valuation or even a clear excess of collateral value over the amount of obligations satisfied do not necessarily demonstrate the absence of good faith.

12. Special Rules in Consumer Cases. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] imposes an obligation on the secured party to dispose of consumer goods under certain circumstances. Subsection (f) [subsection (6)] explains when a disposition that is required under subsection (e) [subsection (5)] is timely. An effective acceptance of collateral cannot occur if subsection (e) [subsection (5)] requires a disposition unless the debtor waives this requirement pursuant to Section 9-624(b) [30-9A-624(2)]. Moreover, a secured party who takes possession of collateral and unreasonably delays disposition violates subsection (e) [subsection (5)], if applicable, and may also violate Section 9-610 [30-9A-610] or other provisions of this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] eliminates as superfluous the express statutory reference to "conversion" found in former Section 9-505 [30-9-505, now repealed]. Remedies available under other law, including conversion, remain available under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] in appropriate cases. See Sections 1-103, 1-106 [30-1-103, 30-1-106].

Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] prohibits the secured party in consumer transactions from accepting collateral in partial satisfaction of the obligation it secures. If a secured party attempts an acceptance in partial satisfaction in a consumer transaction, the attempted acceptance is void.

Effect of Notice of Intent to Sell Pledged Collateral: Defaulting debtors could not rely on 30-9-505(2) (section now repealed, see 30-9A-620, 30-9A-621, and 30-9A-624) to contend that secured party's actions in achieving a sale constituted a rescission, and satisfaction of the debt, so as to bar further recovery where defaulting debtors were given notice of an intent to enforce security interest by means of a sale of pledged collateral, and where secured party obtained a Writ of Mandate ultimately effectuating a sale. 30-9A-621. Notification of proposal to accept collateral.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-505 [30-9-505, now repealed].

2. Notification Requirement. Subsection (a) [subsection 1] specifies three classes of competing claimants to whom the secured party must send notification of its proposal: (i) those who notify the secured party that they claim an interest in the collateral, (ii) holders of certain security interests and liens who have filed against the debtor, and (iii) holders of certain security interests who have perfected by compliance with a statute (including a certificate-of-title statute), regulation, or treaty described in Section 9-311(a) [30-9A-311(1)]. With regard to (ii), see Section 9-611 [30-9A-611], Comment 4. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] also requires notification to any secondary obligor if the proposal is for acceptance in partial satisfaction.

Unlike Section 9-611 [30-9A-611], this section contains no "safe harbor," which excuses an enforcing secured party from notifying certain secured parties and other lienholders. This is because, unlike Section 9-610 [30-9A-610], which requires that a disposition of collateral be commercially reasonable, Section 9-620 [30-9A-620] permits the debtor and secured party to set the amount of credit the debtor will receive for the collateral subject only to the requirement of good faith. An effective acceptance discharges subordinate security interests and other subordinate liens. See Section 9-622 [30-9A-622]. If collateral is subject to several liens securing debts much larger than the value of the collateral, the debtor may be disinclined to refrain from consenting to an acceptance by the holder of the senior security interest, even though, had the debtor objected and the senior disposed of the collateral under Section 9-610 [30-9A-610], the collateral may have yielded more than enough to satisfy the senior security interest (but not enough to satisfy all the liens). Accordingly, this section imposes upon the enforcing secured party the risk of the filing office's errors and delay. The holder of a security interest who is entitled to notification under this section but does not receive it has the right to recover under Section 9-625(b) [30-9A-625(2)] any loss resulting from the enforcing secured party's noncompliance with this section.

30-9A-622. Effect of acceptance of collateral.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Effect of Acceptance. Subsection (a) [subsection 1] specifies the effect of an acceptance of collateral in full or partial satisfaction of the secured obligation. The acceptance to which it refers is an effective acceptance. If a purported acceptance is ineffective under Section 9-620 [30-9A-620], e.g., because the secured party receives a timely objection from a person entitled to notification, then neither this subsection nor subsection (b) [subsection (2)] applies. Paragraph (1) [subsection (1)(a)] expresses the fundamental consequence of accepting collateral in full or partial satisfaction of the secured obligation-the obligation is discharged to the extent consented to by the debtor. Unless otherwise agreed, the obligor remains liable for any deficiency. Paragraphs (2) through (4) [subsections (1)(b) through (1)(d)] indicate the effects of an acceptance on various property rights and interests. Paragraph (2) [subsection (1)(b)] follows Section 9-617(a) [subsection (1)] in providing that the secured party acquires "all of a debtor's rights in the collateral." Under paragraph (3) [subsection (1)(c)], the effect of strict foreclosure on holders of junior security interests and other liens is the same regardless of whether the collateral is accepted in full or partial satisfaction of the secured obligation: all junior encumbrances are discharged. Paragraph (4) [subsections (1)(d)] provides for the termination of other subordinate interests.

Subsection (b) [subsection 2] makes clear that subordinate interests are discharged under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] regardless of whether the secured party complies with this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Thus, subordinate interests are discharged regardless of whether a proposal was required to be sent or, if required, was sent. However, a secured party's failure to send a proposal or otherwise to comply with this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] may subject the secured party to liability under Section 9-625 [30-9A-625].

30-9A-623. Right to redeem collateral.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-506 [30-9-506, now repealed].

2. Redemption Right. Under this section, as under former Section 9-506 [30-9-506, now repealed], the debtor or another secured party may redeem collateral as long as the secured party has not collected (Section 9-607 [30-9A-607]), disposed of or contracted for the disposition of (Section 9-610 [30-9A-610]), or accepted (Section 9-620 [30-9A-620]) the collateral. Although this section generally follows former Section 9-506 [30-9-506, now repealed], it extends the right of redemption to holders of nonconsensual liens. To redeem the collateral a person must tender fulfillment of all obligations secured, plus certain expenses. If the entire balance of a secured obligation has been accelerated, it would be necessary to tender the entire balance. A tender of fulfillment obviously means more than a new promise to perform an existing promise. It requires payment in full of all monetary obligations then due and performance in full of all other obligations then matured. If unmatured secured obligations remain, the security interest continues to secure them (i.e., as if there had been no default).

3. Redemption of Remaining Collateral Following Partial Enforcement. Under Section 9-610 [30-9A-610] a secured party may make successive dispositions of portions of its collateral. These dispositions would not affect the debtor's, another secured party's, or a lienholder's right to redeem the remaining collateral.

4. Effect of "Repledging." Section 9-207 [30-9A-207] generally permits a secured party having possession or control of collateral to create a security interest in the collateral. As explained in the Comments to that section, the debtor's right (as opposed to its practical ability) to redeem collateral is not affected by, and does not affect, the priority of a security interest created by the debtor's secured party.

Redemption of Portion of Collateral: The debtor tendered a sum that covered the balance owed on one airplane in which the defendants had a security interest, but since that sum did not satisfy the balance owed on a second airplane, which was also secured by the first plane, the tender offered did not fulfill the requirements of 30-9-506 (now repealed, see 30-9A-623 and 30-9A-624) allowing redemption. It makes no provision for waiver of the rule prohibiting a secured party from buying at its own private disposition. Transactions of this kind are equivalent to "strict foreclosures" and are governed by Sections 9-620, 9-621, and 9-622 [30-9A-620, 30-9A-621, and 30-9A-622].

30-9A-625. Remedies for secured party's failure to comply with chapter.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-507 [30-9-507, now repealed].

2. Remedies for Noncompliance; Scope. Subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] provide the basic remedies afforded to those aggrieved by a secured party's failure to comply with this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Like all provisions that create liability, they are subject to Section 9-628 [30-9A-628], which should be read in conjunction with Section 9-605 [30-9A-605]. The principal limitations under this Part on a secured party's right to enforce its security interest against collateral are the requirements that it proceed in good faith (Section 1-203 [30-1-203]), in a commercially reasonable manner (Sections 9-607 and 9-610 [30-9A-607 and 30-9A-610]), and, in most cases, with reasonable notification (Sections 9-611 through 9-614 [30-9A-611 through 30-9A-614]). Following former Section 9-507 [30-9-507, now repealed], under subsection (a) [subsection (1)] an aggrieved person may seek injunctive relief, and under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] the person may recover damages for losses caused by noncompliance. Unlike former Section 9-507 [30-9-507, now repealed], however, subsections (a) and (b) [subsections (1) and (2)] are not limited to noncompliance with provisions of this Part of Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. Rather, they apply to noncompliance with any provision of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. The change makes this section applicable to noncompliance with Sections 9-207 [30-9A-207] (duties of secured party in possession of collateral), 9-208 [30-9A-208] (duties of secured party having control over deposit account), 9-209 [30-9A-209] (duties of secured party if account debtor has been notified of an assignment), 9-210 [30-9A-210] (duty to comply with request for accounting, etc.), 9-509(a) [30-9A-509(1)] (duty to refrain from filing unauthorized financing statement), and 9-513(a) or (c) [30-9A-513(1) or (3)] (duty to provide termination statement). Subsection (a) [subsection 1] also modifies the first sentence of former Section 9-507(1) [30-9-507(1), now repealed] by adding the references to "collection" and "enforcement." Subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)], which gives a minimum damage recovery in consumer-goods transactions, applies only to noncompliance with the provisions of this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6].

3. Damages for Noncompliance with this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] sets forth the basic remedy for failure to comply with the requirements of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]: a damage recovery in the amount of loss caused by the noncompliance. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] identifies who may recover under subsection (b) [subsection (2)]. It affords a remedy to any aggrieved person who is a debtor or obligor. However, a principal obligor who is not a debtor may recover damages only for noncompliance with Section 9-616 [30-9A-616], inasmuch as none of the other rights and duties in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] run in favor of such a principal obligor. Such a principal obligor could not suffer any loss or damage on account of noncompliance with rights or duties of which it is not a beneficiary. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] also affords a remedy to an aggrieved person who holds a competing security interest or other lien, regardless of whether the aggrieved person is entitled to notification under Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. The remedy is available even to holders of senior security interests and other liens. The exercise of this remedy is subject to the normal rules of pleading and proof. A person who has delegated the duties of a secured party but who remains obligated to perform them is liable under this subsection. The last sentence of subsection (d) [subsection (4)] eliminates the possibility of double recovery or other over-compensation arising out of a reduction or elimination of a deficiency under Section 9-626 [30-9A-626], based on noncompliance with the provisions of this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] relating to collection, enforcement, disposition, or acceptance. Assuming no double recovery, a debtor whose deficiency is eliminated under Section 9-626 [30-9A-626] may pursue a claim for a surplus. Because Section 9-626 [30-9A-626] does not apply to consumer transactions, the statute is silent as to whether a double recovery or other over-compensation is possible in a consumer transaction.

Damages for violation of the requirements of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], including Section 9-609 [30-9A-609], are those reasonably calculated to put an eligible claimant in the position that it would have occupied had no violation occurred. See Section 1-106 [30-1-106]. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] supports the recovery of actual damages for committing a breach of the peace in violation of Section 9-609 [30-9A-609], and principles of tort law supplement this subsection. See Section 1-103 [30-1-103]. However, to the extent that damages in tort compensate the debtor for the same loss dealt with by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], the debtor should be entitled to only one recovery.

4. Minimum Damages in Consumer-Goods Transactions. Subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)] provides a minimum, statutory, damage recovery for a debtor and secondary obligor in a consumer-goods transaction. It is patterned on former Section 9-507(1) [30-9-507(1), now repealed] and is designed to ensure that every noncompliance with the requirements of Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] in a consumer-goods transaction results in liability, regardless of any injury that may have resulted. Subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)] leaves the treatment of statutory damages as it was under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. A secured party is not liable for statutory damages under this subsection more than once with respect to any one secured obligation (see Section 9-628(e) [30-9A-628(5)]), nor is a secured party liable under this subsection for failure to comply with Section 9-616 [30-9A-616] (see Section 9-628(d) [30-9A-628(4)]).

Following former Section 9-507(1) [30-9-507(1), now repealed], this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not include a definition or explanation of the terms "credit service charge," "principal amount," "time-price differential," or "cash price," as used in subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(b)]. It leaves their construction and application to the court, taking into account the subsection's purpose of providing a minimum recovery in consumer-goods transactions.

5. Supplemental Damages. Subsections (e) and (f) [subsection (5) and (6)] provide damages that supplement the recovery, if any, under subsection (b) [subsection (2)]. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] imposes an additional $500 liability upon a person who fails to comply with the provisions specified in that subsection, and subsection (f) [subsection (6)] imposes like damages on a person who, without reasonable excuse, fails to comply with a request for an accounting or a request regarding a list of collateral or statement of account under Section 9-210 [30-9A-210]. However, under subsection (f) [subsection (6)], a person has a reasonable excuse for the failure if the person never claimed an interest in the collateral or obligations that were the subject of the request.

6. Estoppel. Subsection (g) [subsection (7)] limits the extent to which a secured party who fails to comply with a request regarding a list of collateral or statement of account may claim a security interest.

Compiler's Comments

2001 Amendment: Chapter 179 near beginning of (2) substituted "person" for "secured party" and after "failure to comply" deleted "with a request under 30-9-220". Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

Case Notes

CASES DECIDED PRIOR TO 1999 REVISION

Commercial Reasonableness of Agisters' Lien Sale: Appellants claimed the sale of horses at an agisters' lien sale was not commercially reasonable because the horses were sold in lots at less than their value. Looking to 30-9-507 (now repealed, see 30-9A-625 and 30-9A-627) for guidance, the Supreme Court stated that the sale of horses at a low price in lots instead of individually did not make the sale commercially unreasonable. Testimony indicated that horses were often sold in this manner and could have been sold individually if a bidder had so requested. Rose v. Myers, 223 M 13, 724 P2d 176, 43 St. Rep. 1493 (1986).

Price Discrepancy Bearing on Commercial Reasonableness: Plaintiff bought a photography business and executed a promissory note with defendant. As collateral he assigned stock in the business. Plaintiff sold the business to Wolfe. Wolfe was to make payments to defendant to discharge his obligations, and these payments were to be directly applied to plaintiff's obligation under the promissory note. Defendant was escrow agent. Plaintiff later signed a financing statement granting defendant a security interest in the stock held in escrow. The defendant filed the security agreement. Wolfe became delinquent in his payments, and defendant notified plaintiff his payments were therefore delinquent. A later letter was sent by certified mail to the same address advising plaintiff the stock would be sold and applied to plaintiff's past-due loan. At the sale Wolfe bought the stock for the amount due on plaintiff's note. Plaintiff contended the sale of the collateral was not conducted in a commercially reasonable manner as indicated by the low price received. The Supreme Court held that a large discrepancy in price may be considered in determining commercial reasonableness but that the complaining party has the burden of showing the price received was less than the fair market value of the collateral. The court did not find substantial evidence to support the contention. Dulan v. Mont. Nat'l Bank of Roundup, 203 M 177, 661 P2d 28, 40 St. Rep. 376 (1983), followed in Owen v. Ostrum, 259 M 249, 855 P2d 1015, 50 St. Rep. 779 (1993). See also Auto Credit, Inc. v. Long, 1998 MT 327, 292 M 238, 971 P2d 1237, 55 St. Rep. 1326 (1998).

Commercially Reasonable: The reasonableness of the sale is determined not by the price that is ultimately received for the collateral, but by the manner in which the sale is conducted; and where defendant acted in good faith and even transported collateral to auction in another state hoping to find a better market, he conducted the sale in a commercially reasonable manner. James Talcott, Inc. v. Reynolds, 165 M 404, 529 P2d 352 (1974).

Compliance With Notice Provisions: Plaintiff complied with notice provisions of the Uniform Commercial Code when he sent notice of foreclosure sale to debtor by ordinary mail, since the receipt of mail is presumed if the procedure of the mailing is carried out in a regular manner. James Talcott, Inc. v. Reynolds, 165 M 404, 529 P2d 352 (1974).

30-9A-626. Action in which deficiency or surplus is in issue.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Scope. The basic damage remedy under Section 9-625(b) [30-9A-625(2)] is subject to the special rules in this section for transactions other than consumer transactions. This section addresses situations in which the amount of a deficiency or surplus is in issue, i.e., situations in which the secured party has collected, enforced, disposed of, or accepted the collateral. It contains special rules applicable to a determination of the amount of a deficiency or surplus.

Because this section affects a person's liability for a deficiency, it is subject to Section 9-628 [30-9A-628], which should be read in conjunction with Section 9-605 [30-9A-605]. The rules in this section apply only to noncompliance in connection with the "collection, enforcement, disposition, or acceptance" under Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. For other types of noncompliance with Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6], the general liability rule of Section 9-625(b) [30-9A-625(2)]-recovery of actual damages-applies. Consider, for example, a repossession that does not comply with Section 9-609 [30-9A-609] for want of a default. The debtor's remedy is under Section 9-625(b) [30-9A-625(2)]. In a proper case, the secured party also may be liable for conversion under non-UCC law. If the secured party thereafter disposed of the collateral, however, it would violate Section 9-610 [30-9A-610] at that time, and this section would apply.

3. Rebuttable Presumption Rule. Subsection (a) [subsection 1] establishes the rebuttable presumption rule for transactions other than consumer transactions. Under paragraph (1) [subsection (1)(a)], the secured party need not prove compliance with the relevant provisions of this Part [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] as part of its prima facie case. If, however, the debtor or a secondary obligor raises the issue (in accordance with the forum's rules of pleading and practice), then the secured party bears the burden of proving that the collection, enforcement, disposition, or acceptance complied. In the event the secured party is unable to meet this burden, then paragraph (3) [subsection (1)(c)] explains how to calculate the deficiency. Under this rebuttable presumption rule, the debtor or obligor is to be credited with the greater of the actual proceeds of the disposition or the proceeds that would have been realized had the secured party complied with the relevant provisions. If a deficiency remains, then the secured party is entitled to recover it. The references to "the secured obligation, expenses, and attorney's fees" in paragraphs (3) and (4) [subsections (1)(c) and (1)(d)] embrace the application rules in Sections 9-608(a) and 9-615(a) [30-9A-608(1) and 30-9A-615(1)].

Unless the secured party proves that compliance with the relevant provisions would have yielded a smaller amount, under paragraph (4) [subsection (1)(d)] the amount that a complying collection, enforcement, or disposition would have yielded is deemed to be equal to the amount of the secured obligation, together with expenses and attorney's fees. Thus, the secured party may not recover any deficiency unless it meets this burden.

4. Consumer Transactions. Although subsection (a) [subsection (1)] adopts a version of the rebuttable presumption rule for transactions other than consumer transactions, with certain exceptions Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6] does not specify the effect of a secured party's noncompliance in consumer transactions. (The exceptions are the provisions for the recovery of damages in Section 9-625 [30-9A-625].) Subsection (b) [subsection 2] provides that the limitation of subsection (a) [subsection (1)] to transactions other than consumer transactions is intended to leave to the court the determination of the proper rules in consumer transactions. It also instructs the court not to draw any inference from the limitation as to the proper rules for consumer transactions and leaves the court free to continue to apply established approaches to those transactions.

Courts construing former Section 9-507 [30-9-507, now repealed, see 30-9A-625 and 30-9A-627] disagreed about the consequences of a secured party's failure to comply with the requirements of former Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9, part 5, now repealed]. Three general approaches emerged. Some courts have held that a noncomplying secured party may not recover a deficiency (the "absolute bar" rule). A few courts held that the debtor can offset against a claim to a deficiency all damages recoverable under former Section 9-507 [30-9-507, now repealed, see 30-9A-625 and 30-9A-627] resulting from the secured party's noncompliance (the "offset" rule). A plurality of courts considering the issue held that the noncomplying secured party is barred from recovering a deficiency unless it overcomes a rebuttable presumption that compliance with former Part 5 [Title 30, chapter 9, part 5, now repealed] would have yielded an amount sufficient to satisfy the secured debt. In addition to the nonuniformity resulting from court decisions, some States enacted special rules governing the availability of deficiencies.

5. Burden of Proof When Section 9-615(f) [30-9A-615(6)] Applies. In a non-consumer transaction, subsection (a)(5) [subsection (1)(e)] imposes upon a debtor or obligor the burden of proving that the proceeds of a disposition are so low that, under Section 9-615(f) [30-9A-615(6)], the actual proceeds should not serve as the basis upon which a deficiency or surplus is calculated. Were the burden placed on the secured party, then debtors might be encouraged to challenge the price received in every disposition to the secured party, a person related to the secured party, or a secondary obligor.

6. Delay in Applying This Section. There is an inevitable delay between the time a secured party engages in a noncomplying collection, enforcement, disposition, or acceptance and the time of a subsequent judicial determination that the secured party did not comply with Part 6 [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 6]. During the interim, the secured party, believing that the secured obligation is larger than it ultimately is determined to be, may continue to enforce its security interest in collateral. If some or all of the secured indebtedness ultimately is discharged under this section, a reasonable application of this section would impose liability on the secured party for the amount of any excess, unwarranted recoveries but would not make the enforcement efforts wrongful.

Official Comments

1. Source. Former Section 9-507(2) [30-9-507(2), now repealed].

2. Relationship of Price to Commercial Reasonableness. Some observers have found the notion contained in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] (derived from former Section 9-507(2) [30-9-507(2), now repealed]) (the fact that a better price could have been obtained does not establish lack of commercial reasonableness) to be inconsistent with that found in Section 9-610(b) [30-9A-610(2)] (derived from former Section 9-504(3) [30-9-504(3), now repealed] (every aspect of the disposition, including its terms, must be commercially reasonable). There is no such inconsistency. While not itself sufficient to establish a violation of this Part, a low price suggests that a court should scrutinize carefully all aspects of a disposition to ensure that each aspect was commercially reasonable.

The law long has grappled with the problem of dispositions of personal and real property which comply with applicable procedural requirements (e.g., advertising, notification to interested persons, etc.) but which yield a price that seems low. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] addresses that issue in Section 9-615(f) [30-9A-615(6)]. That section applies only when the transferee is the secured party, a person related to the secured party, or a secondary obligor. It contains a special rule for calculating a deficiency or surplus in a complying disposition that yields a price that is "significantly below the range of proceeds that a complying disposition to a person other than the secured party, a person related to the secured party, or a secondary obligor would have brought."

3. Determination of Commercial Reasonableness; Advance Approval. It is important to make clear the conduct and procedures that are commercially reasonable and to provide a secured party with the means of obtaining, by court order or negotiation with a creditors' committee or a representative of creditors, advance approval of a proposed method of enforcement as commercially reasonable. This section contains rules that assist in that determination and provides for advance approval in appropriate situations. However, none of the specific methods of disposition specified in subsection (b) [subsection (2)] is required or exclusive.

4. "Recognized Market." As in Sections 9-610(c) and 9-611(d) [30-9A-610(3) and 30-9A-611(4)], the concept of a "recognized market" in subsections (b)(1) and (2) [subsections (2)(a) and (2)(b)] is quite limited; it applies only to markets in which there are standardized price quotations for property that is essentially fungible, such as stock exchanges.

30-9A-628. Nonliability and limitation on liability of secured party — liability of secondary obligor.

Official Comments

1. Source. New.

2. Exculpatory Provisions. Subsections (a), (b), and (c) [subsections (1), (2), and (3)] contain exculpatory provisions that should be read in conjunction with Section 9-605 [30-9A-605]. Without this group of provisions, a secured party could incur liability to unknown persons and under circumstances that would not allow the secured party to protect itself. The broadened definition of the term "debtor" underscores the need for these provisions.

If a secured party reasonably, but mistakenly, believes that a consumer transaction or consumer-goods transaction is a non-consumer transaction or non-consumer-goods transaction, and if the secured party's belief is based on its reasonable reliance on a representation of the type specified in subsection (c)(1) or (c)(2) [subsection (3)(a) or (3)(b)], then this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] should be applied as if the facts reasonably believed and reasonably relied upon were true. For example, if a secured party reasonably believed that a transaction was a non-consumer transaction and its belief was based on reasonable reliance on the debtor's misrepresentation that the collateral secured an obligation incurred for business purposes, the rebuttable presumption rule would apply under 9-626(b) [30-9A-626(2)]. Of course, if the secured party's belief is not reasonable or, even if reasonable, is not based on reasonable reliance on the debtor's misrepresentation, this limitation on liability is inapplicable.

3. Inapplicability of Statutory Damages to Section 9-616 [30-9A-616]. Subsection (d) [subsection (4)] excludes noncompliance with Section 9-616 [30-9A-616] entirely from the scope of statutory damage liability under Section 9-625(c)(2) [30-9A-625(3)(b)].

4. Single Liability for Statutory Minimum Damages. Subsection (e) [subsection (5)] ensures that a secured party will incur statutory damages only once in connection with any one secured obligation.

Part 7
Transition

Part Official Comments

Source. Section 9-701 [Effective Date — Section 171, Ch. 305, L. 1999].

A uniform law as complex as Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] necessarily gives rise to difficult problems and uncertainties during the transition to the new law. As is customary for uniform laws, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] is based on the general assumption that all States will have enacted substantially identical versions. While always important, uniformity is essential to the success of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. If former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] is in effect in some jurisdictions, and this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] is in effect in others, horrendous complications may arise. For example, the proper place in which to file to perfect a security interest (and thus the status of a particular security interest as perfected or unperfected) would depend on whether the matter was litigated in a State in which former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] was in effect or a State in which this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] was in effect. Accordingly, this section [section 171, Ch. 305, L. 1999, not codified] contemplates that States will adopt a uniform effective date for this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Any one State's failure to adopt the uniform effective date will greatly increase the cost and uncertainty surrounding the transition.

Other problems arise from transactions and relationships that were entered into under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] or under non-UCC law and which remain outstanding on the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. The difficulties arise primarily because this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] expands the scope of former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] to cover additional types of collateral and transactions and because it provides new methods of perfection for some types of collateral, different priority rules, and different choice-of-law rules governing perfection and priority. This Section [section 171, Ch. 305, L. 1999, not codified] and the other sections in this Part [30-9A-703 through 30-9A-706, 30-9A-708, and 30-9A-709] address primarily this second set of problems.

1. Pre-Effective-Date Transactions. Subsection (a) [subsection 1] contains the general rule that this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] applies to transactions, security interests, and other liens within its scope (see Section 9-109 [30-9A-109]), even if the transaction or lien was entered into or created before the effective date. Thus, secured transactions entered into under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] must be terminated, completed, consummated, and enforced under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] is an exception to the general rule. It applies to valid, pre-effective-date transactions and liens that were not governed by former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] but would be governed by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] if they had been entered into or created after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], these valid transactions, such as the creation of agricultural liens and security interests in commercial tort claims, retain their validity under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] and may be terminated, completed, consummated, and enforced under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. However, these transactions also may be terminated, completed, consummated, and enforced by the law that otherwise would apply had this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] not taken effect.

2. Judicial Proceedings Commenced Before Effective Date. As is usual in transition provisions, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not affect litigation pending on the effective date.

(b) the transactions and liens may be terminated, completed, consummated, or enforced as required or permitted by [this act] or by the law that otherwise would apply if [this act] did not take effect.

30-9A-703. Security interest perfected before July 1, 2001.

Official Comments

Source. Section 9-703 [Security Interest Perfected Before Effective Date — 30-9A-703].

1. Perfected Security Interests Under Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] and this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. This section deals with security interests that are perfected (i.e., that are enforceable and have priority over the rights of a lien creditor) under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] or other applicable law immediately before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect. Subsection (a) [subsection 1] provides, not surprisingly, that if the security interest would be a perfected security interest under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] (i.e., if the transaction satisfies this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] requirements for enforceability (attachment) and perfection), no further action need be taken for the security interest to be a perfected security interest.

2. Security Interests Enforceable and Perfected Under Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] but Unenforceable or Unperfected Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] deals with security interests that are enforceable and perfected under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] or other applicable law immediately before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect but do not satisfy the requirements for enforceability (attachment) or perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Except as otherwise provided in Section 9-705 [30-9A-705], these security interests are perfected security interests for one year after the effective date. If the security interest satisfies the requirements for attachment and perfection within that period, the security interest remains perfected thereafter. If the security interest satisfies only the requirements for attachment within that period, the security interest becomes unperfected at the end of the one-year period.

Example 1: A pre-effective-date security agreement in a consumer transaction covers "all securities accounts." The security interest is properly perfected. The collateral description was adequate under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] (see former Section 9-115(3) [30-9-115(3), now repealed, see 30-9A-108]) but is insufficient under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] (see Section 9-108(e)(2) [30-9A-108(5)(b)]). Unless the debtor authenticates a new security agreement describing the collateral other than by "type" (or Section 9-203(b)(3) [30-9A-203(2)(c)] otherwise is satisfied) within the one-year period following the effective date, the security interest becomes unenforceable at the end of that period.

Other examples under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] or other applicable law that may be effective as attachment or enforceability steps but may be ineffective under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] include an oral agreement to sell a payment intangible or possession by virtue of a notification to a bailee under former Section 9-305 [30-9-305, now repealed, see 30-9A-313]. Neither the oral agreement nor the notification would satisfy the revised Section 9-203 [30-9A-203] requirements for attachment.

Example 2: A pre-effective-date possessory security interest in instruments is perfected by a bailee's receipt of notification under former 9-305 [30-9-305, now repealed, see 30-9A-313]. The bailee has not, however, acknowledged that it holds for the secured party's benefit under revised Section 9-313 [30-9A-313]. Unless the bailee authenticates a record acknowledging that it holds for the secured party (or another appropriate perfection step is taken) within the one-year period following the effective date, the security interest becomes unperfected at the end of that period.

3. Interpretation of Pre-Effective-Date Security Agreements. Section 9-102 [30-9A-102] defines "security agreement" as "an agreement that creates or provides for a security interest." Under Section 1-201(3) [30-1-201(3)], an "agreement" is a "bargain of the parties in fact." If parties to a pre-effective-date security agreement describe the collateral by using a term defined in former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] in one way and defined in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] in another way, in most cases it should be presumed that the bargain of the parties contemplated the meaning of the term under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed].

Example 3: A pre-effective-date security agreement covers "all accounts" of a debtor. As defined under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], an "account" did not include a right to payment for lottery winnings. These rights to payment are "accounts" under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], however. The agreement of the parties presumptively created a security interest in "accounts" as defined in former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. A different result might be appropriate, for example, if the security agreement explicitly contemplated future changes in the Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] definitions of types of collateral-e.g., "'Accounts' means 'accounts' as defined in the UCC Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9A] of [State X], as that definition may be amended from time to time." Whether a different approach is appropriate in any given case depends on the bargain of the parties, as determined by applying ordinary principles of contract construction.

30-9A-704. Security interest unperfected before July 1, 2001.

Official Comments

Source. Section 9-704 [Security Interest Unperfected Before Effective Date — 30-9A-704].

This section deals with security interests that are enforceable but unperfected (i.e., subordinate to the rights of a person who becomes a lien creditor) under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] or other applicable law immediately before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect. These security interests remain enforceable for one year after the effective date, and thereafter if the appropriate steps for attachment under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] are taken before the one-year period expires. (This section's treatment of enforceability is the same as that of Section 9-703 [30-9A-703].) The security interest becomes a perfected security interest on the effective date if, at that time, the security interest satisfies the requirements for perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. If the security interest does not satisfy the requirements for perfection until sometime thereafter, it becomes a perfected security interest at that later time.

Example: A security interest has attached under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] but is unperfected because the filed financing statement covers "all of debtor's personal property" and controlling case law in the applicable jurisdiction has determined that this identification of collateral in a financing statement is insufficient. Upon the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], the financing statement becomes sufficient under Section 9-504(2) [30-9A-504(2)]. On that date the security interest becomes perfected. (This assumes, of course, that the financing statement is filed in the proper filing office under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A].)

30-9A-705. Effectiveness of action taken before effective date of act.

Official Comments

Source. Section 9-705 [Effectiveness of Action Taken Before Effective Date of Act — 30-9A-705].

1. General. This section addresses primarily the situation in which the perfection step is taken under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] or other applicable law before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], but the security interest does not attach until after that date.

2. Perfection Other Than by Filing. Subsection (a) [subsection 1] applies when the perfection step is a step other than the filing of a financing statement. If the step that would be a valid perfection step under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] or other law is taken before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect, and if a security interest attaches within one year after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect, then the security interest becomes a perfected security interest upon attachment. However, the security interest becomes unperfected one year after the effective date unless the requirements for attachment and perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] are satisfied within that period.

3. Perfection by Filing: Ineffective Filings Made Effective. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] deals with financing statements that were filed under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] and which would not have perfected a security interest under the former Article [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] (because, e.g., they did not accurately describe the collateral or were filed in the wrong place), but which would perfect a security interest under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Under subsection (b) [subsection (2)], such a financing statement is effective to perfect a security interest to the extent it complies with this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] applies regardless of the reason for the filing. For example, a secured party need not wait until the effective date to respond to the change this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] makes with respect to the jurisdiction whose law governs perfection of certain security interests. Rather, a secured party may wish to prepare for this change by filing a financing statement before the effective date in the jurisdiction whose law governs perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. When this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect, the filing becomes effective to perfect a security interest (assuming the filing satisfies the perfection requirements of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]). Note, however, that Section 9-706 [30-9A-706] determines whether a financing statement filed before the effective date operates to continue the effectiveness of a financing statement filed in another office before the effective date.

4. Perfection by Filing: Change in Applicable Law. Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that a financing statement filed in the proper jurisdiction under former Section 9-103 [30-9-103, now repealed, see 30-9A-301 and 30-9A-316] remains effective for all purposes, despite the fact that Part 3 of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 3] would require filing of a financing statement in a different jurisdiction. This means that, during the early years of this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] effectiveness, it may be necessary to search the files not only in the jurisdiction whose law governs perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] but also (if different) in the jurisdiction(s) whose law governed perfection under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. To limit this burden, subsection (c) [subsection (3)] provides that a financing statement filed in the jurisdiction determined by former Section 9-103 [30-9-103, now repealed, see 30-9A-301 and 30-9A-316] becomes ineffective at the earlier of the time it would become ineffective under the law of that jurisdiction or June 30, 2006. The June 30, 2006, limitation addresses some nonuniform versions of former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] that extended the effectiveness of a financing statement beyond five years. Note that a financing statement filed before the effective date may remain effective beyond June 30, 2006, if subsection (d) [subsections (3) and (4)] (concerning continuation statements) or (e) [not adopted in Montana] (concerning transmitting utilities) or Section 9-706 [30-9A-706] (concerning initial financing statements that operate to continue pre-effective-date financing statements) so provides.

Subsection (c) [subsection (3)] is an exception to Section 9-703(b) [30-9A-703(2)]. Under the general rule in Section 9-703(b) [30-9A-703(2)], a security interest that is enforceable and perfected on the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] is a perfected security interest for one year after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect, even if the security interest is not enforceable under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] and the applicable requirements for perfection under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] have not been met. However, in some cases subsection (c) [subsection (3)] may shorten the one-year period of perfection; in others, if the security interest is enforceable under Section 9-203 [30-9A-203], it may extend the period of perfection. A financing statement that remains effective under subsection (c) [subsection (3)] may be amended (but generally may not be continued) after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect by filing an amendment in the office where the financing statement was filed.

Example 1: On July 3, 1996, D, a State X corporation, creates a security interest in certain manufacturing equipment located in State Y. On July 6, 1996, SP perfects a security interest in the equipment under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] by filing in the office of the State Y Secretary of State. See former Section 9-103(1)(b) [30-9-103(1)(b), now repealed, see 30-9A-301]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect in States X and Y on July 1, 2001.

Under Section 9-705(c) [subsection (3)], the financing statement remains effective for the first five days of July, 2001, after which it lapses. See former Section 9-403 [30-9-403, now repealed, see 30-9A-515 and 30-9A-516]. Had SP continued the effectiveness of the financing statement by filing a continuation statement in State Y under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] before July 1, 2001, the financing statement would have remained effective to perfect the security interest through June 30, 2006. See subsection (c)(2) [subsection (3)(a)(ii)]. Alternatively, SP could have filed an initial financing statement in State X under subsection (b) [subsection (2)] or Section 9-706 [30-9A-706] before the State Y financing statement lapsed. Had SP done so, the security interest would have remained perfected without interruption until the State X financing statement lapsed.

5. Continuing Effectiveness of Filed Financing Statement. A financing statement filed before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] may be continued only by filing in the State and office designated by this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. This result is accomplished in the following manner: Subsection (d) [subsection (5)(b)] indicates that, as a general matter, a continuation statement filed after the effective date of this Article [July 1, 2001] does not continue the effectiveness of a financing statement filed under the law designated by former Section 9-103 [30-9-103, now repealed, see 30-9A-301 and 30-9A-316]. Instead, an initial financing statement must be filed under Section 9-706 [30-9A-706]. The second sentence of subsection (d) [subsection (5)] contains an exception to the general rule. It provides that a continuation statement is effective to continue the effectiveness of a financing statement filed before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect if this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] prescribes not only the same jurisdiction but also the same filing office.

Example 2: On November 8, 2000, D, a State X corporation, creates a security interest in certain manufacturing equipment located in State Y. On November 15, 2000, SP perfects a security interest in the equipment under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] by filing in office of the State Y Secretary of State. See former Section 9-103(1)(b) [30-9-103(1)(b), now repealed, see 30-9A-301]. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect in States X and Y on July 1, 2001. Under Section 9-705(c) [subsection (3)(a)(ii)], the financing statement ceases to be effective in November, 2005, when it lapses. See Section 9-515 [30-9A-515]. Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], the law of D's location (State X, see Section 9-307 [30-9A-307]) governs perfection. See Section 9-301 [30-9A-301]. Thus, the filing of a continuation statement in State Y after the effective date would not continue the effectiveness of the financing statement. See subsection (d) [subsection (4)]. However, the effectiveness of the financing statement could be continued under Section 9-706 [30-9A-706].

Example 3: The facts are as in Example 2, except that D is a State Y corporation. Assume State Y adopted former Section 9-401(1) [30-9-401(1), now repealed, see 30-9A-501] (second alternative). State Y law governs perfection under Part 3 of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A, part 3]. (See Sections 9-301, 9-307 [30-9A-301 and 30-9A-307].) Under the second sentence of subsection (d) [subsection (4) (no second sentence)], the timely filing of a continuation statement in accordance with the law of State Y continues the effectiveness of the financing statement.

Example 4: The facts are as in Example 3, except that the collateral is equipment used in farming operations and, in accordance with former Section 9-401(1) [30-9-401(1), now repealed, see 30-9A-501] (second alternative) as enacted in State Y, the financing statement was filed in State Y, in the office of the Shelby County Recorder of Deeds. Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], a continuation statement must be filed in the office of the State Y Secretary of State. See Section 9-501(a)(2) [30-9A-501(1)(b)]. Under the second sentence of subsection (d) [first sentence of subsection (5)], the timely filing of a continuation statement in accordance with the law of State Y operates to continue a pre-effective-date financing statement only if the continuation statement is filed in the same office as the financing statement. Accordingly, the continuation statement is not effective in this case, but the financing statement may be continued under Section 9-706 [30-9A-706].

Example 5: The facts are as in Example 3, except that State Y enacted former Section 9-401(1) [30-9-401(1), now repealed, see 30-9A-501] (third alternative). As required by former Section 9-401(1) [30-9-401(1), now repealed, see 30-9A-501], SP filed financing statements in both the office of the State Y Secretary of State and the office of the Shelby County Recorder of Deeds. Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], a continuation statement must be filed in the office of the State Y Secretary of State. See Section 9-501(a)(2) [30-9A-501(1)(b)]. The timely filing of a continuation statement in that office after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect would be effective to continue the effectiveness of the financing statement (and thus continue the perfection of the security interest), even if the financing statement filed with the County Recorder lapses.

6. Continuation Statements. In some cases, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] reclassifies collateral covered by a financing statement filed under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]. For example, collateral consisting of the right to payment for real property sold would be a "general intangible" under the former Article [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] but an "account" under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. To continue perfection under those circumstances, a continuation statement must comply with the normal requirements for a continuation statement. See Section 9-515 [30-9A-515]. In addition, the pre-effective-date financing statement and continuation statement, taken together, must satisfy the requirements of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] concerning the sufficiency of the debtor's name, secured party's name, and indication of collateral. See subsection (f) [subsection (7)].

Example 6: A pre-effective-date financing statement covers "all general intangibles" of a debtor. As defined under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], a "general intangible," would include rights to payment for lottery winnings. These rights to payment are "accounts" under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], however. A post-effective-date continuation statement will not continue the effectiveness of the pre-effective-date financing statement with respect to lottery winnings unless it amends the indication of collateral covered to include lottery winnings (e.g., by adding "accounts," "rights to payment for lottery winnings," or the like). If the continuation statement does not amend the indication of collateral, the continuation statement will be effective to continue the effectiveness of the financing statement only with respect to "general intangibles" as defined in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A].

Example 7: The facts are as in Example 6, except that the pre-effective-date financing statement covers "all accounts and general intangibles." Even though rights to payment for lottery winnings are "general intangibles" under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] and "accounts" under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], a post-effective-date continuation statement would continue the effectiveness of the pre-effective-date financing statement with respect to lottery winnings. There would be no need to amend the indication of collateral covered, inasmuch as the indication ("accounts") satisfies the requirements of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A].

30-9A-706. When initial financing statement suffices as continuation statement.

Official Comments

Source. Section 9-706 [When Initial Financing Statement Suffices as Continuation Statement — 30-9A-706].

1. Continuation of Financing Statements Not Filed in Proper Filing Office Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. This section deals with continuing the effectiveness of financing statements that are filed in the proper State and office under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], but which would be filed in the wrong State or in the wrong office of the proper State under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Section 9-705(d) [30-9A-705(5)(b)] provides that, under these circumstances, filing a continuation statement after the effective date of this Article [July 1, 2001] in the office designated by former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] would not be effective. This section provides the means by which the effectiveness of such a financing statement can be continued if this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] governs perfection under the applicable choice-of-law rule: filing an initial financing statement in the office specified by Section 9-501 [30-9A-501].

Although it has the effect of continuing the effectiveness of a pre-effective-date financing statement, an initial financing statement described in this section is not a continuation statement. Rather, it is governed by the rules applicable to initial financing statements. (However, the debtor need not authorize the filing. See Section 9-707 [30-9A-708].) Unlike a continuation statement, the initial financing statement described in this section may be filed any time during the effectiveness of the pre-effective-date financing statement—even before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] is enacted—and not only within the six months immediately prior to lapse. In contrast to a continuation statement, which extends the lapse date of a filed financing statement for five years, the initial financing statement has its own lapse date, which bears no relation to the lapse date of the pre-effective-date financing statement whose effectiveness the initial financing statement continues. See subsection (b) [subsection (2)].

As subsection (a) [subsection (1)] makes clear, the filing of an initial financing statement under this section continues the effectiveness of a pre-effective-date financing statement. If the effectiveness of a pre-effective-date financing statement lapses before the initial financing statement is filed, the effectiveness of the pre-effective-date financing statement cannot be continued. Rather, unless the security interest is perfected otherwise, there will be a period during which the security interest is unperfected before becoming perfected again by the filing of the initial financing statement under this section.

If an initial financing statement is filed under this section before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], it takes effect when this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect (assuming that it is ineffective under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]). Note, however, that former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] determines whether the filing office is obligated to accept such an initial financing statement. For the reason given in the preceding paragraph, an initial financing statement filed before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not continue the effectiveness of a pre-effective-date financing statement unless the latter remains effective on the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Thus, for example, if the effectiveness of the pre-effective-date financing statement lapses before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect, the initial financing statement would not continue its effectiveness.

2. Requirements of Initial Financing Statement Filed in Lieu of Continuation Statement. Subsection (c) [subsection (2)] sets forth the requirements for the initial financing statement under subsection (a) [subsection (1)]. These requirements are needed to inform searchers that the initial financing statement operates to continue a financing statement filed elsewhere and to enable searchers to locate and discover the attributes of the other financing statement. A single initial financing statement may continue the effectiveness of more than one financing statement filed before this Article's effective date [July 1, 2001]. See Section 1-102(5)(a) [30-1-102(5)(a)] (words in the singular include the plural). If under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] the collateral is of a type different from its type under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]—as would be the case, e.g., with a right to payment of lottery winnings (a "general intangible" under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] and an "account" under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]), then subsection (c) [subsection (2)(a)] requires that the initial financing statement indicate the type under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A].

This section permits a secured party to file an initial financing statement or continuation statement necessary under this Part [30-9A-703 through 30-9A-706, 30-9A-708, and 30-9A-709] to continue the effectiveness of a financing statement filed before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect or to perfect or otherwise continue the perfection of a security interest. Because a filing described in this section typically operates to continue the effectiveness of a financing statement whose filing the debtor already has authorized, this section does not require authorization from the debtor.

30-9A-709. Priority.

Official Comments

Source. Section 9-708 [Priority — 30-9A-709].

1. Law Governing Priority. Ordinarily, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] determines the priority of conflicting claims to collateral. However, when the relative priorities of the claims were established before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect, former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] governs.

Example 1: In 1999, SP-1 obtains a security interest in a right to payment for goods sold ("account"). SP-1 fails to file a financing statement. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect on July 1, 2001. Thereafter, on August 1, 2001, D creates a security interest in the same account in favor of SP-2, who files a financing statement. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] determines the relative priorities of the claims. SP-2's security interest has priority under Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)].

Example 2: In 1999, SP-1 obtains a security interest in a right to payment for goods sold ("account"). SP-1 fails to file a financing statement. In 2000, D creates a security interest in the same account in favor of SP-2, who likewise fails to file a financing statement. This Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect on July 1, 2001. Because the relative priorities of the security interests were established before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] governs priority, and SP-1's security interest has priority under former Section 9-312(5)(b) [30-9-312(5)(b), now repealed, see 30-9A-322(1)(a)].

Example 3: The facts are as in Example 2, except that, on August 1, 2001, SP-2 files a proper financing statement under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. Until August 1, 2001, the relative priorities of the security interests were established before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], as in Example 2. However, by taking the affirmative step of filing a financing statement, SP-2 established anew the relative priority of the conflicting claims after the effective date. Thus, this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] determines priority. SP-2's security interest has priority under Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)].

As Example 3 illustrates, relative priorities that are "established" before the effective date do not necessarily remain unchanged following the effective date. Of course, unlike priority contests among unperfected security interests, some priorities are established permanently, e.g., the rights of a buyer of property who took free of a security interest under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed].

One consequence of the rule in subsection (a) [subsection (1)] is that the mere taking effect of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] does not of itself adversely affect the priority of conflicting claims to collateral.

Example 4: In 1999, SP-1 obtains a security interest in a right to payment for lottery winnings (a "general intangible" as defined in former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] but an "account" as defined in this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]). SP-1's security interest is unperfected because its filed financing statement covers only "accounts." In 2000, D creates a security interest in the same right to payment in favor of SP-2, who files a financing statement covering "accounts and general intangibles." Before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect on July 1, 2001, SP-2's perfected security interest has priority over SP-1's unperfected security interest under former 9-312(5) [30-9-312(5), now repealed, see 30-9A-322]. Because the relative priorities of the security interests were established before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] continues to govern priority after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect. Thus, SP-2's priority is not adversely affected by this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] having taken effect.

Note that were this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] to govern priority, SP-2 would become subordinated to SP-1 under Section 9-322(a)(1) [30-9A-322(1)(a)], even though nothing changes other than this Article's [Title 30, chapter 9A] having taken effect. Under Section 9-704 [30-9A-704], SP-1's security interest would become perfected; the financing statement covering "accounts" adequately covers the lottery winnings and complies with the other perfection requirements of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], e.g., it is filed in the proper office.

Example 5: In 1999, SP-1 obtains a security interest in a right to payment for lottery winnings-a "general intangible" (as defined under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed]). SP-1's security interest is unperfected because its filed financing statement covers only "accounts." In 2000, D creates a security interest in the same right to payment in favor of SP-2, who makes the same mistake and also files a financing statement covering only "accounts." Before this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect on July 1, 2001, SP-1's unperfected security interest has priority over SP-2's unperfected security interest, because SP-1's security interest was the first to attach. See former Section 9-312(5)(b) [30-9-312(5)(b), now repealed, see 30-9A-322]. Because the relative priorities of the security interests were established before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] continues to govern priority after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect. Although Section 9-704 [30-9A-704] makes both security interests perfected for purposes of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], both are unperfected under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed], which determines their relative priorities.

2. Financing Statements Ineffective Under Former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] but Effective Under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. If this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] determines priority, subsection (b) [subsection (2)] may apply. It deals with the case in which a filing that occurs before the effective date of this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] would be ineffective to perfect a security interest under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] but effective under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A]. For purposes of Section 9-322(a) [30-9A-322(1)], the priority of a security interest that attaches after this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect and is perfected in this manner dates from the time this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect.

Example 6: In 1999, SP-1 obtains a security interest in D's existing and after-acquired instruments and files a financing statement covering "instruments." In 2000, D grants a security interest in its existing and after-acquired accounts in favor of SP-2, who files a financing statement covering "accounts." After this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect on July 1, 2001, one of D's account debtors gives D a negotiable note to evidence its obligation to pay an overdue account. Under the first-to-file-or-perfect rule in Section 9-322(a) [30-9A-322(1)], SP-1 would have priority in the instrument, which constitutes SP-2's proceeds. SP-1's filing in 1999 was earlier than SP-2's in 2000. However, subsection (b) [subsection (2)] provides that, for purposes of Section 9-322(a) [30-9A-322(1)], SP-1's priority dates from the time this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect (July 1, 2001). Under Section 9-322(b) [30-9A-322(2)], SP-2's priority with respect to the proceeds (instrument) dates from its filing as to the original collateral (accounts). Accordingly, SP-2's security interest would be senior.

Subsection (b) [subsection 2] does not apply to conflicting security interests each of which is perfected by a pre-effective-date filing that was not effective under former Article 9 [Title 30, chapter 9, now repealed] but is effective under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A].

Example 7: In 1999, SP-1 obtains a security interest in D's existing and after-acquired instruments and files a financing statement covering "instruments." In 2000, D grants a security interest in its existing and after-acquired instruments in favor of SP-2, who files a financing statement covering "instruments." After this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A] takes effect on July 1, 2001, one of D's account debtors gives D a negotiable note to evidence its obligation to pay an overdue account. Under the first-to-file-or-perfect rule in Section 9-322(a) [30-9A-322(1)], SP-1 would have priority in the instrument. Both filings are effective under this Article [Title 30, chapter 9A], see Section 9-705(b) [30-9A-705(2)], and SP-1's filing in 1999 was earlier than SP-2's in 2000. Subsection (b) [subsection 2] does not change this result.

Case Notes

Security Brokerage Contracts — Contract of Adhesion Rendering Arbitration Clause Unenforceable: Kloss opened a full-service brokerage account with defendant, which permitted Kloss to purchase securities and maintain a money market account and which included a living trust account. The account did well, and Kloss decided to set up a charitable trust with the bond proceeds. The initial account and the living trust agreement contained a mandatory arbitration clause, and the charitable trust incorporated the arbitration clause by reference. Kloss then had second thoughts about the charitable trust and petitioned to revoke it. Defendant moved to compel arbitration, and the District Court granted the motion, citing Chor v. Piper, Jaffray & Hopwood, 261 M 143, 862 P2d 26 (1993), and Iwen v. U.S. W. Direct, 1999 MT 63, 293 M 512, 977 P2d 989 (1999), for the holding that defendant had no obligation to explain the terms of the contract because it was within Kloss's reasonable expectations and that even if the contract was considered a contract of adhesion, it was not unenforceable because it was not unconscionable. Kloss appealed, arguing that the arbitration clause was part of a contract of adhesion and that waiver of the constitutional right to jury trial should not be presumed from the signing of a contract of adhesion. Defendant maintained that form contracts prepared by securities brokers are not contracts of adhesion dictated by one party to another who has no voice in its formulation, and that arbitration clauses contained in the contracts are not unconscionable. The Supreme Court examined Passage v. Prudential-Bache Sec., Inc., 223 M 60, 727 P2d 1298 (1986), for an explanation of contracts of adhesion in the securities context and the circumstances under which they are unenforceable. The court distinguished both Chor and Passage, finding that the contracts in this case were clearly contracts of adhesion because they were standardized forms containing terms that Kloss had no opportunity to negotiate if wishing to invest with defendant. Further, the arbitration clause by which Kloss waived the right to access to state courts, the right to jury trial, the right to reasonable discovery, the right to findings of fact based on the evidence, and the right to enforce the law by way of appeal was clearly not within Kloss's reasonable expectations. The arbitration clause was never explained by defendant, and Kloss was not aware of the arbitration provision in the contract. Thus, the District Court committed reversible error when it concluded that the arbitration clause was enforceable. Kloss v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 2002 MT 129, 310 M 123, 54 P3d 1 (2002).

Implied Code of Stockbroker Conduct — When Fiduciary Relationship Created: This section creates an implied code of conduct for stockbrokers, violation of which may constitute a breach of the duty that a stockbroker owes to a customer. However, in the absence of discretionary authority by a stockbroker to buy and sell in a customer's account, a fiduciary relationship is not created in a stockbroker-customer relationship. Chor v. Piper, Jaffray & Hopwood, 261 M 143, 862 P2d 26, 50 St. Rep. 1234 (1993), citing Caravan Mobile Home Sales v. Lehman Bros. Kuhn Loeb, 769 F2d 561 (9th Cir. 1985), and Cohen v. Wedbush, Noble, Cooke, Inc., 841 F2d 282 (9th Cir. 1988), and followed in Kloss v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 2002 MT 129, 310 M 123, 54 P3d 1 (2002).

Breach of Duty: This section implicitly establishes a code of conduct to be followed by a broker. A violation of this code of conduct may constitute a breach of the duty owed by the broker to his customer and presents a genuine issue of material fact. Brown v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 197 M 1, 640 P2d 453, 39 St. Rep. 305 (1982), distinguished in Chor v. Piper, Jaffray & Hopwood, 261 M 143, 862 P2d 26, 50 St. Rep. 1234 (1993). See also Cohen v. Wedbush, Noble, Cooke, Inc., 841 F2d 282 (9th Cir. 1988).

Prosecution When Conduct Violates Two Statutes: When defendant argues that he should have been charged under 30-10-301, the specific fraudulent securities practice statute, rather than 45-6-317, the general deceptive practices statute, the Supreme Court said that in the rule of statutory construction a more specific statute controls over an inconsistent general statute and does not apply to criminal prosecutions where defendant's conduct violated two or more criminal statutes. The fact that two statutes overlap does not mean that the defendant can only be prosecuted under the statute providing the lesser penalty. St. v. Duncan, 181 M 382, 593 P2d 1026 (1979).

Recovery Limited in Fraudulent Sale of Securities — Punitive Damages Claim Dismissed: In a case alleging breach of contract for sale of a security by means of fraud, recovery was limited under this section to consideration paid for the security plus interest, costs, and attorney fees. A claim for punitive damages was properly dismissed. State ex rel. Vranish v. District Court, 228 M 59, 741 P2d 412, 44 St. Rep. 1341 (1987).

Eight-Year Statute of Limitations for Civil Action Under Securities Act of Montana: The U.S. District Court for the District of Montana certified a question to the Supreme Court on the applicable Statute of Limitations for a civil action brought pursuant to 30-10-307. In deciding that the 8-year limitation period rather than the 2-year period applied, the court traced the legislative history of the civil enforcement limitation period under the Securities Act of Montana. In 1967, the Legislature eliminated the relevant 2-year limitation and left a void. The court reviewed the legislative intent, underlying purposes of the Act, and characterization of the essence of the claim. Finding that each count of plaintiff's complaint could be interpreted as sounding in tort, contract, or statutory violation, the court resolved the case in favor of the longest limitation period. CHAPTER 11
SALES

Chapter Case Notes

Sale With Option to Repurchase Not Considered Loan — Factors Not Met: Dillree initially requested a loan from Devoe, but Devoe stated he did not make loans and the request was denied. Dillree then suggested he could sell Devoe certain property with an option to repurchase within 6 months. Two such transactions occurred, but the obligations were not timely repaid and Devoe demanded surrender of the property. District Court awarded the property to Devoe, but on appeal Dillree contended the transactions were not sales, pointing out the four factors listed in Murray v. Butte-Monitor Tunnel Mining Co., 41 M 449, 110 P 497 (1910), which tend to confirm that a transaction is a security arrangement or mortgage and not a sale. The factors are: (1) the transaction in its inception had for its purpose a loan, not a sale; (2) the grantor was in financial distress at the time of the transaction; (3) the price appears to have been grossly inadequate; and (4) according to the grantee's own theory, the transaction did not amount to an absolute sale but to a conditional sale. The Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's findings that factors (1) and (3) were not present and that therefore the transactions could not be considered loans but were contracts for sale of property with the opportunity for repurchase. Dillree v. Devoe, 223 M 47, 724 P2d 171, 43 St. Rep. 1521 (1986). See also Campbell v. Campbell, 223 M 124, 725 P2d 207, 43 St. Rep. 1584 (1986).

Bank's Fiduciary Duty to Customers It Gives Financial Advice — Real Estate Sales: Wife, whose husband had recently died, signed a contract for a deed to her ranch with Dittman, who signed as "trustee". There were two other purchasers, who did not sign: a person to whom, according to the evidence, wife would not have knowingly sold and the marketing officer of the bank used by the wife and husband for some 24 years. Wife was unfamiliar with real estate and financial affairs and relied upon the advice of various bank officers with regard to the sale of the ranch. This put the bank in a prima facie fiduciary relationship as to the wife. The relationship and its attendant duties extended to the advising officers in their dealings with the wife in regard to sale of the ranch. The marketing officer thus had a duty to fully inform the wife and protect her interests. This duty he breached, and the breach amounted to constructive fraud, where evidence showed that: (1) the contract price and terms were disadvantageous to the wife; (2) the true purchasers were not disclosed to her either by the contract or the marketing officer; (3) the purchasers intended to and began to subdivide and sell the ranch, though the marketing officer knew wife apparently did not wish this, having refused an earlier offer to purchase with right to subdivide; (4) the marketing officer had extensive financial interests involving loans to him from his bank, and an audit of the bank recommended that in view of this his lending authority should be eliminated or curtailed; and (5) the lower court was unimpressed with the way in which wife's attorney in the negotiations represented her interests. The lower court properly ordered the contract for deed rescinded. Deist v. Wachholz, 208 M 207, 678 P2d 188, 41 St. Rep. 286 (1984).

Part 1
Sales and Exchanges

30-11-101. Sale defined.

Case Notes

Transfer of Title in Lieu of Foreclosure Not Sale: Where a party to an exclusive realtor's listing contract transferred title back to sellers in lieu of foreclosure, giving up the entire interest in the property and forfeiting all payments made to sellers, such transfer of title did not constitute a sale pursuant to this section. Ellingson Agency, Inc. v. Baltrusch, 228 M 360, 742 P2d 1009, 44 St. Rep. 1598 (1987).

Date Contract Enforceable — Effect of Absence of Collateral Terms to Be Added: In an action by a real estate broker against a seller for a brokerage commission, it was argued that if the sale of the property was enforceable on January 31, 1978, the broker would be entitled to his commission. If the sale was not enforceable until August 18, 1978 (90 days after expiration of broker's contract), he would not be entitled to his commission. The buy-sell was executed on January 31, 1978, but two financial terms within the contract were left out. The terms left out involve the method of payment, a collateral issue to the contract. The contract for deed was valid and enforceable on January 31, 1978, and the broker is entitled to his commission. Nardi v. Smalley, 197 M 321, 643 P2d 228, 39 St. Rep. 606 (1982).

Agreement to Sell Distinguished:

A sale, as distinguished from an agreement to sell, is the actual transfer of title from the grantor to the grantee, an agreement to sell being a contract to be performed in the future which, if fulfilled, results in a sale. Franzke v. Fergus County, 76 M 150, 245 P 962 (1926).

Where property is sold under a contract providing that title shall remain in the seller until the purchase price is paid, the transaction is not a sale within this section. State ex rel. Malin-Yates Co. v. Justice of Peace Court, 51 M 133, 149 P 709 (1915).

Case Notes

Passage of Title: A seller ordinarily may not sue for the purchase price of the property until title has passed to the buyer. The actual passing of a title, as between the parties to a contract of sale of personal property, depends upon the intention of the parties. DeMers v. O'Leary, 126 M 528, 254 P2d 1080 (1953).

Sale Distinguished:

A sale, as distinguished from an agreement to sell, is the actual transfer of title from the grantor to the grantee, an agreement to sell being a contract to be performed in the future which, if fulfilled, results in a sale. Franzke v. Fergus County, 76 M 150, 245 P 962 (1926).

Where personalty is sold under a contract providing that title remain in the seller until the purchase price is paid, the transaction is a mere executory agreement of sale, accompanied by the delivery of possession to the intending purchaser to be held by him pending payment of the purchase price, and title remains in the vendor until payment has been made. State ex rel. Malin-Yates Co. v. Justice of Peace Court, 51 M 133, 149 P 709 (1915).

30-11-105. Agreement to buy.

Case Notes

When Contract of Sale Not Mere Option: The vendee, in an action to recover the balance due on the purchase price, may not contend that the contract of purchase and sale was merely an option in the face of a provision that the vendor has agreed "and does hereby agree" to sell, and the vendee "agrees to purchase from the vendor" the property described, and that the consideration, naming it, shall be paid to the vendor "at the times and in the manner following". Petitt v. F. V. H. Collins Co., 112 M 12, 113 P2d 340 (1941).

30-11-106. Agreement to sell and buy.

Case Notes

Sale Distinguished:

An agreement to sell is a contract to be performed in the future; it is preliminary to a sale and not a sale. Hence, where the owner of an oil and gas lease agreed to sell it on condition that upon default in making deferred payments the owner should have the right to take possession of the premises and default was made and the agreement canceled, a finding of the court in a mechanics' foreclosure suit that the defaulting purchaser was the owner of the leasehold was error. Callender v. Crossfield Oil Syndicate, 84 M 263, 275 P 273 (1929), overruled on other grounds in Pioneer Eng'r Works, Inc. v. McConnell, 113 M 392, 132 P2d 160 (1942).

A sale, as distinguished from an agreement to sell, is the actual transfer of title from the grantor to the grantee, an agreement to sell being a contract to be performed in the future which, if fulfilled, results in a sale. Franzke v. Fergus County, 76 M 150, 245 P 962 (1926).

An agreement to sell and buy is preliminary to a sale, resulting in a sale only if the terms thereof are fulfilled. Wright Land & Inv. Co. v. Even, 57 M 1, 186 P 681 (1919).

Option to Purchase: This section was not applicable to transaction based on instrument clearly granting to purchaser an option only, where purchaser did not obligate himself to accept title to property or to pay a price therefor. N. Min. Corp. v. Cooke Min. Co., 123 F2d 9 (1941).

Covenant of Warranty: Where a deed to real property purports to convey the realty itself and not merely the grantor's right, title, and interest in it, the covenant of warranty that "the grantor hereby covenants that he will forever warrant and defend" the grantee's "right, title and interest in and to the said premises . . . against all and every person", etc., is one of general warranty and quiet enjoyment. No Award of Damages and Attorney Fees Unless Covenant of Warranty Breached: The Ecklunds sued the Stevensons, claiming that they owned part of the Stevensons' property. In defending the claim, the Stevensons also sued the Woods on the basis of a breach of the covenant of warranty in transferring the property to them. The lower court found that the Ecklunds had no claim to the property because the doctrine of apportionment had been properly applied to correct the 1910 plat. The Stevensons asserted that they were entitled to damages and attorney fees from the Woods because of having to defend against the Ecklunds' suit. The Supreme Court held that the Woods were not liable because the application of the doctrine of apportionment meant that the Ecklunds had no basis for a lawful claim to the property and that therefore no breach of the covenant of warranty had occurred. Stevenson v. Ecklund, 263 M 61, 865 P2d 296, 50 St. Rep. 1706 (1993).

Potential Access Rights Merged With Deeds and Extinguished — Applicability of Contract Law Doctrine of Merger: Prior to Gehring's consent to sell 360 acres to APS Corporation (APS) in 1970, they entered an agreement that included a provision on access rights, whereby Gehring purported to grant future purchasers access to other land owned by Gehring for certain recreational purposes. After being told by the Gehring Ranch Corporation that they would not be allowed access to Gehring's land for recreation, the successors in interest to APS sought to enforce the agreement, alleging that they had been improperly excluded from the land and that the agreement created an easement over Gehring's land. The District Court granted summary judgment for the Gehring Ranch Corporation, noting that the agreement did not identify Gehring's other lands upon which an easement was purportedly created. The court also held that any agreement prior to execution of the deeds was merged with the deeds and that because the deeds transferring title did not provide for access, any access rights promised in the agreement were lost. The decision was appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The clause in the agreement was part of a larger agreement to transfer property in the future, and Gehring did not intend to create an easement, but at most intended to provide for potential access privileges if certain conditions, such as creation of a property owners' association and adoption of rules governing the use of the recreational privileges, were met. The Supreme Court cited Urquhart v. Teller, 1998 MT 119, 288 M 497, 958 P2d 714 (1998), in applying the contract law doctrine of merger, holding that the deeds contained all the rights of the parties and that because no access privileges were mentioned in the deeds, any potential access rights referred to in the agreement merged with the deeds and were lost. Richman v. Gehring Ranch Corp., 2001 MT 293, 307 M 443, 37 P3d 732 (2001).

Contract Provisions Merged Into Deed — Covenants Not Intended to Be Collateral Extinguished by Unrestricted Deed: A contract for the sale of property can contain a valid covenant running with the land, but generally, all provisions in a sale contract are merged into the warranty deed, founding the purchaser's rights in the deed covenants rather than in the executed contract, unless the parties intend for an agreement in a contract for sale to be collateral. Covenants relating to title, quantity, and possession of land are generally not collateral and thus merge into the deed. In the present case, the parties intended for the contract for deed and attendant restrictions to merge into the warranty deed, so the general rule of merger applied. The District Court did not err in refusing to enforce the covenants contained in the contract for deed. Urquhart v. Teller, 1998 MT 119, 288 M 497, 958 P2d 714, 55 St. Rep. 461 (1998), followed in Richman v. Gehring Ranch Corp., 2001 MT 293, 307 M 443, 37 P3d 732 (2001), and Tungsten Holdings, Inc. v. Olson, 2002 MT 158, 310 M 374, 50 P3d 1086 (2002).

Possession of Real Property Insufficient to Grant Title Against Good Faith Purchasers — No Adverse Possession Shown: In 1989, the Luloffs bought part of a ranch from the Manweilers by a deed that excluded "Tract B". The Luloffs mistakenly assumed that Tract B was the part of the ranch that had been occupied by the Blackburns for approximately 4 years. When the Luloffs later discovered that Tract B was another part of the ranch, they brought an action to have the Blackburns evicted, and the District Court granted summary judgment. The Supreme Court held that summary judgment was correctly granted because there was no contract between the Manweilers and the Blackburns satisfying the statute of frauds for the sale of the property to the Blackburns. The Supreme Court held that the Blackburns' mere possession was insufficient against the Luloffs, who had purchased the ranch as bona fide purchasers in good faith, because they were without notice of any claim of title by the Blackburns. The Supreme Court noted that the Blackburns could not make a claim of title because they had mere possession, which did not satisfy the requirements for adverse possession because the Blackburns had not paid taxes upon the property. Luloff v. Blackburn, 274 M 64, 906 P2d 189, 52 St. Rep. 1124 (1995).

Failure of Counteroffer Under Statute of Frauds — Handwritten Additions by Sellers' Agent Not Subscribed by Sellers — Part Performance and Equitable Estoppel Inapplicable: After Austin rejected a counteroffer on property that he was interested in buying, the agent, Everett, went to the office of the listing agent, Young, who contacted one of the two owners of the property by telephone. That owner, Cash, said that she would consider sale of the property for an additional $5,000 but that she would first have to discuss it with her brother, the other owner. Everett then added a handwritten paragraph to the rejected counteroffer, noting the sale of all of the property for $115,000 and faxed it back to Austin. When Austin received the revised counteroffer, he believed that it had been signed by Cash and, believing that a binding contract had been made, lowered the sale price of other property that he owned in California. Cash and her brother subsequently received and accepted an offer for their property from a different buyer, whereupon the Austins filed a lis pendens against Cash's property, preventing its sale to the other buyer. The Supreme Court held that because neither the sellers nor their agents signed or initialed the handwritten addition to the counteroffer, the contract was not properly subscribed by the sellers or their agents and therefore did not satisfy the statute of frauds. The Supreme Court also held that the action of the Austins in reducing the sale price of their California properties was an act in contemplation of eventual performance of the contract and not an act of part performance itself. For this reason, part performance did not excuse the application of the statute of frauds. The Supreme Court also held that in order for a court to order specific performance of a contract, there had to be a binding contract in the first place and held that because the additional language to the sale contract had not been subscribed, no contract existed. Finally, the Supreme Court held that promissory estoppel is inapplicable when a contract is clearly within the statute of frauds. Austin v. Cash, 274 M 54, 906 P2d 669, 52 St. Rep. 1119 (1995).

Discussions Regarding Land Trade Insufficient to Create Contractual Obligation: Parties discussed a land exchange and worked together with a surveyor in placing stakes and laying out lines for the exchange. Weinberg contended that these actions constituted partial performance sufficient to trigger specific enforcement of the agreement. However, the discussions regarding the land trade were insufficient to create a contractual obligation. Absent a showing of consideration or evidence or indicia of what the parties agreed to and the terms of their agreement, an enforceable agreement did not exist. Quirin v. Weinberg, 252 M 386, 830 P2d 537, 49 St. Rep. 331 (1992), followed in Luloff v. Blackburn, 274 M 64, 906 P2d 189, 52 St. Rep. 1124 (1995).

Negative Easement Based on Oral Agreement — Statute of Frauds Inapplicable: Appellants claimed an oral agreement made in 1967 subjected land known as the Base Area Chalet to a negative easement that restricted the property to noncommercial activities. The Supreme Court found that a written 1971 agreement only contracted to convey property described as "sellers' land" which had been "subject to ski easement"; however, the chalet property was conveyed away by appellants in 1967 and had never been subject to the ski easement. Since the Base Area Chalet did not belong to "sellers" and was not subject to the easement in 1971, the 1971 agreement had no effect on the chalet property. For the same reason, the 1971 agreement could not satisfy the Statute of Frauds for any alleged oral agreement that would create a negative easement on the chalet property. Haggerty v. Gallatin County, 221 M 109, 717 P2d 550, 43 St. Rep. 674 (1986).

Contract to Make Will Denied — No Part Performance Exception: An oral agreement whereby respondents agreed to move to decedent's ranch and lease it from decedent for remainder of his lifetime and decedent agreed to give an undivided one-half interest in the ranch to them at his death and provide them with the right to buy the other one-half interest at the appraised value as of the date of his death was an oral agreement for disposition of decedent's property at death. The District Court committed error and contradicted its own findings of fact when it concluded that the oral agreement was for the leasing, sale, and purchase of real property. The agreement does not conform to a single particular of the requirements provided by statute for the enforcement of such an agreement. The language of 72-2-105 (renumbered 72-2-534) is unambiguous and does not provide for a part performance exception to the Statute of Frauds. Orlando v. Prewett, 218 M 5, 705 P2d 593, 42 St. Rep. 1328 (1985). A mechanics' lien filed against real property that was the subject of the 1985 quiet title action against the same parties who filed the lien was held void under the doctrine of res judicata in Orlando v. Prewett, 236 M 478, 771 P2d 111, 46 St. Rep. 520 (1989).

Realtor Buying Property — Not Usual Course of Business: As part of a real estate transaction in which the buyers needed to sell a piece of property in order to purchase other property, the realtor acting on behalf of the buyers executed a memorandum stating that if the property was not sold by a set time, she would purchase the property at a stated price. The memorandum was not signed by the realtor's alleged partner. On appeal, he contended he could not be bound by the memorandum under the Statute of Frauds. The Supreme Court held that the realtor could not bind her ostensible partner since there was no written authority of agency and because the purchase of real estate was not the realtor's usual way of doing business. The alleged partner could not be bound to the contract evidenced by the memo absent his authorization thereunto in writing. McNabb v. Norine, 204 M 330, 664 P2d 927, 40 St. Rep. 878 (1983).

Equitable Principles — Estopped From Invalidating Agreement Under Statute of Frauds: Agreement between plaintiff and defendant to sell property was valid under the Statute of Frauds even though the written instrument was signed only by the plaintiff and defendant's wife when plaintiff had made an irretrievable change in position and defendant had secured an unconscionable advantage or inflicted an unjust or unconscionable loss upon the plaintiff. Bolz v. Myers, 200 M 286, 651 P2d 606, 39 St. Rep. 1747 (1982).

Performance of Oral Agreement by Party as Precluding Statute of Frauds Defense: The parties were married in 1973. They entered a prenuptial agreement providing that the real and personal property of each would remain separate. In 1974, defendant brought a quiet title action against his sisters. He executed a handwritten agreement with plaintiff that if she would finance the legal expenses of the action he would give her 10% of the land or the value thereof. He was successful, and the parties entered into an oral agreement containing the same provisions for appellate costs. The trial court found that defendant owed plaintiff 20% of the value of the land and that value be determined at the time he elected to pay and be based on 20% of the value of all the land. The defendant contended there was insufficient evidence to support the finding of the oral agreement for the additional 10% of the land. The weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses were for the District Court to determine. There is no preponderance of evidence contrary to the District Court's finding. Defendant contends the oral agreement is barred by the Statute of Frauds because it is an agreement for the sale of real property and could not be performed in a year. The District Court held and the Supreme Court affirmed that the Statute of Frauds does not bar the oral agreement because plaintiff fully performed her part of the bargain. Kartes v. Kartes, 195 M 383, 636 P2d 272, 38 St. Rep. 1941 (1981).

Specific Performance of Agreement to Sell Land — Part Performance: The Statute of Frauds does not abridge the power of any court to compel the specific performance of any agreement for the sale of real property in case of part performance thereof. Dyksterhouse v. Doornbos, 172 M 461, 564 P2d 1293 (1977).

Option Agreement: Evidence of payment of money pursuant to the purchase of real estate for the purpose of persuading seller to hold the deal open for a certain period of time and the subsequent actions of the seller in holding the property off the market were sufficient to establish a valid option agreement, as well as to show that the agreement had been fully performed. Lynch v. Shields, 165 M 396, 529 P2d 348 (1974).

Realtor Agency: Prospective buyer was entitled to return of earnest money where realtor was unable to produce any written documentation of his alleged agency to sell realty. Pack River Co. v. Young, 162 M 271, 511 P2d 12 (1973).

Memorandum Consisting of Several Writings: The note or memorandum necessary to meet the requirements of this section may consist of several writings, and it is sufficient if it contains all the essentials of the contract, although they are stated in general terms. Hughes v. Melby, 135 M 415, 340 P2d 511 (1959).

Rights-of-Way of Necessity: There can be implied grants or reservations of rights-of-way of necessity in Montana. Thisted v. Country Club Tower Corp., 146 M 87, 405 P2d 432 (1965), overruling Simonson v. McDonald, 131 M 494, 311 P2d 982 (1957).

Memorandum — Necessary Contents:

An endorsed bank check with additional words "payment land" written on it is insufficient to constitute the written "note or memorandum" required by the statutes for it does not contain all the essentials of the agreement. Lewis v. Peterson, 127 M 474, 267 P2d 127 (1954).

The memorandum must contain all the essentials of the contract, but if the material elements are stated in general terms all the details or particulars need not be stated. Johnson v. Elliot, 123 M 597, 218 P2d 703 (1950). See also McNabb v. Norine, 204 M 330, 664 P2d 927, 40 St. Rep. 878 (1983).

Oral Agreement Being Performed: Where two persons had entered into a joint adventure for the purchase of ranch lands, in suit by one party for dissolution of the partnership and an accounting, contention of defendant that purchase of certain additional land, if part of agreement to purchase for benefit of partnership, was void because not in writing was not a defense, because both parties had performed and were performing their part of oral agreement to buy ranch properties. Ivins v. Hardy, 123 M 513, 217 P2d 204 (1950).

Complaint — Allegation of Writing: Although a contract to be valid must be in writing, that fact is a matter of proof and need not be alleged in the pleading. Johnson v. Elliot, 123 M 597, 218 P2d 703 (1950).

"Party to Be Charged": The "party to be charged" means the party to be charged in the particular suit. Johnson v. Elliot, 123 M 597, 218 P2d 703 (1950).

Presumption of Written Contract: The law will presume that a contract was in writing in the absence of any statement to the contrary. Johnson v. Elliot, 123 M 597, 218 P2d 703 (1950).

Complaint — Essentials of Agreement: Where complaint showed on its face that memorandum of agreement did not contain all essentials of agreement and such essentials could not be ascertained without resort to oral evidence, demurrer to complaint was properly sustained. Dineen v. Sullivan, 123 M 195, 213 P2d 241 (1949).

Conveyance Rights in Public Lands Orally: A settler upon public lands of the United States may convey his right therein, with water rights appurtenant thereto, orally, with or without consideration, to one who thereupon takes immediate possession thereof. Geary v. Harper, 92 M 242, 12 P2d 276 (1932).

Operation of Statute in General:

A life estate in real property (or a joint tenancy with the right of survivorship) can only be created by deed or will, under the Statute of Frauds. Therefore, the contention of the grantee in a deed which reserved no such estate in the grantor that it was orally understood between the parties that the instrument should have that effect is not maintainable. Hayes v. Moffatt, 83 M 214, 271 P 433 (1928).

Where it appears, in an action of ejectment, that monuments on the boundary between adjoining properties are in place and have been identified by the witnesses for the plaintiff, thus making certain that which can be made certain, in conformity with 1-3-229, and showing that there was no dispute as to the true dividing line, no valid agreement between the parties establishing the dividing line could have been made without a complete observance of the Statute of Frauds, as expressed in this section. Myrick v. Peet, 56 M 13, 180 P 574 (1919).

Where plaintiff sought to recover money on a demand loan, defendant was properly allowed to introduce testimony tending to show that the money paid him by the former was not a loan, but a partial payment upon the purchase price of real property sold under an oral contract, even though such contract of purchase was invalid and therefore unenforceable under the Statute of Frauds. Perkins v. Allnut, 47 M 13, 130 P 1 (1913).

A contract between tenants in common for the erection of a house on the common property by one at his own expense and requiring him to make an equal division of the rents between them when the rents received equaled one-half the cost did not come within this section. Ayotte v. Nadeau, 32 M 498, 81 P 145 (1905).

An oral agreement by a purchaser at a judicial sale of a lode mining claim to take the deed in his own name and convey to another was void under this section. Largey v. Leggat, 30 M 148, 75 P 950 (1904).

Part Performance:

A parol agreement for the sale or exchange of real property may be specifically enforced in case of part performance, and where the vendee takes possession and makes valuable improvements, there is sufficient part performance to take the case out of the Statute of Frauds. Hogan v. Thrasher, 72 M 318, 233 P 607 (1925).

For possession by the vendee to constitute part performance of a parol agreement to sell or exchange land, such possession must be in pursuance of the agreement and not merely a continuance of a former possession; but where possession is followed by the making of valuable and permanent improvements it is referable to the new relation created by the contract rather than the old one. Hogan v. Thrasher, 72 M 318, 233 P 607 (1925).

Specific performance of an oral contract to sell real property could be granted where plaintiff had fully performed all the terms of the agreement to be performed by him, and defendant had put him in actual possession of the premises, upon which he had erected substantial improvements. Stevens v. Trafton, 36 M 520, 93 P 810 (1908).

Claim in Opposition to Written Title — Burden of Proof:

Where a party asserts a claim to realty in opposition to the written title, he has the burden of proof, and the evidence in support of it must be clear, full and satisfactory, nothing being left to conjecture or speculation. MacGinniss Realty Co. v. Hinderager, 63 M 172, 206 P 436 (1922).

Where it is sought to found a claim, as for a right-of-way, to a part of a ranch based upon oral negotiations, and the owner is dead, this section furnishes to the heirs their only defense. If there was, in fact, an agreement to convey the right-of-way, the owner's death would not necessarily defeat a right to specific performance, but to authorize this the terms of the contract must be definite and full and be made out by clear and unambiguous proof. Lewis v. Patton, 42 M 528, 113 P 745 (1911).

Statute of Frauds Must Be Pleaded: Where a defendant, in a suit for specific performance, admitted the making of the contract and relied on other defenses than the Statute of Frauds to defeat the action, he could not avail himself of this section without specially pleading it. Mitchell v. Henderson, 37 M 515, 97 P 942 (1908); Christiansen v. Aldrich, 30 M 446, 76 P 1007 (1904).

Modular Home — Governing Warranty Law: Sale of modular home manufactured at defendant's plant and delivered to plaintiffs' building site was governed by the U.C.C. warranty provisions and not the warranty provisions of this part, which are made inapplicable by 30-11-224. The fact that defendant had charge of the home until after it was affixed to plaintiffs' foundation and no longer had mobility did not affect the applicability of the U.C.C. warranty provisions, for the home was manufactured to plaintiffs' specifications, was thus identified to the contract under the U.C.C. at the time of the first step of its production, was movable at that time, and thus was "goods" the sale of which the U.C.C. applied. Final Written Agreement as Precluding Oral Warranty: Plaintiffs and defendant entered an agreement whereby defendant would lease condominiums from the plaintiffs and would sell plaintiffs her home. The lease of one of the condominiums contained an option for defendant to purchase the unit by forgiving plaintiffs their obligation under the promissory note on the home. Plaintiffs discovered that the floors in the home sloped north at a rate of 5 ½ inches over 30 feet. Plaintiffs sought to rescind the contract, and defendant sought specific performance. Plaintiffs contended that defendant stated that there were no problems whatsoever with the house and that this statement created an express warranty. Defendant denied making the statement. The contract between the parties contained a clause which stated that the written agreement constituted the entire agreement and superseded all prior written or oral representations or agreements. The written contract superseded and waived all oral representations so that no express warranty existed. Woodahl v. Matthews, 196 M 445, 639 P2d 1165, 39 St. Rep. 238 (1982).

Privity of Contract: Remote vendee, having no contractual relationship with defendant rubber boot manufacturer, did not state a claim for breach of warranty where there was no showing of privity of contract between the defendant and the remote vendee. Larson v. U.S. Rubber Co., 163 F. Supp. 327 (D.C. Mont. 1958).

Character of Contract: Where the character of a contract is at issue, to wit, whether it was one of sale, sale with warranty, or agency, the primary test is the intention of the parties gathered from the whole scope and effect of the language employed. Butte Floral Co. v. Reed, 65 M 138, 211 P 325 (1922).

Election of Remedies: On breach of warranty the buyer may either retain the article and sue for damages or rescind the contract and sue for a return of the purchase price paid. Butte Floral Co. v. Reed, 65 M 138, 211 P 325 (1922).

Secondhand Article: The fact that an article sold is secondhand and known to be such does not of itself prevent an affirmation as to its condition constituting an express warranty. Butte Floral Co. v. Reed, 65 M 138, 211 P 325 (1922).

Proof of Credit Purchase — Requisite Proof of Warranty Breach: In an action to collect the purchase price of tires purchased on credit, the defendant (buyer) filed a counterclaim for breach of warranty against the plaintiff. The defendant's counterclaim properly was denied because the defendant had failed to prove a prima facie case. Defendant appealed that there was no proof of some of the purchases. The Supreme Court said that an open account between the seller and buyer can be proved by evidence that the seller's records show that the goods were sold, that invoices had been sent to the buyer who failed to object to them, and that the seller's records are accurate. Here the buyer's rebuttal testimony was indefinite, and credibility was a trial court question. No breach of warranty was proven; only the testimony of the buyer was given and no solid evidence, such as any tires, records of the amount of use of the tires, or maintenance records, was produced. This, with findings of possible alternative causes of the problems with the tires, was a sufficient record to support the finding that breach of warranty was not proved by sufficient evidence. Defendant therefore was liable for the price of the tires. D&K Distrib. v. Ford, 189 M 505, 616 P2d 1097, 37 St. Rep. 1693 (1980).

Implied Warranty of Fitness for Use: While the general rule in most jurisdictions is that the seller of merchandise makes an implied warranty of its fitness for the use for which it is purchased, the rule in Montana is that there is no such warranty under this section, except where the seller is the manufacturer of something to be consumed as food and in cases where the buyer is not accorded an opportunity to examine the article bought (30-11-216 and 30-11-217). Under this rule seller of defective douche, not having manufactured the article and plaintiff and seller having had equal opportunity to discover alleged defects, there was no implied warranty. Harrington v. Montgomery Drug Co., 111 M 564, 111 P2d 808 (1941).

Burden of Proof: Where breach of warranty of a piece of machinery for a certain purpose is relied upon in an action to recover its purchase price, the burden of showing unfitness resting upon defendant is not sustained by evidence that upon a test it did poor work, unless it is also shown that the adjustment and operation were correct at the time of the test. Jones v. Armstrong, 50 M 168, 145 P 949 (1915).

Secondhand Article: One knowingly buying a secondhand article from a person not a dealer or manufacturer, relying upon his own judgment, takes it unaccompanied by an implied warranty as to its fitness for a special purpose. Jones v. Armstrong, 50 M 168, 145 P 949 (1915).

Possession of Property by Buyer: In this country it is the general rule that so long as the buyer of personal property is in the undisturbed possession of it he cannot recover damages for a breach of warranty of title or set up want of title in the seller as defense to an action to recover the purchase price. Guaranty To Deliver:

An endorsement on a bill of sale by the buyer of personal property on a resale thereof that he would "guarantee delivery of same" did not constitute a warranty of title. Pincus v. Muntzer, 34 M 498, 87 P 612 (1906).

Where the transfer of personal property was evidenced by a bill of sale to which the purchaser upon reselling the goods added an endorsement guaranteeing delivery, but not expressly warranting title, the language of this section may not be read into the endorsement and thereby a written warranty created so as to make the statutory limitation of 8 years mentioned in 27-2-202 applicable to a suit for a breach of a warranty of title to the property sold. Final Written Agreement as Precluding Oral Warranty: Plaintiffs and defendant entered an agreement whereby defendant would lease condominiums from the plaintiffs and would sell plaintiffs her home. Plaintiffs discovered that the floors in the home sloped north at a rate of 5 ½ inches over 30 feet. Plaintiffs sought to rescind the contract, and defendant sought specific performance. Plaintiffs contended that defendant stated that there were no problems whatsoever with the house and that this statement created an express warranty. Defendant denied making the statement. No Causal Link Between Lack of Warning and Accidental Injury — Directed Verdict Proper: As set out in Brown v. N. Am. Mfg. Co., 176 M 98, 576 P2d 711 (1978), a showing of proximate cause is a necessary predicate to plaintiff's recovery in strict liability. In arguing the causation element, Riley contended that: (1) his testimony relating to his respect for machinery and concern for safety was sufficient evidence from which to infer that he would have ridden a motorcycle differently had a warning of the propensity to wobble been given; and (2) alternatively, he was entitled to a rebuttable presumption that he would have followed a warning had one been given. However, Riley's testimony on respect and concern was general rather than direct, unequivocal testimony that he would have altered his conduct had a warning been given, which is necessary to support a causal relationship. Although the Supreme Court has cited Comment j of Restatement (Second) of Torts 402A (1965) in recognizing the failure to warn claim itself, the specific language of the Comment that gives rise to the rebuttable presumption has not been adopted. Rather than adopt the Comment wholesale, the court, consistent with Brown and its successors, required a showing of a causal link between the lack of a warning and the accident and injuries in a failure to warn claim. Absent that showing, a directed verdict on the claim was proper. Riley v. Am. Honda Motor Co., Inc., 259 M 128, 855 P2d 196, 50 St. Rep. 714 (1993).

Factors to Be Considered in Alternative Design Products Liability Case: Recognizing that all factors may not be appropriate in every case and that additional factors should be considered where appropriate, the court found that the following factors should be considered in an alternative design product liability case:

"(1) A manufacturer who sells a product in a defective condition unreasonably dangerous because of a design defect is subject to liability for harm thereby caused to the ultimate user.

(2) A product may be in a defective condition unreasonably dangerous if the manufacturer should have used an alternative design.

(3) In determining whether an alternative design should have been used, the jury should balance so many of the following factors as it finds to be pertinent at the time of manufacture:

(a) The reasonable probability that the product as originally designed would cause serious harm to the claimant.

(b) Consideration of the reasonable probability of harm from the use of the original product as compared to the reasonable probability of harm from the use of the product with the alternative design.

(c) The technological feasibility of an alternative design that would have prevented claimant's harm.

(d) The relative costs both to the manufacturer and the consumer of producing, distributing and selling the original product as compared to the product with the alternative design.

(e) The time reasonably required to implement the alternative design." Rix v. Gen. Motors Corp., 222 M 318, 723 P2d 195, 43 St. Rep. 1296 (1986), followed in Krueger v. Gen. Motors Corp., 240 M 266, 783 P2d 1340, 46 St. Rep. 2114 (1989).

Manufacturing Defects Defined: In finding jury instructions to be adequate, the court held that the essential question was whether the product was flawed or defective because it was not constructed correctly by the manufacturer. The court quoted from Caprara v. Chrysler Corp., 436 N.Y.S.2d 251 (1981), saying: "Manufacturing defects, by definition, are "imperfections that inevitably occur in a typically small percentage of products of a given design as a result of the fallibility of the manufacturing process. A defectively manufactured product does not conform in some significant aspect to the intended design, nor does it conform to the great majority of products manufactured in accordance with that design." Stated differently, a defectively manufactured product is flawed because it is misconstructed without regard to whether the intended design of the manufacturer was safe or not. Such defects result from some mishap in the manufacturing process itself, improper workmanship, or because defective materials were used in construction." Rix v. Gen. Motors Corp., 222 M 318, 723 P2d 195, 43 St. Rep. 1296 (1986), followed in Krueger v. Gen. Motors Corp., 240 M 266, 783 P2d 1340, 46 St. Rep. 2114 (1989).

Design Defect Strict Liability — Change Subsequent to Manufacture: As set forth in Brown v. N. Am. Mfg. Co., 176 M 98, 576 P2d 711 (1978), the elements to prove a prima facie case in strict liability are: (1) the product was in a defective condition "unreasonably" dangerous to the user or consumer; (2) the defect caused the accident and injuries complained of; and (3) the defect is traceable to defendant. When the case involves a design defect, changes in the product through wear, tear, and abuse do not affect whether the original design was defective and unreasonably dangerous. If the product was not defective and unreasonably dangerous when it left the manufacturer's control and subsequent changes in the product that could not have been reasonably anticipated made the product dangerous, there is no liability. Kuiper v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 207 M 37, 673 P2d 1208, 40 St. Rep. 1861 (1983), followed in Rix v. Gen. Motors Corp., 222 M 318, 723 P2d 195, 43 St. Rep. 1296 (1986), and Baldauf v. Arrow Tank & Eng'r Co., Inc., 1999 MT 81, 294 M 107, 979 P2d 166, 56 St. Rep. 337 (1999). The Brown criteria were applied in Riley v. Am. Honda Motor Co., Inc., 259 M 128, 855 P2d 196, 50 St. Rep. 714 (1993), and Meyer v. Creative Nail Design, Inc., 1999 MT 74, 294 M 46, 975 P2d 1264, 56 St. Rep. 306 (1999).

Strict Liability — No "Open and Obvious Danger" Rule — Consideration as to Assumption of Risk: The Supreme Court reaffirmed its holding in Brown v. N. Am. Mfg. Co., 176 M 98, 576 P2d 711 (1978), that it was not error for the trial court to reject a proposed jury instruction on the "open and obvious danger" rule in strict liability. The court further held that the obvious character of the defect or danger is but a factor to be considered as to the assumption of risk in strict liability cases and must be judged by applying a subjective standard to plaintiff's conduct rather than the objective standard of a reasonable man. Kuiper v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 207 M 37, 673 P2d 1208, 40 St. Rep. 1861 (1983).

Modular Home — Governing Warranty Law: Sale of modular home manufactured at defendant's plant and delivered to plaintiffs' building site was governed by the U.C.C. warranty provisions and not the warranty provisions of this part, which are made inapplicable by 30-11-224. The fact that defendant had charge of the home until after it was affixed to plaintiffs' foundation and no longer had mobility did not affect the applicability of the U.C.C. warranty provisions, for the home was manufactured to plaintiffs' specifications, was thus identified to the contract under the U.C.C. at the time of the first step of its production, was movable at that time, and thus was "goods" the sale of which the U.C.C. applied. Little v. Grizzly Mfg., 195 M 419, 636 P2d 839, 38 St. Rep. 1994 (1981).

Proof of Credit Purchase — Requisite Proof of Warranty Breach: In an action to collect the purchase price of tires purchased on credit, the defendant (buyer) filed a counterclaim for breach of warranty against the plaintiff. The defendant's counterclaim properly was denied because the defendant had failed to prove a prima facie case. Defendant appealed that there was no proof of some of the purchases. The Supreme Court said that an open account between the seller and buyer can be proved by evidence that the seller's records show that the goods were sold, that invoices had been sent to the buyer who failed to object to them, and that the seller's records are accurate. Here the buyer's rebuttal testimony was indefinite, and credibility was a trial court question. No breach of warranty was proven; only the testimony of the buyer was given and no solid evidence, such as any tires, records of the amount of use of the tires, or maintenance records, was produced. This, with findings of possible alternative causes of the problems with the tires, was a sufficient record to support the finding that breach of warranty was not proved by sufficient evidence. Defendant therefore was liable for the price of the tires. D&K Distrib. v. Ford, 189 M 505, 616 P2d 1097, 37 St. Rep. 1693 (1980).

Circumstantial Evidence of Manufacturing Defect: Plaintiff met the burden of proof for a strict liability action in proving, by circumstantial evidence, a defect rendering a product unreasonably dangerous. The Court rejected defendant's assertion of the "open and obvious danger" rule and the "patent-latent" distinction. Brown v. N. Am. Mfg. Co., 176 M 98, 576 P2d 711 (1978).

Privity of Contract: In action for breach of warranty no recovery may be had in the absence of privity of contract between the manufacturer and the person seeking to enforce the warranty. Larson v. U.S. Rubber Co., 163 F. Supp. 327 (D.C. Mont. 1958).

Negligence and Strict Liability Action for Damages by Pesticide Not Preempted by FIFRA — McAlpine Overruled: Plaintiffs brought an action for damages allegedly suffered when a pesticide was applied at the building where they worked. The District Court granted summary judgment for the pesticide manufacturer on the basis that the claims were preempted by the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA) and McAlpine v. Rhone-Poulenc Ag Co., 285 M 224, 947 P2d 474 (1997), because all of the theories of liability were based on inclusions in or omissions from the pesticide labels. In particular, 7 U.S.C. 136v(b) provides that a state may not impose or continue in effect any requirement for labeling or packaging in addition to or different from those required under the federal law. On appeal, the Supreme Court overruled McAlpine and instead applied Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 US 470 (1996), concluding that Congress, through FIFRA, intended only to preempt states from imposing positive law requirements in the form of regulations and laws and did not intend to extinguish damage remedies under state common law. The word "requirements" in section 136v(b) means enactments of positive law by legislative or administrative bodies, not state law damage actions. The case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. Sleath v. West Mont Home Health Serv., Inc., 2000 MT 381, 304 M 1, 16 P3d 1042, 57 St. Rep. 1629 (2000).

Damage to Crops by Herbicide — Extent of Preemption by FIFRA — Claims for Breach of Express and Implied Warranty Not Preempted — Negligence and Strict Liability Preempted — Remedy for Prevention of Discovery by Summary Judgment: McAlpine applied Weedone LV6, a herbicide manufactured by Rhone-Poulenc and distributed by Ben Taylor, to crops of barley and spring wheat. After several weeks of cool morning temperatures, McAlpine noticed damage to his crops, which experts from Montana State University (now Montana State University-Bozeman) and the Montana Department of Agriculture said was caused by cool temperatures after application of the herbicide. The McAlpines brought a civil action against Rhone-Poulenc, claiming damages from negligence, breach of express and implied warranty, and strict liability. The District Court granted summary judgment for the defendants on the basis that the plaintiffs' claims were based on deficiencies in the label on Weedone LV6 and that those claims were preempted by the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA). Citing Wis. Pub. Intervenor v. Mortier, 501 US 597 (1991), and Cipollone v. Liggett Group, Inc., 505 US 504 (1992), the Supreme Court interpreted the FIFRA preemption statement, 7 U.S.C. 136v(b), to preempt only claims based upon negligence in labeling and not to preempt the appellants' claims based upon either express or implied warranty or strict liability. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that the appellants must be given the opportunity to prove that Rhone-Poulenc and Ben Taylor breached their warranty by designing, manufacturing, and marketing a product that was inherently defective and that the same defendants are strictly liable for designing, manufacturing, and marketing an unreasonably dangerous product. In response to Rhone-Poulenc's argument that the McAlpines failed to offer any evidence to defeat summary judgment, the Supreme Court pointed out that because the District Court granted summary judgment, the McAlpines were prevented from conducting complete discovery and that until discovery was completed, it was premature for the Supreme Court to conclude that the McAlpines' evidence was insufficient. McAlpine v. Rhone-Poulenc Ag Co., 285 M 224, 947 P2d 474, 54 St. Rep. 1123 (1997), overruled in Sleath v. West Mont Home Health Serv., Inc., 2000 MT 381, 304 M 1, 16 P3d 1042, 57 St. Rep. 1629 (2000), holding that state common-law negligence and strict liability claims based on or implicating pesticide labels are not preempted by FIFRA. Following the 1997 remand of McAlpine, the McAlpines settled with Ben Taylor, Inc., and proceeded to trial against Rhone-Poulenc on a theory of strict products liability, claiming that Weedone LV6 was a defective product because its propensity to damage or destroy crops in conjunction with cold weather was a danger outside the expectations of the ordinary consumer. Rhone-Poulenc acknowledged that the crop damage was caused by the phenoxy herbicide, but argued that the damage was not unreasonably dangerous and that liability exists only when a product is sufficiently dangerous. The trial court instructed the jury that it must find that the herbicide was in a "defective condition unreasonably dangerous", rather than merely in a defective condition, and the jury returned a verdict for Rhone-Poulenc. The McAlpines appealed. The Supreme Court previously held in McJunkin v. Kaufman, 229 M 432, 748 P2d 910 (1987), that a product is defective if it is unreasonably dangerous, but a plaintiff is not required to show that a product is defective and also that it is unreasonably dangerous, because establishing that a product is unreasonably dangerous is merely a means of proving that it is defective. Thus, the "defective condition unreasonably dangerous" language creates a vague and imprecise dual test and should not have been submitted to the jury because it was not plain, clear, and concise. The jury should have been required to find merely that the product was in a defective condition, so the case was again remanded. Further, the decision in Sleath, id., also applied on remand, so evidence of the product label was admissible in further proceedings. McAlpine v. Rhone-Poulenc Ag Co., 2000 MT 383, 304 M 31, 16 P3d 1054, 57 St. Rep. 1644 (2000).

Failure to Prove Unreasonably Dangerous Defective Condition — Proper Test of Defective Product: The Supreme Court adopted a modified approach to the test of strict liability as defined by sec. 402A, Restatement (Second) of Torts, in holding that while a product is defective if it is unreasonably dangerous, the lack of a dangerous aspect does not automatically preclude a finding that the product is defective. The proper test of a defective product is whether the product is unreasonably unsuitable for its intended or foreseeable purpose. McJunkin v. Kaufman, 229 M 432, 748 P2d 910, 44 St. Rep. 2111 (1987).

Modular Home — Governing Warranty Law: Sale of modular home manufactured at defendant's plant and delivered to plaintiffs' building site was governed by the U.C.C. warranty provisions and not the warranty provisions of this part, which are made inapplicable by 30-11-224. The fact that defendant had charge of the home until after it was affixed to plaintiffs' foundation and no longer had mobility did not affect the applicability of the U.C.C. warranty provisions, for the home was manufactured to plaintiffs' specifications, was thus identified to the contract under the U.C.C. at the time of the first step of its production, was movable at that time, and thus was "goods" the sale of which the U.C.C. applied. Little v. Grizzly Mfg., 195 M 419, 636 P2d 839, 38 St. Rep. 1994 (1981).

Application of Section: Where defendant did not have enough linseed pellets to fill plaintiff's order for sheep feed and suggested that plaintiff try another type of pellet which was a part of defendant's stock on hand, it was improper to instruct under this section since there was no evidence that such pellets were manufactured under the order for a specific purpose. Seaton Ranch Co. v. Mont. Vegetable Oil & Feed Co., 123 M 396, 217 P2d 549 (1950).

Rescission Unnecessary to Claim Breach of Implied Warranty: One who purchases articles for a particular purpose need not rescind the contract and restore them to the seller upon discovering a breach of the implied warranty, but may set up his claim for damages by way of counterclaim in an action by the plaintiff for the purchase price. Busbee v. Gagnon Co., 50 M 203, 146 P 275 (1915).

Buyer Entitled to Damages for Shipment of Damaged Plants: Reed owned a greenhouse and ordered a shipment of poinsettias from McCalif for Christmas. When the plants arrived, many were damaged. Reed refused to pay $3,027.09 for the marketable plants that he kept and resold, contending that he had lost $8,683.95 on the damaged plants for which he had already received purchase orders from other buyers. The Supreme Court held that the record proved that there was no other source for replacement of the damaged plants and that McCalif was aware of that fact and the fact that Reed had entered into contracts for the resale of the plants. The Supreme Court ruled that Reed had the right to accept part of the plants received and reject the rest and that Reed was entitled to incidental and consequential damages because of McCalif's breach. The measure of damages was the difference between what Reed owed for the plants that he kept and what he lost on the orders that he could not fill. McCalif Grower Supplies, Inc. v. Reed, 272 M 254, 900 P2d 880, 52 St. Rep. 659 (1995).

Case Notes

Modular Home — Governing Warranty Law: Sale of modular home manufactured at defendant's plant and delivered to plaintiffs' building site was governed by the U.C.C. warranty provisions and not the warranty provisions of this part, which are made inapplicable by this section. The fact that defendant had charge of the home until after it was affixed to plaintiffs' foundation and no longer had mobility did not affect the applicability of the U.C.C. warranty provisions, for the home was manufactured to plaintiffs' specifications, was thus identified to the contract under the U.C.C. at the time of the first step of its production, was movable at that time, and thus was "goods" the sale of which the U.C.C. applied. Case Notes

Significant Alteration of Dealership Contract Allowing Retroactive Application of Dealership Termination Law — Damage Award Proper: The District Court awarded Van Ripers damages, costs, and attorney fees for the unlawful violation of the farm equipment dealership by Ford New Holland (Ford). Ford contended that the court incorrectly applied the provisions of 30-11-803 and this section retroactively to a dealership contract in effect prior to the effective date of this section. However, the sale of assets by the original dealer significantly altered the dealership relationship and contract, allowing the retroactive application of this section. By terminating Van Ripers' franchise without notice, failing to notify Van Ripers of a dealership attrition plan, and leaving Van Ripers on "stop ship" status after a disputed parts account was paid, Ford violated this section and Van Ripers were entitled to damages for breach of contract and lost profits, even though the amount of damage was uncertain. 2001 Amendment: Chapter 483 after "department of" substituted "labor and industry" for "commerce"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2001.

1981 Amendments: Chapter 575 inserted "of business regulation" after "department".

Chapter 274 substituted "department of commerce" for "department of business regulation".

Statement of Intent: The statement of intent attached to Senate Bill 82 (Ch. 75, L. 1979) provided: "A statement of intent is required for this bill in that it delegates authority to adopt rules in Section 1.

Senate Bill 82 is enacted into law in order to provide for the voluntary use of metric sizes in packaging. It is particularly directed at Title 30, chapter 12, part 4, and the following or similar commodities: bread, butter, oleomargarine, and margarine, fluid dairy products, flour, corn meal, and hominy grits, as well as furnace and stove oil, and berries and small fruits. The purpose of providing rulemaking authority for the department in allowing for metric sizes is to provide for voluntary use of metric sizes; that is, the rulemaking process will provide the greatest opportunity for industry and consumer input. If metric sizes were defined by statute as under the current law for other sizes, it is possible that either the industry or the consumer may be forced into a position of accepting sizes which are not compatible with their needs. Furthermore, Congress, while attempting to effect the conversion of the United States to the metric system, may, either by statute or rule, define those packaging requirements for the commodities which this bill deals with. In such an instance, rather than returning to the legislature and requesting amendment to the statute, a more efficient and expeditious method of change is provided for. Thus, bread, fluid dairy products, or the other commodities mentioned may be packaged and sold either in the sizes currently provided for in the statutes or in the sizes which will be defined by department rule with the assistance of the industries and consumers involved."

Incorporation Into Existing Law: This section was enacted without any codification instructions and without any definition of "department". The apparent intent of the Legislature was that it become part of Title 30, chapter 12, parts 1 through 5, and that the provisions in parts 1 through 5 apply to it. The Code Commissioner has codified it accordingly. See 1-11-103(4).

Part 1
General Provisions

30-13-121. Goodwill of business.

Case Notes

Breach of Contract — Value of Goodwill Determined: In an action for breach of a contract to sell and purchase a barber shop business, the sole issue on appeal was the proper determination of the value of goodwill attributable to the shop's location. The Court found that the District Court improperly restricted the reasonable value of goodwill associated with the shop's location to a 1-month period, in light of the facts that the purchaser had obtained a long-term lease and that there was no indication that the lessor would have been unwilling to lease to the seller on a long-term rather than a month-to-month basis. While there is no rigid rule for determining the value of goodwill, the best indicator is the purchase price agreed upon in a voluntary arm's-length transaction. The three elements comprising the purchase price in this contract were the goodwill associated with the shop's location, the seller's furniture and fixtures, and the shop's telephone connection. The seller removed the fixtures and furniture and disconnected the telephone upon learning of the purchaser's new lease arrangements. These things were valued at $3,000. The seller's recovery was therefore based on the purchase price less the $3,000. An estimate of business lost due to changing locations was then used to determine the percentage of the base price representing the shop's goodwill attached to the shop's location. Baldwin v. Stuber, 187 M 430, 610 P2d 160 (1980).

Owner Entitled to Protection in Exclusive Enjoyment: Goodwill, although intangible, is property capable of transfer, and owner is entitled to same protection in the exclusive enjoyment of it as he is in that of his tangible possessions. A competitor cannot so dress his goods or advertise them as to take away the trade reputation which another has established by a long course of honesty and fair dealing with the public in the same business. Truzzolino Food Prod. Co. v. F. W. Woolworth Co., 108 M 408, 91 P2d 415 (1939), overruled on another point in Fauver v. Wilkoske, 123 M 228, 211 P2d 420 (1949).

Case Notes

Breach of Contract — Value of Goodwill Determined: In an action for breach of a contract to sell and purchase a barber shop business, the sole issue on appeal was the proper determination of the value of goodwill attributable to the shop's location. The Court found that the District Court improperly restricted the reasonable value of goodwill associated with the shop's location to a 1-month period, in light of the facts that the purchaser had obtained a long-term lease and that there was no indication that the lessor would have been unwilling to lease to the seller on a long-term rather than a month-to-month basis. While there is no rigid rule for determining the value of goodwill, the best indicator is the purchase price agreed upon in a voluntary arm's-length transaction. The three elements comprising the purchase price in this contract were the goodwill associated with the shop's location, the seller's furniture and fixtures, and the shop's telephone connection. The seller removed the fixtures and furniture and disconnected the telephone upon learning of the purchaser's new lease arrangements. These things were valued at $3,000. The seller's recovery was therefore based on the purchase price less the $3,000. An estimate of business lost due to changing locations was then used to determine the percentage of the base price representing the shop's goodwill attached to the shop's location. Baldwin v. Stuber, 187 M 430, 610 P2d 160 (1980).

Owner Entitled to Protection in Exclusive Enjoyment: Although goodwill of a business is intangible, it is property capable of transfer, and owner thereof is entitled to the same protection in its exclusive enjoyment as he is in that of his tangible possessions. Part Case Notes

CASES DECIDED UNDER FORMER LAW
USE OF FICTITIOUS NAME BY PARTNERSHIP

Nonallowance of Suit:

The disability imposed by section 63-602, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), is limited to maintaining an action on an account or contract. First Sec. Bank v. U.S., 213 F. Supp. 362 (D.C. Mont. 1963).

The disability imposed by section 63-602, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), (not allowing maintenance of an action on contracts or transactions) for failure to comply with section 63-601, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), cannot avail a defendant sued by copartners conducting business under a fictitious name, except upon affirmative allegation and proof. It is in the nature of matter in abatement. The inhibition does not destroy the right of action upon which recovery is sought but merely imposes a disability to maintain action until compliance with section 63-601, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed). Croft v. Bain, 49 M 484, 143 P 960 (1914).

Certificate — Filing Required: If name under which business is transacted fairly discloses true name of individual (or of each partner in case of partnership), section 63-606, R.C.M. 1947

(now repealed), does not apply. Otherwise, the name used is fictitious and the requirement of filing a certificate must be met. Canonica v. St. George, 64 M 200, 208 P 607 (1922).

Failure to File Certificate:

Although plaintiff's use of name "Tony's Tin Shop" did not disclose his true name, nonsuiting plaintiff was error where he made out a prima facie case and defendant did not plead or prove failure to comply with section 63-606, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), which required filing of a fictitious name certificate. Canonica v. St. George, 64 M 200, 208 P 607 (1922).

Failure of one doing business under fictitious name to file certificate showing his true name does not invalidate the contract or other transaction sued on by him or destroy his right of action but operates only upon the remedy and then only until the requirements of section 63-606, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), have been met. Canonica v. St. George, 64 M 200, 208 P 607 (1922).

In action to recover on contract or obligation by one doing business under fictitious name, an allegation of compliance with statute is not part of statement of his cause of action, his failure in that regard being a matter of defense which must be specially pleaded, else it is waived. Canonica v. St. George, 64 M 200, 208 P 607 (1922).

Transacting Business: A person who, in a single isolated instance, signs a contract with a fictitious name, is not "transacting" or "doing" business within inhibition of section 63-606, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), and may invoke aid of court to enforce his claim. Keffler v. Wilds, 50 M 381, 146 P 1103 (1915).

Maintenance of Action:

It is not the right to begin an action but the right to maintain it that is withheld by section 63-602, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed), for failure to comply with its terms requiring filing of fictitious partnership name. If, before the defense is interposed, plaintiff complies with statutory provisions, the action may be maintained. The defense is an affirmative one and is waived unless pleaded in the answer. Reilly v. Hatheway, 46 M 1, 125 P 417 (1912).

Suit involving a partnership claim may be instituted in name of persons composing the partnership. The fact that plaintiffs are copartners did not appear from face of complaint and was not raised by answer. An objection to the right to maintain the suit being deemed waived, it was not error to exclude evidence showing the fictitious name certificate had been filed. Wilson v. Yegen Bros., 38 M 504, 100 P 613 (1909).

Firm Name:

The name "McLaughlin Bros." did not come within section 63-601, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed). It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that such name is a designation not showing the names of persons interested as partners. Vaughan v. Kujath, 44 M 484, 120 P 1121 (1912).

Where plaintiffs, A. Guiterman, S. A. Guiterman, and L. A. Guiterman, were doing business under the firm name of Guiterman Bros., the same was neither fictitious nor a designation not showing the names of partners, within purview of section 63-601, R.C.M. 1947 (now repealed). Guiterman v. Wishon, 21 M 458, 54 P 566 (1898).

Corporation Acting Under Assumed Name Without Registration — No Right of Access to Courts: In an action by a foreign corporation against Montana parties, under 35-1-1004 (now repealed and replaced by 35-1-1027), the out-of-state corporation is without authority to bring suit in Montana because it is a foreign corporation transacting business in the state without a certificate of authority. The corporation received a certificate more than 10 years ago, but it has since been suspended. Another company incorporated by the same principals presently holds a valid certificate of authority in this state, but the record contains no evidence that the businesses have been merged, although apparently the second foreign corporation used the first corporation's name as a trade name. Under this section, a corporation acting under an assumed name without registration has no right of access to state courts. The plaintiff's complaint is dismissed unless the corporation amends its complaint to name the proper party within a reasonable time as prescribed by Rule 17(a), M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20). Mktg. Case Notes

"Yellowstone Outfitters" — Primarily Geographically Descriptive: "Yellowstone" is the name of a river, a county, and a national park. "Outfitters" is a name descriptive of services being offered in the region around Yellowstone National Park. Together the two denote outfitting services in the Yellowstone area. Therefore, the name "Yellowstone Outfitters" is primarily geographically descriptive within the meaning of 30-13-303(1) and under the ruling of Esselstyn v. Holmes, 42 M 507, 117 P 118 (1911). Further, "Yellowstone Outfitters" does not fall within the 30-13-303(2) exception to the rule against appropriation of geographically descriptive names because there has been no showing that appellant's name has become distinctive of his services. Warwood v. Hubbard, 218 M 438, 709 P2d 637, 42 St. Rep. 1719 (1985).

CHAPTER 14
UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES AND CONSUMER PROTECTION

Chapter Compiler's Comments

Similarity to Uniform Law: This chapter is substantially similar to the Uniform Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law, which may be found in 29 Suggested State Legislation 141 (1972).

Chapter Case Notes

Claims Under Unfair Trade Practices Act Subject to Statute of Limitations on Actions for Constructive Fraud: As a liability created by statute that is neither a penalty nor a statutory debt, claims brought under the Montana Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 are subject to the 2-year statute of limitations in 27-2-211. Osterman v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 2003 MT 327, 318 M 342, 80 P3d 435 (2003), following Royal Ins. Co. v. Roadarmel, 2000 MT 259, 301 M 508, 11 P3d 105 (2000).

Exercise of Ordinary Diligence Required in Discovery of Unfair Trade Practices Constituting Fraud for Tolling Statute of Limitations: For purposes of tolling the statute of limitations in an action for fraud or unfair trade practices, ordinary diligence must be exercised by the aggrieved party in discovery of the facts constituting the fraud or deceptive practice. Pursuant to Johnson v. Barrett, 1999 MT 176, 295 M 254, 983 P2d 925 (1999), the test is whether the plaintiff has information of circumstances sufficient to put a reasonable person on inquiry or has the opportunity to obtain knowledge from sources open to the plaintiff's investigation. Mere ignorance of the facts will not suffice to toll the statute of limitations. In this case, plaintiff filed an unfair trade practices complaint about 2 years and 9 months after entering an agreement with defendant siding installer, believing at the time that the contract was with the defendant company that manufactured the siding. However, plaintiff showed no affirmative conduct by either defendant that was calculated to obscure the existence of a cause of action, nor were the facts giving rise to the alleged fraud concealed. Thus, plaintiff discovered or should have discovered the facts constituting the alleged fraud when the contract was entered more than 2 years prior to filing suit, so the claim was barred by the 2-year statute of limitations in 27-2-211. Osterman v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 2003 MT 327, 318 M 342, 80 P3d 435 (2003).

Provisions of Act Not Applicable — Attorney Fees Proper: The District Court found that the provisions of the Montana Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 were inapplicable to the subject of this case but that pursuant to the Act the defendant, as prevailing party, was entitled to reasonable attorney fees under 30-14-133. Appellant contended that since the Act did not apply, award of attorney fees was not appropriate. The Supreme Court affirmed the award, noting that defendant prevailed on the main issue in controversy and that since the action was brought under the Act, reasonable attorney fees were proper. Dillree v. Devoe, 223 M 47, 724 P2d 171, 43 St. Rep. 1521 (1986).

Applicability of Chapter Where No Fraud, Duress, or Undue Influence Present: Attorney, minutes before he was to defend client on criminal charges, threatened to withdraw as counsel unless client executed security agreement and quitclaim deed as security for attorney's fee. Attorney had given the instruments to client weeks before trial, but client had failed to execute them. No fraud, duress, or undue influence was found. Under these facts, this chapter has no application. Matthews v. Berryman, 196 M 49, 637 P2d 822, 38 St. Rep. 2112 (1981).

Part Compiler's Comments

Severability Clause: Section 18, Ch. 275, L. 1973, read: "If any provision of this act is declared unconstitutional, or the application to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the constitutionality of the remainder of the act and its applicability to other persons and circumstances is not affected."

Part Case Notes

Negligence Compared With Violation of Consumer Protection Act: The jury found the defendant violated the Consumer Protection Act and was negligent. The trial court applied the comparative negligence statute to reduce the plaintiffs' recovery under the Act. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the reduction of damages, stating that the law as stated in the jury instructions does not allow the separation of the defendant's actions in violation of the Consumer Protection Act from its actions that were negligent. Evans v. Teakettle Realty, 226 M 363, 736 P2d 472, 44 St. Rep. 723 (1987).

Public Service Commission Exempt From Consumer Protection Act: The plain meaning of 30-14-105 is that actions and transactions of the Public Service Commission, acting under its statutory authority, are exempt from the Consumer Protection Act. Rozel Corp. v. Dept. of Public Service Regulation, 226 M 237, 735 P2d 282, 44 St. Rep. 618 (1987).

No Individual Cause of Action Concerning Goods Purchased for Business Rather Than for Personal, Family, or Household Purposes: When uncontradicted testimony established that a machine had been purchased for use in respondents' business, respondents did not fall within the class of persons who may bring a private action under 30-14-133. Doll v. Major Muffler Centers, Inc., 208 M 401, 687 P2d 48, 41 St. Rep. 429 (1984).

Jury Instruction Regarding Contractor's Involvement in Trade or Commerce — Waiver of Defense by Failure to Include in Final Pretrial Order: Defendant objected to a jury instruction stating defendant's involvement in trade or commerce, contending that that determination and the applicability of the Consumer Protection Act to his business were questions of fact for the jury. However, the final pretrial order did not contain any factual issue, legal theory, or defense that defendant was contesting the applicability of the Montana Unfair Trade practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 to his business, so that theory or defense was waived as an issue to be determined by the trier of fact at trial. The Supreme Court found that the agreed facts in the pretrial order supported a determination that defendant was in fact engaged in trade or commerce, as defined in this section, so giving of a jury instruction to that effect was not in error. Plath v. Schonrock, 2003 MT 21, 314 M 101, 64 P3d 984 (2003).

Consumer Loan by Bank Covered by Act: Because the Montana Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 is in derogation of the common law, it should be liberally construed with a view to effect its object and to promote justice. The approach to defining what is meant by the word "services" should be broad in scope. The Act applies to a consumer loan by a bank. Baird v. Norwest Bank, 255 M 317, 843 P2d 327, 49 St. Rep. 1026 (1992).

Electric Cooperative Requirement That New Customer Pay Prior Customer's Delinquent Bill Unreasonable: Granbois applied to have an electric cooperative provide service to her lot. However, the bylaws of the cooperative required that before she could receive service, Granbois pay the delinquent bill of the person who previously received service at the location. She paid the delinquent bill, began receiving service, and then brought an action against the cooperative on grounds that the policy violated unfair trade practices. Citing Howe v. Big Horn Elec. Co-op, 206 M 297, 670 P2d 936, 40 St. Rep. 1670 (1983), the Supreme Court held that the disparity in the relative positions of the cooperative and the consumer necessarily required the cooperative to deal reasonably with its members and that the policy requiring a new customer to either pay the predecessor's bill or go without electricity was an unreasonable restriction on Granbois's access to electric services. After determining that the case could proceed as an unfair trade practices action, the court remanded with instructions to refund Granbois the amount of the delinquent bill. Granbois v. Big Horn County Elec. Co-op, Inc., 1999 MT 222, 296 M 45, 986 P2d 1097, 56 St. Rep. 874 (1999).

Expert Testimony Unnecessary on Issue of Standard of Care — District Court Not Directed as to All Expert Testimony on All Claims: Durbins purchased a home through the seller's realtors. Contrary to the representations of the realtors, Durbins discovered that the property had no legal septic system, that the household water was unsafe to use for any purpose, and that the access road was located on the neighbor's property. Durbins brought an action against the realtors, alleging negligent misrepresentation, actual and constructive fraud, and statutory violations involving the Montana real estate licensing laws and the Montana Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973. The defendants sought and achieved dismissal of the case on the grounds that Durbins failed to prove through expert testimony the applicable standard of care of the realtors. The Supreme Court held that expert witnesses were unnecessary to prove a standard of care. Durbins also asked that the Supreme Court direct the District Court to exclude testimony of any expert witnesses on any claim asserted by the Durbins. The Supreme Court noted that the District Courts have great latitude concerning the admissibility of evidence and that the District Court would in any event have to comply with Rule 702, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The Supreme Court therefore declined to direct the District Court as requested by the Durbins. Durbin v. Ross, 276 M 463, 916 P2d 758, 53 St. Rep. 471 (1996).

Retention of Building Materials by Architects Not Violative of Professional Conduct or Consumer Protection Act: Architects who retained property and building materials from a building site after defendant failed to make contractual payments did not violate standards of professional conduct or commit unfair practices under the Montana Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973. Taylor, Thon, Thompson & Peterson v. Cannaday, 230 M 151, 749 P2d 63, 45 St. Rep. 102 (1988).

No Proof of Misrepresentation by Car Salesman: When the plaintiff, a purchaser of a used truck, brought an action against defendant car salesman alleging that the condition of a truck had been misrepresented, the District Court did not err in ruling that the plaintiff failed to offer proof establishing that the truck did not conform to the representations made by the salesman. The defects discovered by the plaintiff were discoverable by reasonable inspection and none rendered the truck inoperable or presented a safety hazard. Emick v. Koch, 227 M 365, 739 P2d 947, 44 St. Rep. 1153 (1987).

Parallel Pricing as Insufficient Circumstantial Evidence of Restraint of Trade: Where the State brought an action against the defendant retail gasoline dealer, alleging that the defendant acted to restrain trade in the setting of gasoline prices, the federal District Court found that the defendant's actions of price following and parallel pricing were consistent with the defendant's own policies and self-interest, were a rational response to market conditions, were not accompanied by any evidence of other "plus factors" tending to show restraint of trade, and that the evidence of the defendant's pricing methods was therefore insufficient circumstantial evidence to show a violation of either state or federal law. St. v. SuperAmerica, 559 F. Supp. 298, 40 St. Rep. 944 (D.C. Mont. 1983).

Consumer Protection Act Violation Alleged as Cause of Accident — Agency Rule Not in Conflict With Federal Law — Summary Judgment: The District Court properly denied summary judgment on plaintiff's Court No. II, which claimed misrepresentation as to the odometer reading on a used car sold to her by defendant corporation as the proximate cause of her accident and subsequent injuries. A state agency rule adopted pursuant to 30-14-104 was not inconsistent with the rules and decisions of the FTC and decisions of the Federal Courts, although the rule deals with sales and the main purpose of the federal law is to prevent unlawful restraint of trade. Whether the alleged violation was a cause of plaintiff's damages was a jury issue. Kopischke v. First. Cont. Corp., 187 M 471, 610 P2d 668 (1980).

Permitted Delegation of Legislative Authority: This section prescribes with reasonable clarity the limits of power delegated to the state administrative agency in defining unlawful or deceptive practices in trade and commerce and does not represent an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to either the state administrative agency or to the Federal Trade Commission and the federal courts, whose determinations the state agency is empowered but not required to adopt. Claims Under Unfair Trade Practices Act Subject to Statute of Limitations on Actions for Constructive Fraud: As a liability created by statute that is neither a penalty nor a statutory debt, claims brought under the Montana Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 are subject to the 2-year statute of limitations in 27-2-211. Osterman v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 2003 MT 327, 318 M 342, 80 P3d 435 (2003), following Royal Ins. Co. v. Roadarmel, 2000 MT 259, 301 M 508, 11 P3d 105 (2000).

Exercise of Ordinary Diligence Required in Discovery of Unfair Trade Practices Constituting Fraud for Tolling Statute of Limitations: For purposes of tolling the statute of limitations in an action for fraud or unfair trade practices, ordinary diligence must be exercised by the aggrieved party in discovery of the facts constituting the fraud or deceptive practice. Pursuant to Johnson v. Barrett, 1999 MT 176, 295 M 254, 983 P2d 925 (1999), the test is whether the plaintiff has information of circumstances sufficient to put a reasonable person on inquiry or has the opportunity to obtain knowledge from sources open to the plaintiff's investigation. Mere ignorance of the facts will not suffice to toll the statute of limitations. In this case, plaintiff filed an unfair trade practices complaint about 2 years and 9 months after entering an agreement with defendant siding installer, believing at the time that the contract was with the defendant company that manufactured the siding. However, plaintiff showed no affirmative conduct by either defendant that was calculated to obscure the existence of a cause of action, nor were the facts giving rise to the alleged fraud concealed. Thus, plaintiff discovered or should have discovered the facts constituting the alleged fraud when the contract was entered more than 2 years prior to filing suit, so the claim was barred by the 2-year statute of limitations in 27-2-211. Osterman v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 2003 MT 327, 318 M 342, 80 P3d 435 (2003).

No Evidence of False Representation of Material Fact — Claim of Negligent Misrepresentation Properly Dismissed: Plaintiff claimed that vinyl siding was sold, furnished, and installed on her home under misleading circumstances because the installer failed to clearly identify the relationship with the siding manufacturer. However, plaintiff failed to specify any false statements made by either the installer or the manufacturer that led her to believe that this was true. Absent evidence demonstrating the primary element of the cause of action, plaintiff's negligent representation claim failed as a matter of law. Osterman v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 2003 MT 327, 318 M 342, 80 P3d 435 (2003), following Yellowstone II Dev. Group, Inc. v. First Am. Title Ins. Co., 2001 MT 41, 304 M 223, 20 P3d 755 (2001).

Discretionary, Not Punitive, Nature of Treble Damage Award: The purpose of the trebling provision in this section is to encourage private individuals to pursue violations of the Montana Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 by making it more economically feasible to pursue claims when actual damages are minimal. To be eligible for treble damages, this section does not require a plaintiff to prove malice, oppression, or fraud, which under Montana law is prerequisite conduct necessary to allowing punitive damages. Nothing in the statutory language indicates that trebling of damages under the Act is punitive rather than compensatory or remedial in nature, as indicated by the Legislature's intent in drafting the Act without including specific conduct that would trigger the imposition of treble damages. Because of the compensatory or remedial nature of the treble damages provision, the District Court in this case committed reversible error when it ruled that treble damages could not be awarded because the evidence did not support a finding generally associated with punitive damages. Rather, a District Court should be guided by the overall purpose of the Act itself, and use discretion in making a treble award on a case-by-case basis. Plath v. Schonrock, 2003 MT 21, 314 M 101, 64 P3d 984 (2003).

Partial Award of Attorney Fees Improper When Not Supported by Competent Evidence Established at Hearing: The District Court properly used its discretion in awarding attorney fees under this section, but the award was only partial, and the court failed to hold an evidentiary hearing to determine the amount to be awarded. Without the support of competent evidence gathered at a hearing, the award was an abuse of discretion. The Supreme Court reversed and ordered an evidentiary hearing for the determination of reasonable attorney fees in accordance with the criteria established in Swenson v. Janke, 274 M 354, 908 P2d 678 (1995). Plath v. Schonrock, 2003 MT 21, 314 M 101, 64 P3d 984 (2003).

Expert Testimony Unnecessary on Issue of Standard of Care — District Court Not Directed as to All Expert Testimony on All Claims: Durbins purchased a home through the seller's realtors. Contrary to the representations of the realtors, Durbins discovered that the property had no legal septic system, that the household water was unsafe to use for any purpose, and that the access road was located on the neighbor's property. Durbins brought an action against the realtors, alleging negligent misrepresentation, actual and constructive fraud, and statutory violations involving the Montana real estate licensing laws and the Montana Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973. The defendants sought and achieved dismissal of the case on the grounds that Durbins failed to prove through expert testimony the applicable standard of care of the realtors. The Supreme Court held that expert witnesses were unnecessary to prove a standard of care. Durbins also asked that the Supreme Court direct the District Court to exclude testimony of any expert witnesses on any claim asserted by the Durbins. The Supreme Court noted that the District Courts have great latitude concerning the admissibility of evidence and that the District Court would in any event have to comply with Rule 702, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The Supreme Court therefore declined to direct the District Court as requested by the Durbins. Durbin v. Ross, 276 M 463, 916 P2d 758, 53 St. Rep. 471 (1996).

Repossession of Vehicle as Constituting Conversion — Damages: Entriken purchased a new pickup, granting the credit union a security interest in the vehicle, purchased credit disability insurance as part of the loan, and authorized payroll deduction for direct payment of the loan. Entriken was subsequently injured on the job. He notified the credit union that he was no longer working and completed the proper documents so that the disability insurance company could begin making the monthly payments. Three weeks later, Entriken received a delinquency notice but was informed by the credit union that the notice was merely a formality and that he need not worry because the disability payments would be arriving shortly. About 5 weeks later the credit union caused the vehicle to be repossessed, adding costs of repossession, storage, transportation, and legal fees to the outstanding loan balance. Without proper notice to Entriken or filing a deficiency judgment, the credit union sold the truck. Following sale of the truck, the credit union continued to receive credit disability payments as well as payroll deductions from Entriken, who was subsequently reemployed. Despite claims that Entriken had failed to properly insure the vehicle and had been delinquent in payments, the District Court correctly found that the credit union had converted the vehicle and awarded Entriken actual damages, damages for loss of use, attorney fees, and treble damages under this section. The Supreme Court affirmed the conversion question and the award of actual damages plus interest and attorney fees, reversed the award of loss of use damages as being unfounded on legal authority, and recalculated the treble damage award, under the rationale of Baird v. Norwest Bank, 255 M 317, 843 P2d 327, 49 St. Rep. 1026 (1992), to three times the actual damages rather than three times the actual damages plus the actual damages. Entriken v. Motor Coach Fed. Credit Union, 256 M 85, 845 P2d 93, 49 St. Rep. 1148 (1992).

Breach of Loan Contract for Failure to Honor Late Payment Agreement: Testimony of borrowers that bank's representative agreed to give them until September 15 to make late payment of an overdue loan payment, of borrowers' former attorney in support of borrowers' testimony, and of bank employee that one of the borrowers told her on the phone that he had promised to pay by September 15 was sufficient evidence to support jury's verdict that bank breached the loan contract when, beginning on September 12, it initiated collection procedures, accelerated payments and demanded payment of the loan in full, refused further payments on the loan, and repossessed the collateral. However, there was no fraud because bank's representative testified that the agreement was for payment by September 1, she entered that date in the bank's computer, and there was no evidence that she intended to enter the wrong date. Baird v. Norwest Bank, 255 M 317, 843 P2d 327, 49 St. Rep. 1026 (1992).

Consumer Loan by Bank Covered by Act: Because the Montana Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 is in derogation of the common law, it should be liberally construed with a view to effect its object and to promote justice. The approach to defining what is meant by the word "services" should be broad in scope. The Act applies to a consumer loan by a bank. Baird v. Norwest Bank, 255 M 317, 843 P2d 327, 49 St. Rep. 1026 (1992).

Attorney Fees — No Record on Appeal: Plaintiffs and defendant were each negligent in causing plaintiffs' damages. The jury also found the defendant violated the Consumer Protection Act. Under the verdict form used, it was not possible for the Supreme Court to apportion damages between the negligence count and the Consumer Protection Act count. The trial court denied attorney fees to the plaintiffs, stating that they were equally negligent in the events leading to the action. No transcript was provided on appeal. In the absence of a record on appeal, the Supreme Court cannot evaluate the trial court's basis for denying attorney fees and will not interfere with the court's discretion under these circumstances. Evans v. Teakettle Realty, 226 M 363, 736 P2d 472, 44 St. Rep. 723 (1987).

Negligence Compared With Violation of Consumer Protection Act: The jury found the defendant violated the Consumer Protection Act and was negligent. The trial court applied the comparative negligence statute to reduce the plaintiffs' recovery under the Act. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the reduction of damages, stating that the law as stated in the jury instructions does not allow the separation of the defendant's actions in violation of the Consumer Protection Act from its actions that were negligent. Evans v. Teakettle Realty, 226 M 363, 736 P2d 472, 44 St. Rep. 723 (1987).

Provisions of Act Not Applicable — Attorney Fees Proper: The District Court found that the provisions of the Montana Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973 were inapplicable to the subject of this case but that pursuant to the Act the defendant, as prevailing party, was entitled to reasonable attorney fees under this section. Appellant contended that since the Act did not apply, award of attorney fees was not appropriate. The Supreme Court affirmed the award, noting that defendant prevailed on the main issue in controversy and that since the action was brought under the Act, reasonable attorney fees were proper. Dillree v. Devoe, 223 M 47, 724 P2d 171, 43 St. Rep. 1521 (1986).

Section Inapplicable to Purchaser of Goods for Business Purposes: When uncontradicted testimony established that a machine had been purchased for use in respondents' business, respondents did not fall within the class of persons who may bring a private action under this part. Doll v. Major Muffler Centers, Inc., 208 M 401, 687 P2d 48, 41 St. Rep. 429 (1984).

Exemplary Damages: In an action to rescind a contract to purchase an automobile, there was no requirement that plaintiff show malice, oppression, or fraud on the part of the seller in order to recover exemplary damages under 30-14-133. T & W Chevrolet v. Darvial, 196 M 287, 641 P2d 1368, 39 St. Rep. 112 (1982).

Consumer Protection Act Violation Alleged as Cause of Accident — Agency Rule Not in Conflict With Federal Law — Summary Judgment: The District Court properly denied summary judgment on plaintiff's Court No. II, which claimed misrepresentation as to the odometer reading on a used car sold to her by defendant corporation as the proximate cause of her accident and subsequent injuries. A state agency rule adopted pursuant to 30-14-104 was not inconsistent with the rules and decisions of the FTC and decisions of the Federal Courts, although the rule deals with sales and the main purpose of the federal law is to prevent unlawful restraint of trade. Whether the alleged violation was a cause of plaintiff's damages was a jury issue. Kopischke v. First. Cont. Corp., 187 M 471, 610 P2d 668 (1980).

School District Not Considered Person Engaged in Business Subject to Liability Under Montana Unfair Trade Practices Act: The Great Falls school district entered exclusive agreements with Coke and Pepsi to provide soft drinks in school facilities in exchange for $500,000 over a 10-year period. Plaintiff, which had supplied soft drinks to the district for almost 20 years, sued the school district for violation of the Montana Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973. The school district contended that it was not subject to suit under the Act because by definition, it was not a person engaged in business, and the Supreme Court agreed. The plain meaning of person in 30-14-202 does not include a school district. To conclude otherwise would infringe on a school district's statutory power to raise revenue for funding education. A school district is also not a business as defined in the Act because a business is a person, which does not include a school district. Further, in accordance with the purpose set out in this section, the Act was created to apply to competitive businesses, not government, which generally acts as a market regulator and not a competitor. Brand Monopoly Over Manufacturer's Own Product Not Violative of Unfair Trade Practices Act: Plaintiffs contended that Video Lottery Consultants, Inc., refused to sell its gambling machines in order to create a monopoly in the sale and use of video lottery machines. However, under the rationale of Sadler v. Rexair, Inc., 612 F. Supp. 491 (D.C. Mont. 1985), a brand monopoly over a manufacturer's own product does not violate the provisions of this section. Smith v. Video Lottery Consultants, Inc., 260 M 54, 858 P2d 11, 50 St. Rep. 939 (1993).

Restraint of Trade Distinguished From Sherman Act — Applicability of Summary Judgment and Injunctive Relief: Although this section is modeled after the federal Sherman Act, 15 U.S.C. 1, the Sherman Act requires two or more persons to be involved in the unlawful trade restraint while the Montana statute appears to be broader, as one person acting alone may violate the provisions of this section. Based upon this statutory difference, coupled with the fact that this section has not been previously interpreted and no underlying factual record was developed in this case, it was premature to dismiss a claim for failure to state a cause of action for which relief could be granted because it could not be said that plaintiffs were not entitled to relief under any set of facts that could be proven in support of their claim. The case was remanded for further discovery, subject to summary dismissal if plaintiffs could not develop a sustainable action. Similarly, if a sustainable action could be developed, injunctive relief may be available under 30-14-222. Smith v. Video Lottery Consultants, Inc., 260 M 54, 858 P2d 11, 50 St. Rep. 939 (1993).

Parallel Pricing as Insufficient Circumstantial Evidence of Restraint of Trade: Where the State brought an action against the defendant retail gasoline dealer, alleging that the defendant acted to restrain trade in the setting of gasoline prices, the federal District Court found that the defendant's actions of price following and parallel pricing were consistent with the defendant's own policies and self-interest, were a rational response to market conditions, were not accompanied by any evidence of other "plus factors" tending to show restraint of trade, and that the evidence of the defendant's pricing methods was therefore insufficient circumstantial evidence to show a violation of either state or federal law. St. v. SuperAmerica, 559 F. Supp. 298, 40 St. Rep. 944 (D.C. Mont. 1983).

Milk Pricing Control — Actions Compelled by Law Not Unfair Trade Practices: A third-party plaintiff brought an action for declaratory and injunctive relief against the operation and enforcement of certain milk pricing statutes, claiming those statutes violated the provisions of 30-14-205, and the third-party defendant moved to dismiss the claim on the grounds that it did not state a claim for relief. The court found that although the statutes challenged by the plaintiff did fix the price of milk, eliminate competition, and create a monopoly, the only reason whereby 30-14-224 could control was if that section expressly or impliedly repealed the Milk Price Control Act. The court found no such repeal had been intended by the Legislature. Hinshaw v. Beatrice Foods, Inc., 37 St. Rep. 1677 (D.C. Mont. 1980) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

The Deterrent Effect of the Uniform Trade Secrets Act, Lydon, 69 J. Pat. Off. Soc'y 427 (1987).

30-14-402. Definitions.

Commissioners' Notes

One of the broadly stated policies behind trade secret law is "the maintenance of standards of commercial ethics." Kewanee Oil Co. v. Bicron Corp., 416 U.S. 470 (1974). The Restatement of Torts, Section 757, Comment (f), notes: "A complete catalogue of improper means is not possible," but Section 1(1) [30-14-402(1)] includes a partial listing.

Proper means include:

1. Discovery by independent invention;
2. Discovery by "reverse engineering", that is, by starting with the known product and working backward to find the method by which it was developed. The acquisition of the known product must of course, also be by a fair and honest means, such as purchase of the item on the open market for reverse engineering to be lawful;
3. Discovery under a license from the owner of the trade secret;
4. Observation of the item in public use or on public display;
5. Obtaining the trade secret from published literature;

Improper means could include otherwise lawful conduct which is improper under the circumstances; e.g., an airplane overflight used as aerial reconnaissance to determine the competitor's plant layout during construction of the plant. E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., Inc. v. Christopher, 431 F.2d 1012 (CA 5, 1970), cert. den. 400 U.S. 1024 (1970). Because the trade secret can be destroyed through public knowledge, the unauthorized disclosure of a trade secret is also a misappropriation.

The type of accident or mistake that can result in a misappropriation under Section 1(2)(ii)(C) [30-14-402(2)(b)(iii)] involves conduct by a person seeking relief that does not constitute a failure of efforts that are reasonable under the circumstances to maintain its secrecy under Section 1(4)(ii) [30-14-402(4)(b)].

The definition of "trade secret" contains a reasonable departure from the Restatement of Torts (First) definition which required that a trade secret be "continuously used in one's business." The broader definition in the proposed Act extends protection to a plaintiff who has not yet had an opportunity or acquired the means to put a trade secret to use. The definition includes information that has commercial value from a negative viewpoint, for example the results of lengthy and expensive research which proves that a certain process will not work could be of great value to a competitor.

Cf. Telex Corp. v. IBM Corp., 510 F.2d 894 (CA 10, 1975) per curiam, cert. dismissed 423 U.S. 802 (1975) (liability imposed for developmental cost savings with respect to product not marketed). Because a trade secret need not be exclusive to confer a competitive advantage, different independent developers can acquire rights in the same trade secret.

The words "method, technique" are intended to include the concept of "know-how."

The language "not being generally known to and not being readily ascertainable by proper means by other persons" does not require that information be generally known to the public for trade secret rights to be lost. If the principal person who can obtain economic benefit from information is aware of it, there is no trade secret. A method of casting metal, for example, may be unknown to the general public but readily known within the foundry industry.

Information is readily ascertainable if it is available in trade journals, reference books, or published materials. Often, the nature of a product lends itself to being readily copied as soon as it is available on the market. On the other hand, if reverse engineering is lengthy and expensive, a person who discovers the trade secret through reverse engineering can have a trade secret in the information obtained from reverse engineering.

Finally, reasonable efforts to maintain secrecy have been held to include advising employees of the existence of a trade secret, limiting access to a trade secret on "need to know basis", and controlling plant access. On the other hand, public disclosure of information through display, trade journal publications, advertising, or other carelessness can preclude protection.

The efforts required to maintain secrecy are those "reasonable under the circumstances." The courts do not require that extreme and unduly expensive procedures be taken to protect trade secrets against flagrant industrial espionage. See E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., Inc. v. Christopher, supra. It follows that reasonable use of a trade secret including controlled disclosure to employees and licensees is consistent with the requirement of relative secrecy.

30-14-403. Injunctive relief — royalty.

Commissioners' Notes

Injunctions restraining future use and disclosure of misappropriated trade secrets frequently are sought. Although punitive perpetual injunctions have been granted, e.g., Elcor Chemical Corp. v. Agri-Sul, Inc., 494 S.W. 2d 204 (Tex.Civ.App.1973), Section 2(a) [30-14-403(1)] of this Act adopts the position of the trend of authority limiting the duration of injunctive relief to the extent of the temporal advantage over good faith competitors gained by a misappropriator. See, e.g., K-2 Ski Co. v. Head Ski Co., Inc., 506 F.2d 471 (CA9, 1974) (maximum appropriate duration of both temporary and permanent injunctive relief is period of time it would have taken defendant to discover trade secrets lawfully through either independent development or reverse engineering of plaintiff's products).

The general principle of section 2(a) and (b) [30-14-403(1) and (2)] is that an injunction should last for as long as is necessary, but no longer than is necessary, to eliminate the commercial advantage or "lead time" with respect to good faith competitors that a person has obtained through misappropriation. Subject to any additional period of restraint necessary to negate lead time, an injunction accordingly should terminate when a former trade secret becomes either generally known to good faith competitors or generally knowable to them because of the lawful availability of products that can be reverse engineered to reveal a trade secret.

For example, assume that A has a valuable trade secret of which B and C, the other industry members, are originally unaware. If B subsequently misappropriates the trade secret and is enjoined from use, but C later lawfully reverse engineers the trade secret, the injunction restraining B is subject to termination as soon as B's lead time has been dissipated. All of the persons who could derive economic value from use of the information are now aware of it, and there is no longer a trade secret under section 1(4) [30-14-402(4)]. It would be anti-competitive to continue to restrain B after any lead time that B had derived from misappropriation had been removed.

If a misappropriator either has not taken advantage of lead time or good faith competitors already have caught up with a misappropriator at the time that a case is decided, future disclosure and use of a former trade secret by a misappropriator will not damage a trade secret owner and no injunctive restraint of future disclosure and use is appropriate. See, e.g., Northern Petrochemical Co. v. Tomlinson, 484 F.2d 1057 (CA7, 1973) (affirming trial court's denial of preliminary injunction in part because an explosion at its plant prevent an alleged misappropriator from taking advantage of lead time); Kubik, Inc. v. Hull, 185 USPQ 391

(Mich.App.1974) (discoverability of trade secret by lawful reverse engineering made by injunctive relief punitive rather than compensatory).

Section 2(b) [30-14-403(2)] deals with a distinguishable situation in which future use by a misappropriator will damage a trade secret owner but an injunction against future use nevertheless is unreasonable under the particular circumstances of a case. Situations in which this unreasonableness can exist include the existence of an overriding public interest which requires the denial of a prohibitory injunction against future damaging use and a person's reasonable reliance upon acquisition of a misappropriated trade secret in good faith and without reason to know of its prior misappropriation that would be prejudiced by a prohibitory injunction against future damaging use. Republic Aviation Corp. v. Schenk, 152 USPQ 830 (N.Y.Sup.Ct.1967) illustrates the public interest justification for withholding prohibitory injunctive relief. The court considered that enjoining a misappropriator from supplying the U.S. with an aircraft weapons control system would have endangered military personnel in Viet Nam. The prejudice to a good faith third party justification for withholding prohibitory injunctive relief can arise upon a trade secret owner's notification to a good faith third party that the third party has knowledge of a trade secret as a result of misappropriation by another. This notice suffices to make the third party a misappropriator thereafter under section 1(2)(ii)(B)(I) [30-14-402(2)(b)(ii)(A)]. In weighing an aggrieved person's interests and the interests of a third party who has relied in good faith upon his or her ability to utilize information, a court may conclude that restraining future use of the information by the third party is unwarranted. With respect to innocent acquirers of misappropriated trade secrets, section 2(b) [30-14-403(2)] is consistent with the principle of 4 Restatement Torts (First) §758(b) (1939), but rejects the Restatement's literal conferral of absolute immunity upon all third parties who have paid value in good faith for a trade secret misappropriated by another. The position taken by the Uniform Act is supported by Forest Laboratories, Inc. v. Pillsbury Co., 452 F.2d 621 (CA7, 1971) in which a defendant's purchase of assets of a corporation to which a trade secret had been disclosed in confidence was not considered to confer immunity upon the defendant.

When section 2(b) [30-14-403(2)] applies, a court is given discretion to substitute an injunction conditioning future use upon payment of a reasonable royalty for an injunction prohibiting future use. Like all injunctive relief for misappropriation, a royalty order injunction is appropriate only if a misappropriator has obtained a competitive advantage through misappropriation and only for the duration of that competitive advantage. In some situations, typically those involving good faith acquirers of trade secrets misappropriated by others, a court may conclude that the same considerations that render a prohibitory injunction against future use inappropriate also render a royalty order injunction inappropriate. See, generally, Prince Manufacturing, Inc. v. Automatic Partner, Inc., 198 USPQ 618 (N.J.Super.Ct.1976) (purchaser of misappropriator's assets from receiver after trade secret disclosed to public through sale of product not subject to liability for misappropriation).

Section 2(c) [30-14-403(3)] authorizes mandatory injunctions requiring that a misappropriator return the fruits of misappropriation to an aggrieved person, e.g., the return of stolen blueprints or the surrender of surreptitious photographs or recordings.

Where more than one person is entitled to trade secret protection with respect to the same information, only that one from whom misappropriation occurred is entitled to a remedy.

Compiler's Comments

1995 Amendment: Chapter 269 in (2), at beginning of first sentence, substituted "In exceptional circumstances" for "If the court determines that it would be unreasonable to prohibit future use" and inserted second sentence defining exceptional circumstances; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 269, L. 1995, provided: "With respect to a continuing misappropriation that began prior to [the effective date of this act] [October 1, 1995], [this act] does not apply to the continuing misappropriation that occurs after [the effective date of this act] [October 1, 1995]."

30-14-404. Damages.

Commissioners' Notes

Like injunctive relief, a monetary recovery for trade secret misappropriation is appropriate only for the period in which information is entitled to protection as a trade secret, plus the additional period, if any, in which a misappropriator retains an advantage over good faith competitors because of misappropriation. Actual damage to a complainant and unjust benefit to a misappropriator are caused by misappropriation during this time alone. See Conmar Products Corp. v. Universal Slide Fastener Co., 172 F.2d 150 (CA2, 1949) (no remedy for period subsequent to disclosure of trade secret by issued patent); Carboline Co. v. Jarboe, 454 S.W.2d 540 (Mo.1970) (recoverable monetary relief limited to period that it would have taken misappropriator to discover trade secret without misappropriation). A claim for actual damages and net profits can be combined with a claim for injunctive relief, but, if both claims are granted, the injunctive relief ordinarily will preclude a monetary award for a period in which the injunction is effective.

As long as there is no double counting, Section 3(a) [30-14-404(1)] adopts the principle of the recent cases allowing recovery of both a complainant's actual losses and a misappropriator's unjust benefit that are caused by misappropriation. E.g., Tri-Tron International v. Velto, 525 F.2d 432 (CA9, 1975) (complainant's loss and misappropriator's benefit can be combined). Because certain cases may have sanctioned double counting in a combined award of losses and unjust benefit, e. g., Telex Corp. v. IBM Corp., 510 F.2d 894 (CA10, 1975) (per curiam), cert. dismissed, 423 U.S. 802 (1975) (IBM recovered rentals lost due to displacement by misappropriator's products without deduction for expenses saved by displacement; as a result of rough approximations adopted by the trail judge, IBM also may have recovered developmental costs saved by misappropriator through misappropriation with respect to the same customers), the Act adopts an express prohibition upon the counting of the same item as both a loss to a complainant and an unjust benefit to a misappropriator.

Monetary relief can be appropriate whether or not injunctive relief is granted under section 2 [30-14-403]. If a person charged with misappropriation has acquired knowledge of a trade secret in good faith without reason to know of its misappropriation by another, however, the same considerations that can justify denial of all injunctive relief also can justify denial of all monetary relief. See Conmar Products Corp. v. Universal Slide Fastener Co., 172 F.2d 1950 (CA2, 1949) (no relief against new employer of employee subject to contractual obligation not to disclose former employer's trade secrets where new employer innocently had committed $40,000 to develop the trade secrets prior to notice of misappropriation).

If willful and malicious misappropriation is found to exist, section 3(b) [30-14-404(2)] authorizes the court to award a complainant exemplary damages in addition to the actual recovery under section 3(a) [30-14-404(1)] an amount not exceeding twice that recovery. This provision follows federal patent law in leaving discretionary trebling to the judge even though there may be a jury, compare 35 U.S.C. §284 (1976).

Whenever more than one person is entitled to trade secret protection with respect to the same information, only that one from whom misappropriation occurred is entitled to a remedy.

Compiler's Comments

1995 Amendment: Chapter 269 in first sentence of (1) substituted exception clause for "In addition to or in lieu of injunctive relief", in second sentence, at beginning, substituted clause authorizing damages, including actual loss caused by misappropriation, for "A complainant also may recover for", and inserted third sentence regarding measurement of damages; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 269, L. 1995, provided: "With respect to a continuing misappropriation that began prior to [the effective date of this act][October 1, 1995], [this act] does not apply to the continuing misappropriation that occurs after [the effective date of this act][October 1, 1995]."

Case Notes

Punitive Damages Available: A court may award exemplary damages and attorney fees under Montana's Uniform Trade Secrets Act even if a jury has decided that punitive damages are not available. The Montana Legislature did not incorporate a definition of punitive damages into the Act. Yeti by Molly, Ltd. v. Deckers Outdoor Corp., 259 F3d 1101 (9th Cir. 2001).

Commissioners' Notes

Section 4 [30-14-405] allows a court to award reasonable attorney fees to a prevailing party in specified circumstances as a deterrent to specious claims of misappropriation, to specious efforts by a misappropriator to terminate injunctive relief, and to willful and malicious misappropriation. In the latter situation, the court should take into consideration the extent to which a complainant will recover exemplary damages in determining whether additional attorney's fees should be awarded. Again, patent law is followed in allowing the judge to determine whether attorney's fees should be awarded even if there is a jury, compare 35 U.S.C. Section 285 (1976).

Compiler's Comments

Montana Changes: Montana allows an award of reasonable costs.

30-14-406. Preservation of secret.

Commissioners' Notes

If reasonable assurances of maintenance of secrecy could not be given, meritorious trade secret litigation would be chilled. In fashioning safeguards of confidentiality, a court must ensure that a respondent is provided sufficient information to present a defense and a trier of fact sufficient information to resolve the merits. In addition to the illustrative techniques specified in the statute, courts have protected secrecy in these cases by restricting disclosures to a party's counsel and his or her assistants and by appointing a disinterested expert as a special master to hear secret information and report conclusions to the court.

30-14-407. Statute of limitations.

Commissioners' Notes

There presently is a conflict of authority as to whether trade secret misappropriation is a continuing wrong. Compare Monlith Portland Midwest Co. v. Kaiser Aluminum & Chemical Corp., 407 F.2d 288 (CA9, 1969) (no continuing wrong under California law—limitation period upon all recovery begins upon initial misappropriation) with Underwater Storage, Inc. v. U. S. Rubber Co., 371 F.2d 950 (CADC, 1966), cert. den., 386 U.S. 911 (1967) (continuing wrong under general principles—limitation period with respect to a specific act of misappropriation begins at the time that the act of misappropriation occurs).

This Act rejects a continuing wrong approach to the statute of limitations but delays the commencement of the limitation period until an aggrieved person discovers or reasonably should have discovered the existence of misappropriation. If objectively reasonable notice of misappropriation exists, three years is sufficient time to vindicate one's legal rights.

30-14-408. Effect on other law.

Commissioners' Notes

This Act is not a comprehensive remedy. It applies to duties imposed by law in order to protect competitively significant secret information. It does not apply to duties voluntarily assumed through an express or an implied-in-fact contract. The enforceability of covenants not to disclose trade secrets and covenants not to compete that are intended to protect trade secrets, for example, are governed by other law. The Act also does not apply to duties imposed by law that are not dependent upon the existence of competitively significant secret information, like an agent's duty of loyalty to his or her principal.

Personal Solicitation Sales

Part Case Notes

Single Instance of Telephone or Home Contact Not Considered Personal Solicitation: Bradley contacted Johnson, a motor vehicle dealer, looking for a specific kind of vehicle. Johnson in turn contacted Muffitt, a salesman at another dealership, to inquire whether Muffitt had any vehicles meeting Bradley's wishes. Muffitt contacted Bradley by telephone and told Bradley that Muffitt's dealership had a vehicle that might be of interest. Bradley invited Muffitt to bring the vehicle to Bradley's home, which Muffitt did, and after test-driving the vehicle, Bradley decided to purchase it. After making 2 months' payments, Bradley decided not to keep the vehicle and sought to cancel the contract under 30-14-504 on grounds that the sale was governed by the law on personal solicitation sales and that Bradley thus had the right to cancel the sale within the cooling-off period allowed by that statute. The Supreme Court concluded that this part does not apply to this one-time sale by telephone or in person at the buyer's home because Bradley did not bring forth any evidence that the dealership regularly attempted sales by telephone or in person, other than at its place of business. Attorney General's Opinions

Legislator Prohibited From Appointment to Board of Review: Membership on the Board of Review established in this section is considered a public office of a civil nature pursuant to the five-part test in State ex rel. Barney v. Hawkins, 79 M 506, 257 P 411 (1927). Therefore, Art. V, sec. 9, Mont. Const., and 5-2-104 prohibit the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives from appointing a legislator as a member of the Board of Review, including appointment as a nonvoting member. Because of the prohibition against the appointment of a legislator to a civil office during the legislator's term of office, the President and Speaker may appoint only a nonlegislator as a member of the Board of Review. 49 A.G. Op. 15 (2002).
